THE

THE PREFACE.

How unfit, and how unworthy a choice I have made of my ſelf, to undertake a Work of this mixture; mine own reaſon, though exceeding weak, hath ſufficiently reſolved me. For had it been begotten then, with my firſt dawn of day, when the light of common knowledg began to open it ſelf to my younger years, and before any wound received, either from Fortune or Time: I might yet well have doubted, that the darkneſs of Age and Death would have covered over both It and Me, long before the performance. For, beginning with the Creation, I have proceeded with the Hiſtory of the World; and laſtly, purpoſed (ſome few ſallies excepted) to confine my Diſcourſe, with this our renowned Iſland of Great Britain. I confeſs that it had better ſorted with my diſability, the better part of whoſe times are run out in other travels, to have ſet together (as I could) the unjointed and ſcattered frame of our Engliſh affairs, than of the Univerſal: in whom, had there been no other defect (who am all defect) than the time of the day, it were enough; the day of a tempeſtuous life, drawn on to the very evening ere I began. But thoſe inmoſt and ſoul-piercing wounds, which are ever aking while uncured, with the deſire to ſatisfy thoſe few friends, which I have tried by the fire of Adverſity; the former enforcing, the later perſuading; have cauſed me to make my thoughts legible, and my ſelf the ſubject of every Opinion, wiſe or weak.

To the World I preſent them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither have others that were (Fortune changing) ſped much better in any Age. For Proſperity and Adverſity have evermore tyed and vntyed vulgar affections. And as we ſee it in Experience, That Doggs do always bark at thoſe they know not, and that it is their nature to accompany one another in thoſe clamours: ſo it is with the inconſiderate multitude; who, wanting that Vertue which we call Honeſty in all men, and that eſpecial gift of GOD, which we call Charity in Chriſtian men; condemn without hearing, and wound without offence given: led thereunto by uncertain Report only; which His Majeſty truly acknowledgeth for the Author of all lies. Blame no man (ſaith Siracides) before thou have enquired the matter: underſtand firſt, and then reform righteouſly. Rumor, res ſine Teſte, ſine Judice, maligna, fallax; Rumour is without Witneſs, without Judge, malicious, and deceivable. This vanity of vulgar Opinion it was, that gave S. Auguſtine Argument to affirm, That he feared the praiſe of good men, and deteſted that of the evil. And herein no man hath given a better Rule, than this of Seneca; Conſcientiæ ſatisfaciamus: nihil in famam laboremus, ſequatur vel mala, dum bene merearis; Let us ſatisfie our own Conſciences, and not trouble our ſelves with fame; be it never ſo ill, it is to be deſpiſed, ſo we deſerve well.

For my ſelf, if I have in any thing ſerved my Countrey, and prized it before my private: the general acceptation can yield me no other profit at this time, than doth a fair Sun-ſhine day to a Sea-man after Shipwrack; and the contrary no other harm, than an outragious tempeſt after the Port attained. I know that I loſt the love of many, for my fidelity towards Her whom I muſt ſtill honour in the duſt; though further than the defence of Her excellent Perſon, I never perſecuted any man. Of thoſe that did it, and by what device they did it, He that is the Supreme Judg of all the World, hath taken the accompt: ſo as for this kind of ſuffering, I muſt ſay with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parta, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that have made themſelves Fathers of that fame, which hath been begotten for them; I can neither envy at ſuch their purchaſed glory, nor much lament mine own miſ-hap in that kind; but content my ſelf to ſay with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars. To labour other ſatisfaction, were an effect of phrenzie, not of hope, ſeeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can travel the World without a Paſs-port. For were it otherwiſe; and were there not as many internal forms of the mind, as there are external figures of men; there were then ſome poſſibility to perſuade by the mouth of one Advocate, even Equity alone.

But ſuch is the multiplying, and extenſive vertue of dead Earth, and of that breath-giving life which God hath caſt upon ſlime and duſt, as that among thoſe that were, of whom we read and hear; and among thoſe that are, whom we ſee and converſe with; every one hath received a ſeveral Picture of face, and every one a divers Picture of mind; every one a form a-part, every one a fancy and cogitation differing: there being nothing wherein Nature ſo much triumpheth, as in diſſimilitude. From whence it cometh, that there is found ſo great diverſity of Opinions; ſo ſtrong a contrarity of inclinations: ſo many natural and unnatural; wiſe, fooliſh, manly, and childiſh affections and paſſions in mortal men. For it is not the viſible faſhion and ſhape of Plants, and of reaſonable Creatures, that makes the difference of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the form internal.

And though it pleaſed God to reſerve the Art of reading mens thoughts to himſelf; yet, as the fruit tells the name of the Tree; ſo do the outward works of men (ſo farr as their cogitations are acted) give us whereof to gheſs at the reſt. Nay, it were not hard to expreſs the one by the other, very near the life, did not craft in many, fear in the moſt, and the World's love in all, teach every capacity, according to the compaſs it hath, to qualifie and mask over their inward deformities for a time. Though it be alſo true, Nemo poteſt diu perſonam ferre fictam: cito in naturam ſuam reſidunt, quibus veritas non ſubeſt: No man can long continue masked in a counterfeit behaviour; the things that are forced for pretences, having no ground of truth, cannot long diſſemble their own natures. Neither can any man (ſaith Plutarch) ſo change himſelf, but that his heart may be ſometimes ſeen at his tongues end.

In this great diſcord, and diſ-ſimilitude of reaſonable Creatures, if we direct our ſelves to the Multitude; Omnes honeſtæ rei malus Judex eſt vulgus: The common People are evil Judges of honeſt things, and whoſe Wiſdom (ſaith Eccleſiaſtes) is to be deſpiſed: if

to the better ſort; every underſtanding hath a peculiar judgment, by which it both cenſureth other men, and valueth it ſelf. And therefore unto me it will not ſeem ſtrange, though I find theſe my worthleſs Papers torn with Rats; ſeeing the ſlothfull Cenſurers of all Ages have not ſpared to tax the Reverend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition; the ſevereſt men to themſelves, with Hypocriſie; the greateſt lovers of Juſtice, with Popularity; and thoſe of the trueſt Valour and Fortitude, with Vain-glory. But of theſe natures, which lie in wait to find fault, and to turn good into evil, ſeeing Solomon complained long ſince; and that the very Age of the World renders it every day after other more malicious; I muſt leave the Profeſſors to their eaſie ways of reprehenſion, than which there is nothing of more facility.

Eccleſ cap. 7. 22. Nihil facil us quàm reprehendere alium.

To me it belongs in the firſt part of this Preface, following the common and approved cuſtom of thoſe, who have left the memories of Time-paſt to after-Ages; to give, as near as I can, the ſame right to Hiſtory which they have done. Yet, ſeeing therein I ſhould but borrow other mens words; I will not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is, that among many other benefits, for which it hath been honoured; in this one it triumpheth over all humane knowledg, That it hath given us life in our underſtanding, ſince the World it ſelf had life and begining, even to this day; yea, it hath triumphed over time, which, beſides it, nothing but eternity hath triumphed over: for it hath carried our knowledg over the vaſt and devouring ſpace of many thouſands of years, and given ſo fair and piercing eyes to our mind; that we plainly behold living now (as if we had lived then) that great world, Magni Dei ſapiens opus, The wiſe work (ſaith Hermes) of a great God, as it was then, when but new to it ſelf. By it (I ſay) it is, that we live in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was governed; how it was covered with waters, and again re-peopled; how Kings and Kingdoms have flouriſhed and fallen, and for what vertue and piety God made proſperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched, both the one and the other. And it is not the leaſt debt we ow unto Hiſtory, that it hath made us acquainted with our dead Anceſtors; and, out of the depth and darkneſs of the earth, delivered us their memory and fame. In a word, we may gather out of Hiſtory a policy no leſs wiſe than eternal; by the compariſon and application of other mens fore-paſſed miſeries with our own like errors and ill deſervings. But it is neither of Examples the moſt lively inſtruction, nor the words of the wiſeſt men, nor the terror of future torments, that hath yet ſo wrought in our blind and ſtupified mindes, as to make us remember, That the Infinite Eye and Wiſdom of God doth pierce thorow all our pretences, as to make us remember, That the Juſtice of God doth require none other accuſer, than our own conſciences; which neither the falſe beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formality, which (to paciſie the Opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the leaſt kind, cover from his knowledg. And ſo much did that heathen Wiſdom confeſs, no way as yet qualified by the knowledg of a true God: If any (ſaith Euripides) having in his life committed wickedneſs, think he can hide it from the everlaſting gods, he thinks not well.

To repeat GODS Judgments in particular, upon thoſe of all degrees, which have played with his Mercies, would require a Volume a-part: for the Sea of Examples hath no bottom. The marks, ſet on private men, are with their bodies caſt into the Earth; and their fortunes written onely in the memories of thoſe that lived with them: ſo as they who ſucceeded, and have not ſeen the fall of others, do not fear their own faults. GODS Judgments upon the greater and greateſt have been left to Poſterity; firſt, by thoſe happy hands which the Holy Ghoſt hath guided; and ſecondly, by their vertue, who have gathered the acts and ends of Men mighty and remarkable in the World. Now, to point farr off, and to ſpeak of the converſion of Angels into Devils, for Ambition: Or of the greateſt and moſt glorious Kings, who have gnawn the graſs of the earth with Beaſts for pride and ingratitude towards GOD: Or, of that wiſe working of Pharaoh, when he ſlew the Infants of Iſrael, ere they had recovered their Cradles: Or, of the policy of Jezabel, in covering the murther of Naboth by a trial of the Elders, according to the Law, with many thouſands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopeleſs proof, that far-off Examples would not be left to the ſame far-off Reſpects, as heretofore? For who hath not obſerved, what labour, practiice, peril, bloud-ſhed, and cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the World have undergone, exerciſed, taken on them, and committed; to make themſelves and their Iſſues Maſters of the World? And yet hath Babylon, Perſia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, and the reſt, no fruit, no flower, graſs, nor leaf, ſpringing upon the face of the earth, of thoſe ſeeds: No, their very roots and ruines do hardly remain. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta ſunt, vel manu hominum everuntur, vel ſtando & durando deficiunt: All that the hand of man can make, is either overturned by the hand of man, or at length, by ſtanding and continuing conſumed. The reaſons of whoſe ruines, are diverſly given by thoſe that ground their Opinions on ſecond cauſes. All Kingdoms and States have fallen (ſay the Politicians) by outward and forein force, or by inward negligence and diſſention, or by a third cauſe ariſing from both. Others obſerve, That the greateſt have ſunk down under their own weight; of which Livie hath a touch: eo crevit, ut magnitudine laboret ſua: Others, That the divine Providence (which Cratippus objected to Pompey) hath ſet down the date and period of every Eſtate, before their firſt foundation and erection. But hereof I will give my ſelf a day over to reſolve.

For ſeeing the firſt Books of the following Story, have undertaken the Diſcourſe of the firſt Kings and Kingdoms: and that it is impoſſible for the ſhort life of a Preface to travel after, and over-take far-off Antiquity, and to judge of it; I will, for the preſent, examine what profit hath been gathered by our own Kings, and their Neighbour Princes; who having beheld, both in divine and humane letters, the ſucceſs of infidelity, injuſtice, and cruelty; have (notwithſtanding) planted after the ſame pattern.

True it is, that the judgments of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more ſtrange) the affection of any one man ſtirred up alike with examples of like nature: But every one is touched moſt with that which moſt nearly ſeemeth to touch his own private; Or otherwiſe beſt ſuteth with his apprehenſion. But the judgments of GOD are for ever unchangeable; neither is he wearied by the long proceſs of time, and won to give his bleſſing in one Age, to that which he hath curſed in another. Wherefore thoſe that are wiſe, or whoſe wiſdom, if it be not great, yet is true and well grounded; will be able to diſcern the bitter fruits of irreligious policy, as well among thoſe examples that are found in Ages removed farr from the preſent, as in thoſe later times. And that it may no leſs appear by evident proof, than by aſſeveration, That ill doing hath always been attended with ill ſucceſs; I will here, by way of Preface, face, run over some examples, which the Work ensuing hath not reached.

Among our Kings of the Norman Race, we have no sooner passed over the violence of the Norman Conquest, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of Gods Justice, upon the children of Henry the First. For that King, when by force, craft, and cruelty, he had dispossest, over-reach'd, and lastly made blind, and destroyed his elder Brother, Robert, Duke of Normandy, to make his own Sons Lords of the Land; GOD cast them all, Male and Female, Nephews and Neeces (Maud excepted) into the bottom of the Sea, with above an hundred and fifty others that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the Kings dearly beloved.

To pass over the rest, till we come to Edward the Second; it is certain, that after the murther of that King, the issue of bloud then made, though it had some times of stay and stopping, did again break out, and that so often, and in such abundance, as all our Princes of the Masculine Race (very few excepted) died of the same disease. And although the young years of Edward the Third, made his knowledg of that horrible fact no more than suspicious; yet, in that he afterwards caused his own Uncle, the Earl of Kent, to die, for no other offence, than the desire of his Brothers redemption, whom the Earl as then supposed to be living; the King making that to be Treason in his Uncle, which was indeed Treason in himself, (had his Uncles intelligence been true) this, I say, made it manifest, that he was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to have had it otherwise; though he caused Mortimer to die for the same.

This cruelty, the secret and unsearchable Judgment of GOD, revenged on the Grandchild of Edward the Third; and so it fell out, even to the last of that Line, that in the second or third descent, they were all buried under the ruines of those buildings, of which the Mortar had been tempered with innocent bloud. For Richard the Second, who saw both his Treasurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with divers others of his Counsellors, some of them slaughtered by the people, others in his absence executed by his enemies; yet he always took himself for over-wise, to be taught by examples. The Earls of Huntington and Kent, Montagu and Spencer, who thought themselves as great Politicians in those days, as others have done in these; hoping to please the King, and to secure themselves by the murther of Glouceſter; died soon after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands; and farr more shamefully than did that Duke. And as for the King himself (who, in regard of many deeds, unworthy of his Greatness, cannot be excused, as the disavowing himself by breach of Faith, Charters, Pardons and Patents:) He was in the prime of his youth deposed, and murthered by his Cousin-Germane and Vassal, Henry of Lancaster, afterwards Henry the Fourth.

This King, whose Title was weak, and his obtaining the Crown trayterous; who brake faith with the Lords at his landing, protesting to intend only the recovery of his proper inheritance, brake faith with Richard himself, and brake faith with all the Kingdom in Parliament, to whom he swore, that the deposed King should live. After he had enjoyed this Realm some few years, and in that time had been set upon on all sides by his Subjects, and never free from Conspiracies and Rebellions: he saw (if Souls immortal see and discern any things after the Bodies Death) his Grand-child Henry the Sixth, and his Son the Prince, ſuddenly, and without mercy, murthered; the poſſeſſion of the Crown (for which he had cauſed ſo much bloud to be poured out) transferred from his Race, and by the Iſſues of his enemies worn and enjoy'd; enemies, whom, by his own practice, he ſuppoſed that he had left no leſs powerleſs, than the ſucceſſion of the Kingdom queſtionleſs, by entailing the ſame upon his own Iſſues by Parliament. And, out of doubt, humane reaſon could have judged no otherwiſe, but that theſe cautious proviſions of the Father, ſeconded by the valour and ſignal victories of his Son Henry the Fifth, had buried the hopes of every Competitor, under the deſpair of all re-conqueſt and recovery. I ſay, that humane reaſon might ſo have judged, were not this paſſage of Cauſabon alſo true; Dies, hora, momentum, evertendis dominationibus ſufficet, quæ Adamantinis credebantur radicibus eſſe fundatæ; A day, an hour, a moment, is enough to overturn the things that ſeem to have been founded and rooted in Adamant.

Now, for Henry the Sixth, upon whom the greateſt ſtorm of his Grand-father's grievous faults fell, as it formerly had done upon Richard, the Grand-child of Edward; although he was generally eſteemed for a gentle and innocent Prince, yet, as he refuſed the Daughter of Armaignac, of the Houſe of Navarre, the greateſt of the Princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which match he might have defended his inheritance in France) and married the Daughter of Anjou (by which he loſt all that he had in France) ſo in condeſcending to the unworthy death of his Uncle of Glouceſter, the main and ſtrong Pillar of the Houſe of Lancaſter; He drew on himſelf and his Kingdom the greateſt joint-loſs and diſhonour, that ever it ſuſtained ſince the Norman Conqueſt. Of whom it may truly be ſaid, which a Counſellor of his own ſpake of Henry the Third of France, Q'uil eſtoit une fort gentile Prince; mais ſon reigne eſt advenu en une fort mauvois temps: That he was a very gentle Prince; but his Reign happened in a very unfortunate Seaſon.

It is true, that Buckingham and Suffolk were the practicers and contrivers of the Duke's death: Buckingham and Suffolk, becauſe the Duke gave inſtructions to their authority, which otherwiſe under the Queen had been abſolute; the Queen, in reſpect of her perſonal wound, ſpretæque injuria formæ, becauſe Glouceſter diſſuaded her marriage. But the fruit was anſwerable to the ſeed; the ſucceſs to the counſel. For after the cutting down of Glouceſter, York grew up ſo faſt, as he dared to diſpute his Right, both by arguments and arms; in which quarrel, Suffolk and Buckingham, with the greateſt number of their adherents, were diſſolved. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleaſed God to ſtrike down York; yet his Son the Earl of March, following the plain path which his Father had troden out, deſpoiled Henry the Father, and Edward the Son, both of their lives and Kingdom. And what was the end now of that politick Lady the Queen, other than this, That ſhe lived to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers; that ſhe lived to look on, while her Husband the King, and her onely Son the Prince, were hewen in ſunder; while the Crown was ſet on his head that did it? She lived to ſee her ſelf deſpoiled of her eſtate, and of her moveables: and laſtly, her Father, by rendring up the Crown of France, the Earldom of Provence, and other places, for the payment of 50000. crowns for her Ranſome, to become a ſtark Beggar. And this was the end of that ſubtilty, which Siracides calleth fine, but unrighunrighteous: for other fruit hath it never yielded ſince the World was. Sirac. 19.

And now it came to Edward the Fourth's turn (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the Plants of Lancaſter were rooted up, one onely Earl of Richmond excepted; whom alſo he had once bought of the Duke of Britain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward ſuch a Plantation, as could any way promiſe it ſelf ſtability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld & allowed the ſlaughter which Glouceſter, Dorſet, Haſtings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his own preſence; of which tragical Actors, there was not one that eſcaped the Judgment of GOD in the ſame kind. And he, which (beſides the execution of his Brother Clarence, for none other offence than he himſelf had formed in his own imagination) inſtructed Glouceſter to kill Henry the Sixth, his Predeceſſor; taught him alſo, by the ſame art, to kill his own Sons and Succeſſors, Edward and Richard. For, thoſe Kings which have ſold the bloud of others at a low rate; have but made the Market for their own enemies, to buy of theirs at the ſame price.

To Edward the Fourth, ſucceeded Richard the Third, the greateſt Maſter in miſchief of all that fore-went him; who, although, for the neceſſity of his Tragedy, he had more parts to play, and more to perform in his own Perſon, than all the reſt; yet he ſo well fitted every affection that plaid with him, as if each of them had but acted his own intereſt. For he wrought ſo cunningly upon the affections of Haſtings and Buckingham, enemies to the Queen, and to all her Kinred, as he eaſily allured them to condeſcend, that Rivers and Grey, the Kings Maternal Uncle and half Brother, ſhould (for the firſt) be ſevered from him: Secondly, he wrought their conſent to have them impriſoned: And laſtly (for the avoiding of future inconvenience) to have their Heads ſevered from their Bodies. And having now brought thoſe his chief inſtruments to exerciſe that common Precept which the Devil hath written upon every Poſt, namely, To depreſs thoſe whom they had grieved, and to deſtroy thoſe whom they had depreſs'd; He urged that Argument ſo farr, and ſo forcibly; as nothing but the death of the young King himſelf, and of his Brother, could faſhion the concluſion. For he cauſed it to be hammered into Buckingham's head, That, whenſoever the King, or his Brother, ſhould have able years to exerciſe their power, they would take a moſt ſevere revenge of that cureleſs wrong offered to their Uncle and Brother, Rivers and Grey. Scelera ſceleribus tuerda. Sen. de Clem.

But this was not his manner of reaſoning with Haſtings, whoſe fidelity to his Maſters Sons was without ſuſpect; and yet the Devil, who never diſſuades by impoſſibility, taught him to try him. And ſo he did. But, when he found by Catesby, who ſounded him, that he was not fordable, he firſt reſolved to kill him ſitting in Council; wherein having failed with his Sword, he ſet the Hangman upon him, with a weapon of more weight. And, becauſe nothing elſe could move his appetite, he cauſed his head to be ſtricken off, before he eat his Dinner. A greater Judgment of God, than this upon Haſtings, I have never obſerved in any Story. For, the ſelf-ſame day that the Earl Rivers, Grey, and others, were (without trial of Law, or offence given) by Haſtings advice, executed at Pomfret; I ſay, Haſtings himſelf, in the ſame day, and (as I take it) in the ſame hour, in the ſame lawleſs manner, had his Head ſtruck off in the Tower of London. But Buckingham lived a while longer; and with an eloquent Oration perſuaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their King. And having received the Earl- dom of Hereford for reward, beſides the hope of marrying his Daughter to the Kings onely Son; after many grievous vexations of mind, and unfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and delivered up by his truſtieſt ſervant; he had his Head ſevered from his Body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peers. And what ſucceſs had Richard himſelf after all theſe miſchiefs and murthers, policies, and counter-policies to Chriſtian Religion; and after ſuch time as with a mercileſs hand he had preſſed out the breath of his Nephews and Natural Lords, other than the proſperity of ſo ſhort a life, as it took end, ere himſelf could well look over and diſcern it? the great out-cry of innocent bloud obtained at GOD'S hands the effuſion of his; who became a ſpectacle of ſhame and diſhonour, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruel King, Henry the Seventh cut off; and was therein (no doubt) the immediate inſtrument of Gods Juſtice. A politick Prince he was, if ever there were any, who by the engine of his wiſdom, beat down and overturned as many ſtrong oppoſitions, both before and after he wore the Crown, as ever King of England did; I ſay, by his wiſdom, becauſe, as he ever left the reins of his affections in the hands of his profit, ſo he always weighed his undertakings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazzard than ſo much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. He had well obſerved the proceedings of Loys the Eleventh, whom he followed in all was royal, or royal-like; but he was farr more juſt, and begun not their proceſſes whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

He could never endure any mediation in rewarding his ſervants, and therein exceeding wiſe; for whatſoever himſelf gave, he himſelf received back the thanks and the love, knowing it well, that the affections of men (purchaſed by nothing ſo readily as by benefits) were trains that better became great Kings, than great Subjects. On the contrary, in whatſoever he grieved his Subjects, he wiſely put it off on thoſe that he found fit miniſters for ſuch actions. Howſoever, the taking off of Stanlies Head, who ſet the Crown on his, and the death of the young Earl of Warwick, Son to George Duke of Clarence, ſhews, as the ſucceſs alſo did, that he held ſomewhat of the errors of his Anceſtors; for his poſſeſſion in the firſt Line ended in his Grand-child, as that of Edward the Third, and Henry the Fourth had done.

Now, for King Henry the Eighth, if all the Pictures and Patterns of a mercileſs Prince were loſt in the World, they might all again be painted to the life, out of the Story of this King. For, how many ſervants did he advance in haſt (but for what vertue no man could ſuſpect) and with the change of his fancy ruined again; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others, of more deſert, gave he abundant flowers from whence to gather Honey, and in the end of Harveſt burnt them in the Hive? How many Wives did he cut off, and caſt off, as his fancy and affection changed? How many Princes of the bloud (wherof ſome of them for age, could hardly crawl towards the block) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common Chronicles have kept the accompt) did he execute? yea, in his very death-bed, and when he was at the point to give his accompt to GOD for the abundance of bloud already ſpilt: He impriſoned the Duke of Norfolk the Father; and executed the Earl of Surry the Son; the one, whoſe deſerving he knew not how to value, having never omitted any thing that concerned his own honour, and the Kings ſervice; the other never having committed any thing worthy of his leaſt diſpleaſure; the one exceeding valiant and adviſed; the other no leſs valiant than learned, and of excellent hope. But beſides the ſorrows which he heaped upon the Fatherleſs and Widows, at home; and beſides the vain enterpriſes abroad, wherein it is thought that he conſumed more treaſure, than all our victorious Kings did in their ſeveral Conqueſts; what cauſleſs and cruel warrs did he make upon his own Nephew King James the Fifth? What Laws and Wills did he deviſe to eſtabliſh this Kingdom in his own Iſſues? uſing his ſharpeſt weapons to cut off, and cut down thoſe Branches, which ſprang from the ſame root that himſelf did. And in the end (notwithſtanding theſe his ſo many irreligious proviſions) it pleaſed God to take away all his own, without increaſe; though, for themſelves in their ſeveral kinds, all Princes of eminent vertue. For theſe words of Samuel to Agag King of the Amalekites, have been verified upon many others: As thy Sword hath made other women childleſs, ſo ſhall thy mother be childleſs among other women. And that bloud which the ſame King Henry affirmed, that the cold air of Scotland had frozen up in the North, God hath diffuſed by the Sun-ſhine of his grace; from whence his Majeſty now living, and long to live, is deſcended. Of whom I may ſay it truly, That if all the malice of the World were infuſed into one eye; yet could it not diſcern in his life, even to this day, any one of thoſe foul ſpots, by which the conſciences of all the fore-named Princes (in effect) have been defiled; nor any drop of that innocent bloud on the Sword of his Juſtice, with which the moſt that fore-went him have ſtained both their hands and fame. And for this Crown of England, it may truly be avowed; that he hath received it even from the Hand of God, and hath ſtaied the time of putting it on, howſoever he were provoked to haſten it: That he never took revenge of any man that ſought to put him beſide it; That he refuſed the aſſiſtance of Her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as ever Princeſs did: That His Majeſty entred not by a breach, nor by bloud; but by the Ordinary Gate, which his own right ſet open; and into which, by a general love and obedience, He was received. And howſoever His Majeſty's preceding title to this Kingdom, was preferred by many Princes (witneſs the Treaty at Cambray in the year 1559.) yet he never pleaſed to diſpute it, during the life of that renowned Lady his Predeceſſor; no, notwithſtanding the injury of not being declared Heir, in all the time of her long Reign.

Fatherleſs

Neither ought we to forget, or neglect our thankfulneſs to God for the uniting of the Northern parts of Britanny to the South, to wit, of Scotland to England, which, though they were ſevered, but by ſmall brooks and banks, yet, by reaſon of the long continued Warr, and the cruelties exerciſed upon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitely ſevered. This, I ſay, is not the leaſt of God's bleſſings which His Majeſty hath brought with him unto this Land; No, put all our petty grievances together, and heap them up to the height, they will appear as a Mole-Hill, compared with the Mountain of this concord. And if all the Hiſtorians ſince then have acknowledged the uniting of the Red-Roſe and the White, for the greateſt happineſs (Chriſtian Religion excepted) that ever this Kingdom received from God, certainly, the peace between the two Lions of Gold and Gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former; for by it, beſides the ſparing of our Britiſh Bloud, heretofore, and during the difference, ſo often and abundantly ſhed, the ſtate of England is more aſſured, the Kingdom more enabled to recover her antient honour and rights, and by it made more invincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies, and conqueſts. It is true, that hereof we do not yet find the effect. But, had the Duke of Parma, in the year 1588. joined the Army which he commanded, with that of Spain, and landed it on the South- coaſt; and had His Majeſty at the ſame time declared himſelf againſt us in the North, it is eaſie to divine what had become of the Liberty of England; certainly, we would then, without murmure, have brought this Union a farr greater praiſe than it hath ſince coſt us. It is true, that there was never any Common-weal, or Kingdom in the World, wherein no man had cauſe to lament. Kings live in the World, and not above it. They are not Infinite, to examine every man's cauſe, or to relieve every man's wants. And yet, in the later (though to his own prejudice) His Majeſty hath had more compaſſion of other mens neceſſities, than of his own Coffers. Of whom it may be ſaid, as of Solomon, Dedit Deus Solomoni latitudinem cordis; Which, if other men do not underſtand with Pineda, to be meant by Liberality, but by Latitude of knowledg; yet may it be better ſpoken of His Majeſty, than of any King that ever England had; who, as well in divine, as in humane underſtanding hath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

Fin. comment in Sal. 1. K. 4.

I could ſay much more of the Kings Majeſty, without flattery: did I not fear the imputation of preſumption, and withall ſuſpect, that it might befall theſe Papers of mine (though the loſs were little) as it did the Pictures of Queen Elizabeth, made by unskilfull and common Painters, which, by her own commandment were knock'd in pieces, and caſt into the fire. For ill Artiſts, in ſetting out the Beauty of the external; and weak Writers, in deſcribing the Vertues of the internal; do often leave to Poſterity, of well formed faces, a deformed memory; and of the moſt Perfect and Princely minds, a moſt defective Repreſentation. It may ſuffice, and there needs no other diſcourſe; if the honeſt Reader but compare the cruel and turbulent paſſages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour-Princes (of whom, for that purpoſe I have inſerted this brief Diſcourſe) with His Majeſties temperat, revengeleſs, and liberal diſpoſition; I ſay, that if the honeſt Reader weigh them juſtly, and with an even hand; and withall, but beſtow every deformed child on his true Parent; He ſhall find, that there is no man that hath ſo juſt a cauſe to complain, as the King himſelf hath. Now, as we have told the ſucceſs of the trumperies, and cruelties of our own Kings, and other great Perſonages; ſo we find, that GOD is every where the ſame God. And, as it pleaſed him to puniſh the uſurpation and unnatural cruelty of Henry the Firſt, and of our Third Edward, in their Children for many Generations: ſo dealt he with the Sons of Loys Debonaire, the Son of Charls the Great, or Charlemain. For after ſuch time as Debonaire of France had torn out the eyes of Bernard his Nephew, the Son of Pepin, the eldeſt Son of Charlemaine, and Heir of the Empire, and then cauſed him to die in Priſon, as did our Henry to Robert his elder Brother; there followed nothing but murthers upon murthers, poiſoning, impriſonments, and civil Warr; till the whole Race of that famous Emperor was extinguiſhed. And though Debonaire, after he had rid himſelf of his Nephew by a violent death, and of his baſtard Brothers by a civil death (having incloſed them with ſure guard all the days of their lives, within a Monaſtery) held himſelf ſecure from all oppoſition; yet God raiſed up againſt him (which he ſuſpected not) his own Sons, to vex him, to invade him, to take him priſoner, and to depoſe him; his own Sons, with whom (to ſatisfie their ambition) he had ſhared his eſtate, and given them Crowns to wear, and Kingdoms to govern, during his own life. Yea, his eldeſt Son Lothaire (for he had four, three by his firſt Wife, and one by his ſecond; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made made it the cauſe of his depoſition, that he had uſed violence toward his Brothers and Kinſmen; and that he had ſuffered his Nephew (whom he might have delivered) to be ſlain. Eo quod, ſaith the Text, fratribus & propinquis violentiam intulerit, & nepotem ſuum, quem ipſe liberare poterat, interfici permiſerit; Becauſe he uſed violence to his Brothers and Kinſmen, and ſuffered his Nephew to be ſlain, whom he might have delivered. Step Paſquiere recher l 5. c. 1.

Yet did he that which few Kings do; namely, repent him of his cruelty. For, among many other things which he performed in the General Aſſembly of the States, it follows: Poſt hæc autem palam ſe erraſſe confeſſus, & imitatus Imperatoris Theodoſii exemplum, pœnitentiam ſpontaneam ſuſcepit, tam de his, quam quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem geſſerat: After this, he did openly confeſs himſelf to have erred, and following the Example of the Emperor Theodoſius, he underwent voluntary penance, as well for his other offences, as for that which he had done againſt Bernard his own Nephew. Paſq. Ibidem.

This he did, and it was praiſe-worthy. But the bloud that is unjuſtly ſpilt, is not again gathered up from the ground by repentance. Theſe Medicines, miniſtred to the dead, have but dead rewards.

The King, as I have ſaid, had four Sons. To Lothaire his eldeſt, he gave the Kingdom of Italy, as Charlemaine his Father had done to Pepin, the Father of Bernard, who was to ſucceed him in the Empire. To Pepin, the ſecond Son, he gave the Kingdom of Aquitaine; to Loys, the Kingdom of Bavier; and to Charls, whom he had by a ſecond Wife, called Judith, the remainder of the Kingdom of France. But his ſecond Wife, being a mother-in-law to the reſt, perſuaded Debonaire, to caſt his Son Pepin out of Aquitaine; thereby to greaten Charls, which, after the death of his Son Pepin, he proſecuted to effect againſt his Grand-child bearing the ſame name. In the mean while, being invaded by his Son Loys of Bavier, he dies for grief.

Debonaire dead, Loys of Bavier, and Charles afterward, called the Bald, and their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, join in league againſt the Emperor Lothaire their eldeſt Brother. They fight near to Auxerre, the moſt bloudy battel that ever was ſtrucken in France; in which, the marvellous loſs of Nobility, and men of Warr, gave courage to the Saracens to invade Italy; to the Hunns to fall upon Almaine; and the Danes to enter upon Normandy. Charles the Bald by Treaſon ſeizeth upon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyſter; Carloman rebels againſt his Father, Charles the bald, the Father burns out the eys of his Son Carloman; Bavier invades the Emperor Lothaire, his Brother, Lothaire quits the Empire, he is aſſailed and wounded to the heart by his own conſcience, for his Rebellion againſt his Father, and for his other cruelties, and dies in a Monaſtery. Charls the bald the Uncle, oppreſſeth his Nephews, the Sons of Lothaire, he uſurpeth the Empire, to the prejudice of Loys of Bavier, his elder Brother; Bavier's Armies, and his Son Carloman, are beaten, he dies of grief, and the Uſurper Charles is poiſoned by Zedechias a Jew, his Phyſician, his Son Loys le Beque dies of the ſame drink. Beque had Charles the ſimple, and two Baſtards, Loys and Carloman; they rebel againſt their Brother, but the eldeſt breaks his neck, the younger is ſlain by a wild Boar; the Son of Bavier had the ſame ill deſtiny, and brake his neck by a fall out of a Window in ſporting with his companions.

Charls the groſs becomes Lord of all that the Sons of Debonaire held in Germany; where-with not contented, he invades Charles the ſimple; but being forſaken of his Nobility, of his Wife, and of his Underſtanding; he dies a diſtracted Beggar. Charles the ſimple is held in Wardſhip by Eudes, Major of the Palace, then by Robert, the Brother of Eudes; and laſtly, being taken by the Earl of Vermandois, he is forced to die in the priſon of Peron. Loys the Son of Charles the ſimple breaks his neck in chaſing a Wolf; and of the two Sons of this Loys, the one dies of poiſon, the other dies in the Priſon of Orleans; after whom, Hugh Capet, of another Race, and a ſtranger to the French, makes himſelf King.

Theſe miſerable ends had the Iſſues of Debonaire; who after he had once apparelled Injuſtice with authority, his Sons and Succeſſors took up the faſhion,, and wore that Garment ſo long without other proviſion, as when the ſame was torn from their ſhoulders, every man deſpiſed them as miſerable and naked Beggars. The wretched ſucceſs they had (ſaith a Learned French-man) ſhews, Que en ceſte mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la juſtice: That in the death of that Prince; to wit, of Bernard the Son of Pepin, the true Heir of Charlemain, men had more meddling than God or Juſtice had.

But to come nearer home; it is certain that Francis the Firſt, one of the Worthieſt Kings (except for that Fact) that ever the French-men had, did never enjoy himſelf, after he had commended the deſtruction of the Proteſtants of Mirandol, and Cabrieres, to the Parliament of Provence, which poor people were thereupon burnt and murthered; men, women, and children. It is true that the ſaid King Francis repented himſelf of the fact, and gave charge to Henry his Son, to do Juſtice upon the murtherers, threatning his Son with GOD'S Judgments, if he neglected it. But this unſeaſonable care of his, God was not pleaſed to accept for payment. For after Henry was ſlain in ſport by Montgomery, we all may remember what became of his four Sons, Francis, Charles, Henry, and Hercules. Of which, although three of them became Kings, and were maried to beautiful and vertuous Ladies; yet were they, one after another, caſt out of the World, without Stock or Seed. And notwithſtanding their ſubtilty, and breach of Faith; with all their Maſſacres upon thoſe of the Religion, and great effuſion of bloud, the Crown was ſet on his Head, whom they all laboured to diſſolve; the Proteſtants remain more in number than ever they were, and hold to this day more ſtrong Cities than ever they had.

Let us now ſee if God be not the ſame God in Spain as in England and France. Towards whom we will look no further back than to Don Pedro of Caſtile,; in reſpect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicil, our Richard the Third, and the great Evan Vaſilowick of Moſcovia, were but petty ones: this Caſtilian, of all the Chriſtian and Heathen Kings, having been the moſt mercileſs. For, beſides thoſe of his own Bloud and Nobility, which he had cauſed to be ſlain in his own Court and Chamber, as Sancho Ruis; the great Maſter of Calatrava, Ruis Gonſales, Alphonſo Tello, and Don John of Arragon, whom he cut in pieces, and caſt into the ſtreets, denying him Chriſtian burial: I ſay, beſides theſe, and the ſlaughter of Gomes Mauriques, Diego Peres, Alphonſo Gomes, and the great Commander of Caſtile; he made away the two Infants of Arragon his Couſin-Germans, his Brother Don Frederick, Don John de la Cerde, Albuquergues, Nugnes de Guzman, Cornel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, Guttiere his great Treaſurer, and all his Kinred; and a world of others. Neither did he ſpare his two youngeſt Brothers, innocent Princes, whom after he had kept in cloſe Priſon from their Cradles, till one of them had lived ſixteen years, and the other fourteen; he murthered them there. Nay, he ſpared not his Mother, nor his Wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Laſtly, as he cauſed the Arch-biſhop of Toledo, and the Dean to be killed, of purpoſe to enjoy their Treaſures; ſo did he put to death Mahomet Aben Alhamar, King of Barbary, with thirty ſeven of his Nobility, that came unto him for ſuccor, with a great ſumm of Money, to levy (by his favour) ſome Companies of Souldiers to return withall. Yea, he would needs aſſiſt the Hangman with his own hand, in the execution of the old King; in ſo much as Pope Urban declareth him an enemy both to God and Man. But what was his end? Having been formerly beaten out of his Kingdom, and re-eſtabliſhed by the valour of the Engliſh Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaſter; He was ſtabbed to death by his younger Brother, the Earl of Aſtramara, who diſpoſſeſſed all his Children of their Inheritance, which, but for their Fathers injuſtice and cruelty, had never been in danger of any ſuch thing. Hiſt of Spain.

If we can parallel any man with this King, it muſt be Duke John of Burgoign, who, after his trayterous murther of the Duke of Orleans, cauſed the Conſtable of Armagnac, the Chancellor of France, the Biſhops of Conſtance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reverend Church-men, the Earl of gran Pre, Hector of Chartes, and (in effect) all the Officers of Juſtice of the Chamber of Accompts, Treaſury, Requeſts (with ſixteen others to accompany them) to be ſuddenly and violently ſlain. Hereby, while he hoped to govern, and to have maſtered France; He was ſoon after ſtrucken with an Ax in the face, in the preſence of the Dauphin; and, without any leiſure to repent his miſdeeds, preſently ſlain. Theſe were the lovers of other mens miſeries; and miſeries found them out.

Now, for the Kings of Spain, which lived both with Henry the Seventh, Henry the Eighth, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon, was the firſt, and the firſt that laid the foundation of the preſent Auſtrian greatneſs. For this King did not content himſelf to hold Arragon by the uſurpation of his Anceſtor; and to faſten thereunto the Kingdom of Caſtile and Leon, which Iſabel his Wife held by ſtrong hand, and his aſſiſtance, from her own Neece, the Daughter of the laſt Henry; but moſt cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, he alſo caſt his own Neece out of the Kingdom of Navarre; and, contrary to Faith, and the Promiſe he made to reſtore it, fortified the beſt places, and ſo waſted the reſt, as there was no means left for any Army to invade it. This King, I ſay, that betrayed alſo Ferdinand and Frederick, Kings of Naples, Princes of his own Bloud, and by double alliance tied unto him; ſold them to the French; and with the ſame Army, ſent for their ſuccour under Gonſalvo, caſt them out; and ſhared their Kingdom with the French, whom afterwards he moſt ſhamefully betrayed. Fr. Rich invent. in anno 1418.

This wiſe and politick King, who ſold Heaven and his own Honour, to make his Son the Prince of Spain, the greateſt Monarch of the World; ſaw him die in the flower of his years; and his Wife great with child, with her untimely birth, at once and together buried. His eldeſt Daughter married unto Don Alphonſo Prince of Portugal, beheld her firſt Husband break his neck in her preſence; and being with child by her ſecond, died with it. A juſt Judgment of God upon the Race of Alphonſo, now wholly extinguiſhed; who had not onely left many diſconſolate Mothers in Portugal, by the ſlaughter of their children; but had formerly ſlain with his own hand, the Son and onely comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Dutcheſs of Viſeo. The ſecond Daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-Duke Philip, turned fool, and died mad, and deprived. His third Daughter, beſtowed on King Henry the Eighth, he ſaw caſt off by the King; the Mother of many troubles in England; and the Mother of a Daughter, that in her unhappy zeal, ſhed a world of innocent bloud; loſt Calice to the French; and died heart-broken without increaſe. To conclude, all thoſe Kingdoms of Ferdinand have maſters of a new name; and by a ſtrange Family are governed and poſſeſs'd.

Charls the Fifth, Son to the Arch-Duke Philip, in whoſe vain enterpriſes upon the French, upon the Almans and other Princes and States; ſo many multitudes of Chriſtian Souldiers, and renowned Captains were conſumed; who gave the while a moſt perillous entrance to the Turks, and ſuffered Rhodes, the Key of Chriſtendom, to be taken; was in concluſion chaſed out of France, and, in a ſort, out of Germany; and left to the French, Mentz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire, ſtole away from Inſpurg; and ſcaled the Alpes by torch-light, perſued by Duke Maurice; having hoped to ſwallow up all thoſe Dominions; wherein he concocted nothing, ſave his own diſgraces. And having after the ſlaughter of ſo many Millions of men, no one foot of ground in either, He crept into a Cloyſter, and made himſelf a Penſioner of an hundred thouſand Duckets by the year, to his Son Philip, from whom he very ſlowly received his mean and ordinary maintenance.

Nether. hiſt l. 7. fol. 313.

His Son again, King Philip the Second, not ſatisfied to hold Holland and Zeland, (wreſted by his Anceſtors from Jaqueline, their lawfull Princeſs) and to poſſeſs in peace many other Provinces of the Netherlands; perſuaded by that miſchievous Cardinal of Granvile, and other Romiſh Tyrants; not onely forgot the moſt remarkable ſervices, done to his Father the Emperor, by the Nobility of thoſe Countreys, not onely forgot the Preſent made him upon his entry of fourty Millions of Florens, called the Novaile aid; nor onely forgot that he had twice moſt ſolemnly ſworn to the General States, to maintain and preſerve their antient Rights, Privileges, and Cuſtoms, which they had enjoyed under their thirty and five Earls before him, Conditional Princes of thoſe Provinces: but beginning firſt to conſtrain them, and enthral them by the Spaniſh Inquiſition, and then to impoveriſh them by many new deviſed and intollerable Impoſitions, he laſtly, by ſtrong hand and main force, attempted to make himſelf not only an abſolute Monarch over them, like unto the Kings and Soveraigns of England and France; but Turk-like, to tread under his feet all their Natural and Fundamental Laws, Privileges, and antient Rights. To effect which, after he had eaſily obtain from the Pope a diſpenſation of his former Oaths (which Diſpenſation was the true cauſe of the Warr and Bloudſhed ſince then;) and after he had tried what he could perform, by dividing of their own Nobility, under the Government of his baſe Siſter, Margaret of Auſtria, and the Cardinal Granvile; He employed that moſt mercileſs Spaniard, Don Ferdinand Alvarez of Toledo, Duke of Alva, followed with a powerful Army of ſtrange Nations; by whom he firſt ſlaughtered that renowned Captain, the Earl of Egmont, Prince of Gavare; and Philip Montmorency Earl of Horn; made away Montigue, and the Marqueſs of Bergues, and cut off in thoſe ſix years (that Alva Governed) of Gentlemen and and others, eighteen thouſand and ſix hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, beſides all his other barbarous murthers and maſſacres. By whoſe miniſtery, when he could not yet bring his affairs to their wiſhed ends, having it in his hope to work that by ſubtilty which he had failed to perform by force, He ſent for Governour, his baſtard Brother, Don John of Auſtria; a Prince of great hope, and very gracious to thoſe people. But he, uſing the ſame Papal advantage that his Predeceſſors had done, make no ſcruple to take Oath upon the holy Evangeliſts, to obſerve the Treaty made with the General States; and to diſcharge the Low-Countreys of all Spaniards, and other ſtrangers therein garriſoned; Towards whoſe Pay and Paſſport, the Netherlands ſtrained themſelves to mak a payment of 600000. pounds. Which Moneys received, he ſuddenly ſurpriſed the Citadels of Antwerp and Nemures, not doubting (being unſuſpected by the States) to have poſſeſs'd himſelf of all the maſtering places of thoſe Provinces. For whatſoever he overtly pretended, he held in ſecret a contrary counſel with the Secretary Eſcovedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, and others, Miniſters of the Spaniſh Tyranny formerly practiſed, and now again intended. But let us now ſee the effect and end of this perjury, and of all other the Duke's cruelties. Firſt, for himſelf; after he had murthered ſo many of the Nobility; executed (as aforeſaid) eighteen thouſand ſix hundred in ſix years, and moſt cruelly ſlain Man, Woman, and Child in Mecklin, Zutphen, Narden, and other places; and after he had conſumed ſix and thirty Millions of treaſure in ſix years, notwithſtanding his Spaniſh vaunt, That he would ſuffocate the Holanders in their own Butter-barrels, and Milk-tubs; He departed the Countrey no otherwiſe accompanied, than with the curſe and deteſtation of the whole Nation; leaving His Majeſties Affairs in a ten-fold worſe eſtate than he found them at his firſt arrival. For Don John, whoſe haughty conceit of himſelf overcame the greateſt difficulties; though his judgment were over-weak to mannage the leaſt: What wonders did his fearful breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his Brothers jealouſie and diſtruſt, with the untimely death that ſeized on him, even in the flower of his youth? And for Eſcovedo his ſharp-witted Secretary, who in his own imagination had conquered for his Maſter, both England and the Netherlands; being ſent into Spain upon ſome new project, he was at the firſt arrival, and before any acceſs to the King, by certain Ruffians, appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warrant than his) rudely murthered in his own lodging. Laſtly, if we conſider the King of Spain's carriage, his counſel and ſucceſs in this buſineſs, there is nothing left to the memory of Man more remarkable. For he hath paid above an hundred Millions, and the lives of above four hundred thouſand Chriſtians, for the loſs of all thoſe Countreys, which, for beauty, gave place to none; and for revenue, did equal his Weſt-Indies; for the loſs of a Nation which moſt willingly obeyed him; and who, at this day, after fourty years Warr, are, in deſpight of all his forces, become a free Eſtate, and farr more rich and powerfull than they were, when he firſt began to impoveriſh and oppreſs them.

Oh! by what plots, by what for-ſwearings, betrayings, oppreſſions, impriſonments, tortures, poiſonings, and under what reaſons of State, and politick ſubtilty, have theſe fore-named Kings, both ſtrangers, and of our own Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD upon themſelves, upon theirs, and upon their prudent miniſters! and in the end, have brought thoſe things to paſs for their enemies, and ſeen an effect ſo directly contrary to all their own counſels and cruelties; as the one could never have hoped for themſelves; and the other never have ſucceeded; if no ſuch oppoſition had ever been made. GOD hath ſaid it, and performed it ever: Perdam ſapientiam ſapientum; I will deſtroy the wiſdom of the wiſe.

But what of all this? and to what end do we lay before the eyes of the living, the fall and fortunes of the dead; ſeeing the world is the ſame that it hath been; and the children of the preſent time, will ſtill obey their Parents? It is in the preſent time, that all the wits of the World are exerciſed. To hold the times we have, we hold all things lawfull; and either we hope to hold them for ever; or at leaſt we hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For, as we are content to forget our own experience, and to counterfeit the ignorance of our own knowledg, in all things that concern our ſelves; or perſuade our ſelves, that GOD hath given us Letters Patents to perſue all our irreligious affections, with a Non obſtante: ſo we neither look behind us what hath been, nor before us what ſhall be. It is true, that the quantity which we have, is of the body: we are by it joined to the earth; we are compounded of earth; and we inhabit it. The Heavens are high, farr off, and unſearchable; we have ſenſe and feeling of corporal things; and of eternal grace, but by revelation. No marvel then that our thoughts are alſo earthly; and it is leſs to be wondred at, that the words of worthleſs men cannot cleanſe them; ſeeing their doctrine and inſtruction, whoſe underſtanding the Holy Ghoſt vouchſafed to inhabit, have not performed it. For, as the Prophet Eſay cried out long agone, Lord, who hath believed our reports? And out of doubt, as Eſay complained then for himſelf and others: ſo are they leſs believed, every day after other. For, although Religion, and the truth thereof, be in every man's mouth, yea, in the diſcourſe of every woman, who, for the greateſt number are but Idols of Vanity; what is it other than an univerſal diſſimulation? We profeſs that we know GOD, but by works we deny him. For Beatitude doth not conſiſt in the knowledg of divine things, but in a divine life; for the Devils know them better than men. Beatitudo non eſt divinorum cognitio, ſed vita divina. And certainly, there is nothing more to be admired, and more to be lamented, than the private contention, the paſſionate diſpute, the perſonal hatred, and the perpetual warr, maſſacres, and murthers, for Religion among Chriſtians; the diſcourſe whereof hath ſo occupied the World, as it hath well near driven the practice thereof out of the World. Who would not ſoon reſolve, that took knowledg but of the religious diſputations among men, and not of their lives which diſpute, that there were no other thing in their deſires, than the purchace of Heaven; and that the World it ſelf were but uſed as it ought, and as an Inne, or place wherein to repoſe our ſelves in paſſing on towards our Celeſtial habitation? when on the contrary, beſides the Diſcourſe and outward profeſſion, the Soul hath nothing but hypocriſie. We are all (in effect) become Comædians in Religion; and while we act in geſture and voice, divine vertues, in all the courſe of our lives, we renounce our Perſons, and the parts we play. For Charity, Juſtice, and Truth, have but their being in tearms, like the Philoſophers Materia prima.

Paul to Titus, c. 1. v. 10.

Neither is it that wiſdom, which Solomon defineth to be the School-Miſtreſs of the Knowledg of God, that hath valuation in the World; it is enough that we give it our good word: but the ſame which is altogether exerciſed in the ſervice of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which we purchaſe and obtain honour, with the many reſpects which attend it. Theſe indeed be the marks, which (when we have bent our conſciences to the higheſt) we all ſhoot at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our own; the care our own in this life, the peril our own in the future; and yet, when we have gathered the greateſt abundance, we our ſelves enjoy no more thereof, than ſo much as belongs to one man. For the reſt, He that had the greateſt wiſdom, and the greateſt ability, that ever man had, hath told us, that this is the uſe: When goods increaſe (ſaith Solomon) they alſo increaſe that eat them; and what good cometh to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for thoſe that devour the reſt, and follow us in fair weather; they again forſake us in the firſt tempeſt of misfortune, and ſteer away before the Sea and Wind; leaving us to the malice of our deſtinies. Of theſe, among a thouſand Examples, I will take but one out of Maſter Dannet, and uſe his own words: Whileſt the Emperor Charles the Fifth, after the reſignation of his eſtates, ſtayed at Vloſhing for Wind, to carry him his laſt journey into Spain; He conferred on a time with Seldius, his Brother Ferdinand's Embaſſador, till the deep of the night. And when Seldius ſhould depart; the Emperor calling for ſome of his ſervants, and no body anſwering him, (for thoſe that attended upon him, were ſome gone to their lodgings, and all the reſt aſleep) the Emperor took up the Candle himſelf, and went before Seldius, to light him down the Stairs; and ſo did, notwithſtanding all the reſiſtance that Seldius could make. And when he was come to the Stairs foot, he ſaid thus unto him; Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperor, when he ſhall be dead and gone, That Him, whom thou haſt known in thy time environed with ſo many mighty Armies and Guards of Souldiers, thou haſt alſo ſeen alone, abandoned, and forſaken, yea, even of his own ſervants, &c.* I acknowledg this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of GOD, which I will by no means go about to withſtand. Eccleſ 5. 10.

But you will ſay, that there are ſome things elſe, and of greater regard than the former. The firſt is, the reverend reſpect that is held of Great Men, and the Honour done unto them by all ſorts of people. And it is true indeed: provided, that an inward love for their Juſtice and Piety, accompany the outward worſhip given to their places and power; without which, what is the applauſe of the Multitude, but as the out-cry of an Herd of Animals, who, without the knowledg of any true cauſe, pleaſe themſelves with the noiſe they make? For, ſeeing it is a thing exceeding rare to diſtinguiſh Virtue and Fortune; the moſt impious (if proſperous) have ever been applauded; the moſt vertuous (if unproſperous) have ever been deſpiſed. For, as Fortunes man rides the Horſe, ſo Fortune her ſelf rides the Man. Who, when he is deſcended, and on foot; the Man taken from his Beaſt, and Fortune from the Man; a baſe Groom beats the one, and a bitter contempt ſpurns at the other, with equal liberty.

The ſecond is, the greatning of our Poſterity, and the contemplation of their glory whom we leave behind us. Certainly, of thoſe which conceive that their Souls departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be ſaid of them, which Lactantius ſpake of certain Heathen Philoſophers; Quod ſapientes ſunt in re ſtulta. For, when our ſpirits immortal ſhall be once ſeparate from our mortal bodies, and diſpoſed by GOD; there remaineth in them no other joy of their Poſterity which ſucceed, than there doth of pride in that ſtone, which ſleepeth in the Wall of a King's Palace, nor any other ſorrow for their poverty, than there doth of Lact. de falſa ſap. l. 3 c. 29.

After which, and when we ſhall again receive Organs glorified, and incorruptible, the ſeats of Angelical affections; in ſo great admiration ſhall the Souls of the bleſſed be exerciſed, as they cannot admit the mixture of any ſecond or leſs joy; nor any return of forgone and mortal affection towards Friends, Kinred, or Children. Of whom, whether we ſhall retain any particular knowledg, or in any ſort diſtinguiſh them, no man can aſſure us; and the wiſeſt men doubt. But on the contrary; If a divine life retain any of thoſe faculties, which the Soul exerciſed in a mortal body; we ſhall not at that time ſo divide the joys of Heaven, as to caſt any part thereof on the memory of their felicities which remain in the World. No, be their eſtates greater than ever the World gave, we ſhall (by the difference known unto us) even deteſt their conſideration. And whatſoever comfort ſhall remain of all forepaſt, the ſame will conſiſt in the charity, which we exerciſed living: and in that Piety, Juſtice, and firm Faith, for which it pleaſed the Infinite Mercy of God to accept of us, and receive us. Shall we therefore value honour and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as unneceſſary and vain? Certainly, no. For that Infinite Wiſdom of God, which hath diſtinguiſhed his Angels by degrees; which hath given greater and leſs light and beauty to heavenly bodies; which hath made differences between Beaſts and Birds; created the Eagle, and the Flie, the Cedar, and the Shrub; and among Stones, given the faireſt tincture to the Ruby, and quickeſt light to the Diamond; hath alſo ordained Kings, Dukes, or Leaders of the people; Magiſtrates, Judges, and other degrees among men. out of other mens ruines. For, as Plato doth first preferr the perfection of bodily health; secondly, the form and beauty; and thirdly, Divitias nulla fraude quæsitas: so Jeremy cries, Wo unto them that erect their houses by unrighteousnes, and their chambers without equity; And Esay the same, Wo to those that spoil, and were not spoiled. And it was out of the true wisdom of Solomon, that he commandeth us, not to drink the Wine of violence; not to lie in wait for bloud; and not to swallow them up alive, whose riches we covet; for such are the ways (saith he) of every one that is greedy of gain.

Plat. de leg 1. 2. 6. & in Georgeo. Jer. 22. 13. Esay 33. Prov 1. 18. 12. Prov. 23. 1, 2, 3, 8, 9. & 25. 4, 8.

And, if we could afford our selves but so much leisure, as to consider, That he which hath most in this world, hath, in respect of the world, nothing in it; and that he which hath the longest time lent him to live in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, setting it either by that which is past, when we were not, or by that time which is to come, in which we shall abide for ever; I say, if both, to wit, our proportion in the World, and our time in the World, differ not much from that which is nothing, it is not out of any excellency of understanding, that we so much prise the one, which hath (in effect) no being; and so much neglect the other, which hath no ending; coveting those mortal things of the World, as if our Souls were therein immortal, and neglecting those things which are immortal, as if our selves, after the World, were but mortal.

But let every man value his own wisdom, as he pleaseth. Let the rich man think all fools, that cannot equal his abundance; the Revenger esteem all negligent, that have not troden down their opposites; the Politician all gross, that cannot Merchandize their faith: Yet, when we once come in sight of the Port of death, to which all winds drive us, and when, by letting fall that fatal Anchor, which can never be weighed again, the navigation of this life takes end; Then it is, I say, that our own cogitations (those sad and severe cogitations, formerly beaten from us by our Health and Felicity) return again, and pay us to the uttermost for all the pleasing passages of our lives past. It is then that we cry out to God for mercy; then, when our selves can no longer exercise cruelty to others; and it is onely then, that we are strucken through the Soul with this terrible Sentence, That God will not be mocked. For if, according to S. Peter, The righteous scarcely be saved: and that God spared not his Angels; where shall those appear, who, having served their appetites all their lives, presume to think, that the severe Commandments of the All-powerfull God were given but in sport; and that the short breath, which we draw when death presseth us, if we can but fashion it to the sound of Mercy (without any kind of satisfaction or amends) is sufficient? O quam multi, saith a reverend Father, cum hac spe ad æternos labores & bella descendunt! I confess, that it is a great comfort to our friends, to have it said, That we ended well; for we all desire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But, what shall we call a dis-esteeming, an opposing, or (indeed) a mocking of God; if those men do not oppose him, dis-esteem him, and mock him, that think it enough for God, to ask him forgiveness at leisure, with the remainder and last drawing of a malicious breath? For, what do they otherwise, that die this kind of well-dying, but say unto God, as followeth? We beseech thee, O God, that all the falshoods, forswearings, and treacheries of our lives past, may be pleasing unto thee; that thou wilt for our sakes (that have had no leisure to do any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impossible) and forget to be a just God; that thou wilt love injuries and oppreſſions, call ambition wiſdom, and charity fooliſhneſs. For I ſhall prejudice my Son (which I am reſolved not to do) if I make reſtitution; and confeſs my ſelf to have been unjuſt (which I am too proud to do) if I deliver the oppreſſed. Certainly, theſe wiſe worldlings have either found out a new God, or made One; and in all likelihood, ſuch a Leaden One, as Lewis the Eleventh ware in his Cap; which, when he had cauſed any that he feared or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head, and kiſs it; beſeeching it to pardon him this one evil act more, and it ſhould be the laſt; which (as at other times) he did, when, by the practice of a Cardinal, and a falſified Sacrament, he cauſed the Earl of Armagnac to be ſtabbed to death; mockeries indeed, fit to be uſed towards a Leaden, but not towards the Everliving GOD. But of this compoſition are all devout lovers of the World, that they fear all that is dureleſs and ridiculous; they fear the plots and practices of their oppoſites, and their very whiſperings; they fear the Opinions of men, which beat but upon ſhadows; they flatter and forſake the proſperous and unproſperous, be they Friends or Kings; yea, they dive under water, like Ducks, at every pebble-ſtone, that is but thrown towards them by a powerful hand; and on the contrary, they ſhew an obſtinate and Giant-like valour againſt the terrible judgments of the All-powerfull God; yea, they ſhew themſelves Gods againſt God, and Slaves towards men; towards men, whoſe bodies and conſciences are alike rotten.

Now, for the reſt; If we truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate; and of the poor and oppreſſed, whom we accompt wretched; we ſhall find the hapineſs of the one, and the miſerable eſtate of the other, ſo tied by God to the very inſtant, and both ſo ſubject to enterchange (witneſs the ſudden downfall of the greateſt Princes, and the ſpeedieſt upriſing of the meaneſt perſons) as the one hath nothing ſo certain, whereof to boaſt; nor the other ſo uncertain, whereof to bewail it ſelf. For, there is no man ſo aſſured of his honour, of his riches, health, or life; but that he may be deprived of either, or all, the very next hour, or day to come. Quid veſper vehat, incertum eſt; What the evening will bring with it, it is uncertain. And yet ye cannot tell (ſaith S. James) what ſhall be to morrow. To day he is ſet up, and to morrow he ſhall not be found; for he is turned into duſt, and his purpoſe periſheth. And although the air which compaſſeth adverſity, be very obſcure; yet therein we better diſcern God, than in that ſhining light which enviroueth worldly glory; through which, for the clearneſs thereof, there is no vanity which eſcapeth our ſight. And let adverſity ſeem what it will; to happy men ridiculous, who make themſelves merry at other mens misfortunes; and to thoſe under the croſs, grievous: yet this is true, That for all that is paſt, to the very inſtant, the portions remaining are equal to either. For, be it that we have lived many years, and (according to Solomon) in them all we have rejoyced; or be it that we have meaſured the ſame length of days, and therein have evermore ſorrowed; yet, looking back from our preſent being, we find both the one and the other; to wit, the joy and wo, ſailed out of ſight; and death, which doth perſue us, and hold us in chace, from our infancy, hath gathered it. Quicquid ætatis retro eſt, mors tenet; Whatſoever of our age is paſt, death holds it. So, as whoſoever he be, to whom Fortune hath been a ſervant, and the Time a friend; let him but take the accompt of his memory (for we have no other keeper of our pleaſures paſt) and truly examine what he hath reſerved, either of Beauty and Youth, or fore-gone delights; what it hath ſaved, that it might laſt, of his deareſt affections, or of whatever elſe the amorous Spring-time gave his thoughts of contentment, then unvaluable; and he ſhall find that all the Art which his elder years have, can draw no other vapour out of theſe diſſolutions, than heavy, ſecret, and ſad ſighs. He ſhall find nothing remaining, but thoſe ſorrows, which grow up after our faſt-ſpringing youth, over-take it, when it is at a ſtand; and over-top it utterly, when it begins to wither; in ſo much as looking back from the very inſtant time, and from our now being, the poor, diſeaſed, and captive creature, hath as little ſenſe of all his former miſeries and pains, as he, that is moſt bleſs'd in common Opinion, hath of his fore-paſſed pleaſure and delights. For whatſoever is caſt behind us, is juſt nothing; and what is to come, deceitfull hope hath it: Omnia quæ eventura ſunt, in incerto jacent. Onely thoſe few black Swans I muſt except; who, having had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their own price; do, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well-acted life, behold death without dread, and the grave without fear, and embrace both, as neceſſary guides to endleſs glory.

For my ſelf, this is my conſolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the ſorrows of this life are but of two ſorts; whereof the one hath reſpect to GOD; the other to the World. In the firſt, we complain to GOD againſt our ſelves, for our offences againſt him; and confeſs, Et tu juſtus es in omnibus quæ venerunt ſuper nos; And thou, O Lord, art juſt in all that hath befallen us. In the ſecond, we complain to our ſelves againſt GOD; as if he had done us wrong, either in not giving us worldly goods and honours, anſwering our appetites; or for taking them from us having had them; forgetting that humble and juſt acknowledgment of Job, The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken. To the firſt of which, S. Paul hath promiſed bleſſedneſs; to the ſecond, death. And out of doubt, he is either a fool, or ingrateful to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledg, how mean ſoever his eſtate be, that the ſame is yet farr greater, than that which God oweth him; or doth not aknowledg, how ſharp ſoever his afflictions be, that the ſame are yet farr leſs, than thoſe which are due unto him. And if an Heathen wiſe man call the adverſities of the World but tributa vivendi; the tributes of living: a wiſe Chriſtian man ought to know them, and bear them as the tributes of offending. He ought to bear them man-like, and reſolvedly, and not as thoſe whining Souldiers do, Qui gementes ſequuntur Imperatorem.

For ſeeing God, who is the Author of all our Tragedies, hath written out for us, and appointed us all the parts we are to play; and hath not, in their diſtribution, been partial to the moſt mighty Princes of the World; That gave unto Darius the part of the greateſt Emperor, and the part of the moſt miſerable Beggar; a Beggar, begging Water of an Enemy to quench the great drought of death; That appointed Bajazet to play the Grand Seignior of the Turks in the morning, and in the ſame day, the Footſtool of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerian had alſo played, being taken by Sapores) that made Belliſarius play the moſt victorious Captain, and laſtly, the part of a blind Beggar; of which, examples of many thouſands may be produced: why ſhould other men, who are but as the leaſt Worms, complain of wrongs? Certainly, there is no other accompt to be made of this ridiculous World, than to reſolve, That the change of Fortune on the great Theatre, is but as the change of Garments on the leſs. For, when on the one and the other, every man wears but his own skin, the Players are all alike. Now, if any man out of weakneſs priſe the paſſages of this world otherwiſe (for, ſaith Petrarch, Magni ingenii eſt revocare mentem a ſenſibus) it is by reaſon of that unhappy fantaſie of ours, which forgeth in the brains of Man all the miſeries (the corporal excepted) whereunto he is ſubject. Therein it is, that Misfortune and Adverſity work all that they work. For, ſeeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, whatſoever Fortune or Force takes from any one; it were a fooliſh madneſs in the ſhipwrack of worldly things, where all ſinks but the Sorrow, to ſave it. That were, as Seneca ſaith, Fortunæ ſuccumbere, quod triſtius eſt omni fato; To fall under Fortune, of all other, the moſt miſerable deſtiny.

But it is now time to ſound a retreat, and to deſire to be excuſed of this long perſuit; and withall, that the good intent, which hath moved me to draw the Picture of time paſt (which we call Hiſtory) in ſo large a Table, may alſo be accepted in place of a better reaſon.

The examples of divine Providence, every where found (the firſt divine Hiſtories being nothing elſe but a continuation of ſuch examples) have perſuaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things; to wit, Creation. For, though theſe two glorious actions of the Almighty be ſo near, and (as it were) linked together, that the one neceſſarily implieth the other; Creation inferring Providence (for what father forſaketh the child that he hath begotten?) and Providence preſuppoſing Creation; Yet many of thoſe that have ſeemed to excel in worldly wiſdom, have gone about to diſ-join this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation and Providence, but granting that the World had a beginning; the Ariſtotelian granting Providence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now, although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for, by Faith, we underſtand that the World was made by the Word of God) be too weighty a work for Ariſtotle's rotten ground to bear up, upon which he hath (notwithſtanding) founded the Defences and Fortreſſes of all his Verbal Doctrine; yet that the neceſſity of Infinite power, and the World's beginning, and the impoſſibility of the contrary, even in the judgment of Natural reaſon, wherein he believed, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be marvelled at. And it is no leſs ſtrange, that thoſe men which are deſirous of knowledg (ſeeing Ariſtotle hath failed in this main point; and taught little other than tearms in the reſt) have ſo retrench'd their minds from the following and overtaking of Truth, and ſo abſolutely ſubjected themſeves to the law of thoſe Philoſophical Principles; as all contrary kind of teaching, in the ſearch of cauſes, they have condemned, either for phantaſtical, or curious. But doth it follow, that the Poſitions of Heathen Philoſophers are undoubtedly Grounds and Principles indeed, becauſe ſo called? Or, that ipſi dixerunt, doth make them to be ſuch? Certainly no. But this is true, That where natural reaſon hath built any thing ſo ſtrong againſt it ſelf, as the ſame reaſon can hardly aſſail it, much leſs batter it down: the ſame in every queſtion of Nature, and infinite power, may be approved for a fundamental Law of humane knowledg. For, ſaith Charron, in his Book of Wiſdom, Tout propoſition humaine a autant d' authorite quel' autre, ſi la raiſon n' on fait la difference; Every humane propoſition hath equal authority, if reaſon make not a difference: the reſt, being but the Fables of Principles. But hereof, how ſhall the upright and impartial judg-

And, to this purpoſe, it was well ſaid of Lactantius, Sapientiam ſibi adimunt, qui ſine ullo judicio inventa majorum probant, & ab aliis pecudum more ducuntur; They neglect their own wiſdom, who without any judgment approve the invention of thoſe that fore-went them; and ſuffer themſelves, after the manner of Beaſts, to be led by them. By the advantage of which ſloth and dulneſs, ignorance is now become ſo powerfull a Tyrant, as it hath ſet true Philoſophy, Phyſick and Divinity in a Pillory; and written over the firſt, Contra negantem principia; over the ſecond, Virtus ſpecifica; and over the third, Eccleſia Romana. *Lact de orig. But for my ſelf, I ſhall never be perſuaded, that God hath ſhut up all the light of Learning within the Lanthorn of Ariſtotle's brains; or, that it was ever ſaid unto him, as unto Eſdras, Accendam in corde tuo Lucernam intellectus; That God hath given invention but to the Heathen, and that they onely invaded Nature, and found the ſtrength and bottom thereof; the ſame Nature having conſumed all her ſtore, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That theſe, and theſe, be the cauſes of theſe and theſe effects, Time hath taught us; and not Reaſon; and ſo hath Experience without Art. The Cheeſ-wife knoweth it as well as the Philoſopher, that ſowre Rennet doth coagulate her Milk into a Curd. But, if we ask a reaſon of this cauſe, why the ſowreneſs doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I think that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philoſophy, to ſatisfie this, and many other like vulgar queſtions. But man, to cover his ignorance in the leaſt things, who cannot give a true reaſon for the Graſs under his feet, why it ſhould be green rather than red, or of any other colour; that could never yet diſcover the way and reaſon of Nature's working, in thoſe which are farr leſs noble Creatures than himſelf; who is farr more noble than the Heavens themſelves: Man (ſaith Solomon) that can hardly diſcern the things that are upon the Earth, and with great labour find out the things that are before us; that hath ſo ſhort a time in the World, as he no ſooner begins to learn, than to die; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledg; in his underſtanding nothing truly; that is ignorant of the Eſſence of his own Soul, and which the wiſeſt of the Naturaliſts (if Ariſtotle be he) could never ſo much as define, but by the Action and Effect, telling us what it works (which all men know as well as he) but not what it is, which neither he, nor any elſe doth know, but GOD that created it (For though I were perfect, yet I know not my Soul, ſaith Job.) Man, I ſay, that is but an Idiot in the next cauſe of his own life, and in the cauſe of all actions of his life: will (notwithſtanding) examine the Art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD, who (ſaith Job) is ſo excellent as we know him not; and examine the beginning of the work, which had end before Mankind had a beginning of being. He will diſable God's power to make a World, without matter to make it of. He will rather give the Motes of the Air for a cauſe; caſt the work on neceſſity or chance; beſtow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of Form; and laſtly, for want of a work-man, have it Eternal; which latter Opinion Ariſtotle, to make himſelf the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World; and his Sectators have maintained it; Parati ac conjurati, quos ſequuntur Philoſophorum animis invictis opiniones tueri. For Hermes, who lived at once with, or ſoon after Moſes, *Wiſd. 1. 9. Lact. 5. Opinions (ſaith Lactantius) though uncertain, come to this; That they agree upon one Providence, whether the ſame be Nature, or Light, or Reaſon, or Underſtanding, or Deſtiny, or divine Ordinance, that it is the ſame which we call GOD. Certainly, as all the Rivers in the World, though they have divers riſings, and divers runnings; though they ſometimes hide themſelves for a while under ground, and ſeem to be loſt in Sea-like Lakes; do at laſt find, and fall into, the great Ocean: ſo after all the ſearches that humane capacity hath; and after all Philoſophical contemplation and curioſity, in the neceſſity of this Infinite power, all the reaſon of Man ends and diſſolves it ſelf.

As for others: and firſt touching thoſe which conceive the matter of the World to have been eternal, and, that God did not create the World, ex nihilo, but ex materia præexiſtente; the Suppoſition is ſo weak, as is hardly worth the anſwering. For (ſaith Euſebius) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annectere; They ſeem un-Euſeb. de præp. Evang. l 7. c. 8. to me, which affirm this, to give part of the work to God, and part to Fortune; in ſo much as if God had not found this firſt matter by chance, He had never been Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the Univerſal. For, were the Matter or Chaos eternal; it then follows, That either this ſuppoſed Matter did fit it ſelf to God, or God accommodate himſelf to the matter. For the firſt; it is impoſſible, that things without ſenſe could proportion themſelves to the Work-mans Will. For the ſecond; it were horrible to conceive of God, That as an Artificer he applied himſelf, according to the proportion of matter which he lighted upon.

But let it be ſuppoſed, That this matter hath been made by any Power, not Omnipotent, and infinitely wiſe; I would gladly learn how it came to paſs, that the ſame was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent, and infinitely wiſe; and no more, nor no leſs, than ſerved to receive the form of the Univerſal. For, had it wanted any thing of what was ſufficient; then muſt it be granted, That God created out of nothing ſo much of new matter, as ſerved to finiſh the work of the World: Or, had there been more of this matter than ſufficed, then God did diſſolve and annihilate whatſoever remained and was ſuperfluous. And this muſt every reaſonable Soul confeſs, That it is the ſame work of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing, And by the ſame Art and Power, and by none other, can thoſe things, or any part of that eternal matter, be again changed into Nothing; by which thoſe things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Again, to ſay that this matter was the cauſe of it ſelf; this, of all other, were the greateſt Idiotiſm. For, if it were the cauſe of it ſelf at any time; then there was alſo a time when it ſelf was not; at which time of not being, it is eaſie enough to conceive, that it could neither procure it ſelf, nor any thing elſe. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impoſſible. Nihil autem ſeipſum præcedit, neque ſeipſum componit corpus; There is nothing that doth precede it ſelf, neither do bodies compound themſelves.

For the reſt, Thoſe that feign this matter to be eternal, muſt of neceſſity confeſs, that Infinite cannot be ſeparate from Eternity. And then had infinite matter left no place for infinite form; but that the firſt matter was finite, the form which it received proves it. For concluſion of this part, whoſoever will make choice, rather to believe in eternal deformity, or in eternal dead matter, than in eternal light, and eternal life; let eternal death be his reward. For, it is a madneſs of that kind, as wanteth terms to expreſs it. For what reaſon of man (whom the curſe of preſumption hath not ſtupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of ſhadow; quia comprehenſio eſt intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it ſelf, either for matter or form; yea, for as many worlds (if ſuch had been Gods will) as the Sea hath ſands? For where the power is without limitation, the work hath no other limitation than the workman's will. Yea, Reaſon it ſelf finds it more eaſie for Infinite power, to deliver from it ſelf a finite world, without the help of matter prepared; than for a finite man, a fool and duſt, to change the form of matter made to his hands. They are Dioniſius his words; Deus in una exiſtentia omnia præhabet; and again, Eſſe omnium eſt ipſa Divinitas, omne quod vides, & quod non vides; to wit, cauſaliter, or in better terms, non tanquam forma, ſed tanquam cauſa univerſalis. Neither hath the World Univerſal cloſed up all of GOD: For the moſt part of his works (ſaith Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his Wiſdom be opened by the glorious work of the World; which never brought to knowledg all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And hereof it comes, That we ſeldom entitle GOD The All-ſhewing, or The All-willing; but the Almighty, that is, infinitely able. Cap. 16 v. 21.

But now for thoſe, who from that ground, That out of nothing, nothing is made, inferr the Worlds eternity; and yet not ſo ſalvage therein, as thoſe are, which give an eternal being to dead matter: It is true, if the word [Nothing] be taken in the affirmative; and the making, impoſed upon Natural Agents and finite power; That out of nothing, nothing is made. But ſeeing their great Doctor, Ariſtotle himſelf confeſſeth, Quod omnes Antiqui decreverunt quaſi quoddam rerum principium, ipſumque infinitum: That all the Antient decree a kind of beginning, and the ſame to be infinite; and a little after, more largely, and plainly, Principium ejus eſt nullum, ſed ipſum omnium cernitur eſſe principium, ac omni complecti ac regere: it is ſtrange, that this Philoſopher, with his followers, ſhould rather make choice out of falſhood, to conclude falſly; than out of truth, to reſolve truly. For, if we compare the World Univerſal, and all the unmeaſureable Orbs of Heaven, and thoſe marvellous bodies of the Sun, Moon, and Starrs, with ipſum Infinitum, it may truly be ſaid of them all, which himſelf affirms of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therefore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui deſtruit omnen proportionem) is no wonder in Gods power. And therefore, Anaximander, Meliſſus, and Empedocles, call the World Univerſal, but particulam Univerſitatis & infinitatis; a parcel of that which is the Univerſality, and the Infinity it ſelf: And Plato, but a ſhadow Stanc Eng l 3. c. 9. ex Ar ſt. of God. But the other, to prove the World's eternity, urgeth this Maxime, That, A ſufficient and effectual cauſe being granted, an anſwerable effect thereof is alſo granted. Inferring, that God being for ever a ſufficient and effectual cauſe of the World, the effect of the cauſe ſhould alſo have been for ever; to wit, the World univerſal. But what a ſtrange mockery is this in ſo great a Maſter, to confeſs a ſufficient and effectual cauſe of the World (to wit, an Almighty God) in his Antecedent; and the ſame God to be a God reſtrained in his Concluſion; to make God free in power, and bound in will; able to effect, unable to determine; able to make all things, and yet unable to make choice of the time when? For this were impiouſly to reſolve of God, as of natural neceſſity; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor underſtanding; which cannot but work, matter being preſent: As Fire, to burn things combuſtible. Again, he thus diſputeth, That every Agent which can work, and doth not work, if it afterward work, it is either thereto moved by it ſelf, or by ſomewhat elſe; and ſo it paſſeth from power to act: But God (ſaith he) is immovable, and is neither moved by himſelf, nor by any other; but being always the ſame, doth always work. Whence he concludeth, If the World were cauſed by God, that he was for ever the cauſe thereof; and therefore eternal. The anſwer to this is very eaſie; For that God's performing in due time that, which he ever determined at length to perform, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather conſtancy in him. For the ſame action of his will, which made the World for ever, did alſo with-hold the effect to the time ordained. To this anſwer, in it ſelf ſufficient, others add further, that the Pattern or Image of the World may be ſaid to be eternal; which the Platonicks call Spiritualem mundum; and do in this ſort diſtinguiſh the Idæa and Creation in time. Spiritualis eſt mundus, mundi hujus exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vita æquali eſt Architecto, fuit ſemper cum illo, eritque ſemper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod ſecundum opus eſt Dei, decedit jam ab opifice ex parte una, quia non fuit ſemper; retinet alteram, quia ſit ſemper futurus: That repreſentative, or the intentional word (ſay they) the ſamplar of this viſible world, the firſt work of GOD, was equally antient with the Architect; for it was for ever with him, and ever ſhall be. This material world, the ſecond work or creature of GOD, doth differ from the Worker in this; that it was not from everlaſting, and in this it doth agree, that it ſhall be for ever to come; The firſt point, That it was not for ever, all Chriſtians confeſs: The other they underſtand no otherwiſe, than that after the conſummation of this world, there ſhall be a new Heaven, and a new Earth, without any new creation of matter. But of theſe things we need not here ſtand to argue; though ſuch opinions be not unworthy the propounding, in this conſideration, of an eternal and unchangeable cauſe, producing a changeable and temporal effect; Touching which point, Proclus the Platoniſt diſputeth, That the compounded Eſſence of the World (and becauſe compounded, therefore diſſipable) is continued, and knit to the Divine Being, by an individual and inſeparable power, flowing from Divine unity; and that the World's natural appetite of God ſheweth, that the ſame proceedeth from a good and underſtanding divine; and that this vertue, by which the World is continued and knit together, muſt be infinite, that it may infinitely and everlaſtingly continue and preſerve the ſame. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (ſaith he) is not capable of, but receiveth it from the divine infinite, according to the tempo- ral Nature it hath, ſucceſſively every moment by little and little; even as the whole material World is not altogether; but the aboliſhed parts are departed by ſmall degrees, and the parts yet to come, do by the ſame ſmall degrees ſucceed, as the ſhadow of a tree in a River, ſeemeth to have continued the ſame a long time in the Water, but it is perpetually renewed in the continual ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to return to them, which denying that ever the World had any beginning, withall deny that ever it ſhall have any end, and to this purpoſe affirm, That it was never heard, never read, never ſeen, no, not by any reaſon perceived, that the Heavens have ever ſuffered corruption; or that they appear any way the older by continuance; or in any ſort otherwiſe than they were; which had they been ſubject to final corruption, ſome change would have been diſcerned in ſo long a time. To this it is anſwered, That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather prove their newneſs, and that they have not continued ſo long, than that they will continue for ever as they are. And if conjectural arguments may receive anſwer by conjectures; it then ſeemeth, that ſome alteration may be found. For either Ariſtotle, Pliny, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were groſsly miſtaken; or elſe thoſe parts of the World, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reaſon of the Sun's heat, neither were the Seas under the Equinoctial navigable. But we know by experience, that thoſe Regions ſo ſituate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, over which we navigate, paſſable enough. We read alſo many Hiſtories of Deluges; and how that in the time of Phaeton, divers places in the World were burnt up, by the Sun's violent heat.

But in a word, this Obſervation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certain, That Stone-walls, of matter moldring and friable, have ſtood two or three thouſand years; that many things have been digged up out of the Earth, of that depth, as ſuppoſed to have been buried by the general Flood; without any alteration, either of ſubſtance or figure; yea, it is believed, and it is very probable, that the Gold which is daily found in Mines and Rocks, under ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldeſt times have not invaded and corrupted; what great alterations ſhould we look for in Celeſtial and Quinteſſential bodies? And yet we have reaſon to think, that the Sun, by whoſe help all creatures are generate, doth not in theſe later Ages aſſiſt Nature, as heretofore. We have neither Giants, ſuch as the eldeſt World had, nor Mighty Men, ſuch as the elder World had; but all things in general are reputed of leſs vertue which from the Heavens receive vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface would permit a larger Diſcourſe, we might eaſily fetch ſtore of proof; as that this World ſhall at length have end, as that once it had beginning.

And I ſee no good Anſwer that can be to this Objection: If the World were eternal; why not all things in the World eternal? If there were no firſt, no Cauſe, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehenſible Wiſdom, but that every Nature had been alike eternal; and Man more rational than every other Nature; Why had not the eternal reaſon of Man, provided for his eternal Being in the World? For, if all were equal, why not equal conditions to all? Why ſhould Heavenly bodies live for ever, and the bodies of Men rot and die?

Again, who was it that appointed the Earth to keep the Centre, and gave order that it ſhould hang in the Air; that the Sun ſhould travel between the Tropicks, and never exceed thoſe bounds, nor fail to perform that Progreſs once in every year; the Moon to live by borrowed light; the fixed Starrs (according to common opinion) to be faſtned like nails in a Cart-wheel; and the Planets to wander at their pleaſure? Or, if none of theſe had power over other; was it out of Charity and Love, that the Sun by his perpetual travel within thoſe two Circles, hath viſited, given light unto, and relieved all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turns and times? Out of doubt, if the Sun have of his own accord kept this courſe in all eternity; He may juſtly be called eternal Charity, and everlaſting Love. The ſame may be ſaid of all the Starrs, who being all of them moſt large and clear fountains of vertue and operation, may alſo be called eternal Vertues; the Earth may be called eternal Patience; the Moon, an eternal Borrower, and Beggar; and Man, of all other the moſt miſerable, eternally Mortal. And what were this, but to believe again in the old Play of the gods? Yea, in more gods by Millions, than ever Heſiodus dream'd of. But in ſtead of this mad folly, we ſee it well enough with our feeble and mortal eyes: and the eyes of our reaſon diſcern it better; That the Sun, Moon, Starrs, and the Earth, are limited, bounded, and conſtrained; themſelves they have not conſtrained, nor could. Omne determinatum cauſam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinaverit; Every thing hath ſome efficient cauſe, by which it is bounded.

Now, for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the School of Ariſtotle hath both commended many errors unto us, and ſought alſo thereby to obſcure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, ſhining in the Creation, and in the governing of the World; ſo if the beſt definition be taken out of the ſecond of Ariſtotle's Phyſicks, or primo de Cœlo, or out of the fifth of his Metaphyſicks, I ſay, that the beſt is but nominal, and ſerving onely to difference the beginning of Natural motion from Artificial: which yet the Academicks open better; when they call it, A Seminary ſtrength, infuſed into matter by the Soul of the World; who give the firſt place to Providence, the ſecond to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Providentia (by which they underſtand GOD) Dux & Caput; Fatum, medium ex providentia prodiens; Natura poſtremum. But be it what he will, or be it any of theſe (God excepted) or participating of all; yet that it hath choice or underſtanding (both which are neceſſarily in the cauſe of all things) no man hath avowed. For this is unanſwerable of Lactantius, Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut ſcientiam; He onely can be ſaid to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledg in the doing it.

Ficin. de Plat. But the will and ſcience of Nature, are in theſe words truly expreſs'd by Ficinus: Poteſt ubique Natura, vel per diverſa media, vel ex diverſis materiis, diverſa facere; ſublata vero mediorum materiarumque diverſitate, vel unicum, vel ſimilimum operatur, neque poteſt quando adeſt materia non operari; It is the power of Nature by diverſity of means, or out of diverſity of matter, to produce divers things: but taking away the diverſity of means, and the diverſity of matter, it then works but one or the like work; neither can it but work, matter being preſent. Now, if Nature made choice of diverſity of matter, to work all theſe variable works of Heaven and Earth, it had then both underſtanding and will; it had counſel to begin; reaſon to

diſpoſe; vertue and knowledg to finiſh, and power to govern; without which, all things had been but one and the ſame; all of the matter of Heaven; or all of the matter of Earth. And, if we grant Nature this will, and this underſtanding, this counſel, this reaſon, and power; Cur natura potius quam Deus nominetur? Why ſhould we then call ſuch a cauſe rather Nature, than God? God, of whom all men have notion, and give the firſt and higheſt place to divine power: Omnes homines notionem deorum habent, omneſque ſummum locum divino cuidam numini aſſignant. And this I ſay, in ſhort, that it is a true effect of true reaſon in man (were there no authority more binding than reaſon) to acknowledg and adore the firſt and moſt ſublime power. Vera Philoſophia, eſt aſcenſus ab his quæ fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere ſunt, & ſemper eadem: True Philoſophy is an aſcending from the things which flow, and riſe, and fall, to the things that are for ever the ſame.

Lact. de ira Dei l. 1. c. 10.

For the reſt; I do alſo account it not the meaneſt, but an impiety, monſtrous, to confound God and Nature; be it but in tearms. For it is God, that onely diſpoſeth of all things according to his own will, and maketh of one Earth, veſſels of honour and diſhonour: It is Nature that can diſpoſe of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God that commandeth all; it is Nature that is obedient to all. It is God that doth good unto all, knowing and loving the good he doth. It is Nature that ſecondarily doth alſo good, but it neither knoweth, nor loveth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himſelf; Nature nothing in it ſelf. It is God which is the Father, and hath begotten all things; it is Nature which is begotten by all things, in which it liveth and laboureth; for by it ſelf it exiſteth not. For, ſhall we ſay, that it is out of affection to the Earth, that heavy things fall towards it? Shall we call it Reaſon, which doth conduct every River into the ſalt Sea? Shall we tearm it knowledg in Fire, that makes it to conſume combuſtible matter? If it be Affection, Reaſon, and Knowledg in theſe; by the ſame Affection, Reaſon, and Knowledg it is, that Nature worketh. And therefore, ſeeing all things work as they do (call it by Form, or Nature, or by what you pleaſe) yet, becauſe they work by an impulſion, which they cannot reſiſt; or by a faculty, infuſed by the ſupremeſt power; we are neither to wonder at, nor to worſhip, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lies the wonder; and to him is the worſhip due, who hath created ſuch a Nature in things, and ſuch a faculty, as neither knowing it ſelf, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath; doth yet work all things to their laſt and uttermoſt perfection. And therefore every reaſonable man, taking to himſelf for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all men truly learned that ever the World had, to wit; That there is a power Infinite, and eternal (which alſo neceſsity doth prove unto us, without the help of Faith and Reaſon; without the force of Authority) all things do as eaſily follow which have been delivered by divine Letters, as the waters of a running River do ſucceſſively perſue each other from the firſt fountains.

Thus much, I ſay, it is, that Reaſon it ſelf hath taught us; and this is the beginning of knowledg. Sapientia præcedit, Religio ſequitur; quia prius eſt Deum ſcire, conſequens colere; Sapience goes before, Religion follows; becauſe it is firſt to know God, and then to worſhip him. For, seeing both Reason and Necessity teach us (Reason, which is pars divini spiritus in corpus humanum mersi) that the World was made by a Power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach us: and seeing the same Reason and Necessity make us know, that the same infinite Power is every where in the World; and yet how every where it cannot inform us: our belief hereof is not weakned, but greatly strengthned by our ignorance, because it is the same Reason that tells us, That such a Nature cannot be said to be God, that can be in all conceived by Man.

Quod est infinitum, & non secundum naturam terminatum, non continetur à scientia. Arist. poster.

I have been already over-long, to make any large Discourse, either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine owne excuse; especially in the excuse of this or that passage; seeing the whole is exceeding weak and defective. Among the grossest, the unsutable division of the Books, I could not know how to excuse, had I not been directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the first Part finished. All men know, that there is no great Art in the dividing evenly of those things, which are subject to number and measure. For the rest, it suits well enough with a great many Books of this Age, which speak too much, and yet say little, ipsi nobis furto subducimur; We are stollen away from our selves, setting a high price on all that is our own. But hereof, though a late good Writer, make complaint, yet shall it not lay hold on me, because I believe as he doth; That who so thinks himself the wisest man, is but a poor and miserable Ignorant. Those that are the best men of Warr, against all the vanities and fooleries of the World, do always keep the strongest guards against themselves, to defend them from their selves; from self-love, self-estimation, and self-opinion.

Generally, concerning the order of the Work, I have only taken counsel from the Argument. For of the Assyrians, which after the down-fall of Babel take up the first Part, and were the first great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of Posterity; some few enterprises, greater in Fame than Faith, of Ninus and Semiramis, excepted.

It was the Story of the Hebrews, of all before Olympiads, that overcame the consuming disease of Time, and preserved it self from the very Cradle and Beginning to this day; and yet not so entire, but that the large Discourses thereof (to which, in many Scriptures, we are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the Actions of those Kings and Princes which shot up here and there in the same Time, I am driven to relate by way of digression; of which we may say with Virgil:

Apparent

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vaſto;
They appear here and there, floting in the great gulf of Time.

To the ſame firſt Ages do belong the report of many Inventions therein found, and from them derived to us; though moſt of the Authors Names have periſhed in ſo long a Navigation. For thoſe Ages had their Laws; they had their diverſity of Government; they had Kingly rule; Nobility; Policy in Warr; Navigation, and all, or the moſt of needful Trades. To ſpeak therefore of theſe (ſeeing in a general Hiſtory we ſhould have left a great deal of Nakedneſs by their omiſſion) it cannot properly be called a digreſſion. True it is, that I have alſo made many others; which, if they ſhall be laid to my charge, I muſt caſt the fault into the great heap of humane error. For, ſeeing we digreſs in the ways of our lives; yea, ſeeing the life of Man is nothing elſe but digreſſion; I may the better be excuſed, in writing their lives and actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Laws of Hiſtory, and of the kinds.

The ſame hath been taught by many, but by no man better, and with greater brevity, than by that excellent learned Gentleman, Sir Francis Bacon. Chriſtian Laws are alſo taught us by the Prophets and Apoſtles; and every day preach'd unto us. But we ſtill make large digreſſions; yea, the Teachers themſelves do not (in all) keep the path which they point out to others.

For the reſt, after ſuch time as the Perſians had wreſted the Empire from the Chaldæans, and had raiſed a great Monarchy, producing actions of more importance than were elſewhere to be found: it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire; whileſt it ſo flouriſhed, that the affairs of the Nations adjoining had reference thereunto. The like obſervance was to be uſed towards the Fortunes of Greece, when they again began to get ground upon the Perſians; as alſo towards the affairs of Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty than the Greeks.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations, who reſiſted the beginnings of the former Empire, and afterwards became but parts of their compoſition and enlargement: it ſeemed beſt to remember what was known of them from their ſeveral beginnings, in ſuch times and places as they in their flouriſhing eſtates oppoſed thoſe Monarchies, which in the end ſwallowed them up. And herein I have followed the beſt Geographers; who ſeldom give names to thoſe ſmall Brooks, whereof many joined together, make great Rivers; till ſuch time as they become united, and run in main ſtream to the Ocean Sea. If the Phraſe be weak, and the Style not every where like it ſelf; the firſt ſhews their legitimation and true Parent; the ſecond will excuſe it ſelf upon the Variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili avena, uſed ſtronger pipes, when he ſounded the wars of Æneas. It may alſo be laid to my charge, that I uſe divers Hebrew words in my firſt Book, and elſewhere, in which language others may think, and my ſelf acknowledg it, that I am altogether ignorant; but it is true, that ſome of them I find in Montanus, others in Latine Characters in S. Senenſis; and of the reſt I have borrowed the interpretation of ſome of my friends. But ſay, I had been beholding to neither, yet were it not to be wondred at, having had an eleven years leiſure to attain the knowledg of that, or of any other Tongue;

How-

Howſoever, I know that it will be ſaid by many, That I might have been more pleaſing to the Reader, if I had written the Story of mine own Times, having been permitted to draw water as near the Well-head as another. To this I anſwer, That whoſoever in writing a modern Hiſtory, ſhall follow Truth too near the heels, it may haply ſtrike out his teeth. There is no Miſtreſs or Guide that hath led her followers and ſervants into greater miſeries. He that goes after her too far off, loſeth her ſight, and loſeth himſelf; and he that walks after her at a middle diſtance; I know not whether I ſhould call that kind of courſe, Temper, or Baſeneſs. It is true, that I never travelled after mens Opinions, when I might have made the beſt uſe of them; and I have now too few days remaining, to imitate thoſe, that either out of extreme ambition, or extreme cowardiſe, or both, do yet (when Death hath them on his ſhoulders) flatter the World, between the Bed and the Grave. It is enough for me (being in that ſtate I am) to write of the eldeſt Times; wherein alſo, why may it not be ſaid, that in ſpeaking of the paſt, I point at the preſent, and tax the Vices of thoſe that are yet living, in their perſons that are long ſince dead; and have it laid to my charge? But this I cannot help, though innocent. And certainly, if there be any, that finding themſelves ſpotted like the Tigers of old time, ſhall find fault with me for painting them over anew, they ſhall therein accuſe themſelves juſtly, and me falſly.

For, I proteſt before the Majeſty of God, that I malice no man under the Sun. Impoſſible I know it is, to pleaſe all; ſeeing few or none are ſo pleaſed with themſelves, or ſo aſſured of themſelves, by reaſon of their ſubjection to their private paſſions, but that they ſeem divers perſons in one and the ſame day. Seneca hath ſaid it, and ſo do I: Unus mihi pro populo erat: and to the ſame effect, Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis, ſed tibi; (or as it hath ſince lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the reſolution of an antient Philoſopher, Satis eſt unus, Satis eſt nullus. For it was for the ſervice of that ineſtimable Prince, Henry, the ſucceſſive hope, and one of the greateſt of the Chriſtian World, that I undertook this Work. It pleaſed him to peruſe ſome part thereof, and to pardon what was amiſs. It is now left to the World without a Maſter; from which, till that is preſented, hath received both blows and thanks. Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus eſt omnis judicii, in quo lis ſecundum plures datur. But theſe Diſcourſes are idle. I know, that as the charitable will judg charitably; ſo againſt thoſe, qui gloriantur in malitia, my preſent adverſity hath diſarmed me. I am on the ground already; and therefore have not farr to fall; and for riſing again, as in the Natural privation, there is no receſſion to habit; ſo it is ſeldom ſeen in the privation politick. I do therefore forbear to ſtile my Readers, Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good Opinions, or to promiſe a ſecond and third Volume (which I alſo intend) if the firſt receive grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough; and too much: and it is certain, let us claw the Reader with never ſo many courteous Phraſes, yet ſhall we evermore be thought fools, that write fooliſhly. For concluſion, all the hope I have, lies in this, That I have already found more ungentle and uncourteous Readers of my Love towards them, and well-deſerving of them, than ever I ſhall do again. For had it been otherwiſe; I ſhould hardly have had this leiſure to have made my ſelf a Fool in Print.

THE

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD:

Intreating of the Beginning and first Ages of the same, from the CREATION unto ABRAHAM.

The FIRST BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation, and Preservation of the World.

§. I.

That the Invisible God is seen in his Creatures.

GOD, whom the wisest men acknowledg to be a Power uneffable, and Vertue infinite, a Light by abundant clarity invisible; an Understanding which it self can onely comprehend; an Essence eternal and spiritual, of absolute pureness and simplicity; was, and is pleased to make himself known by the Work of the World: in the wonderful magnitude whereof (all which he imbraceth, filleth, and sustaineth) we behold the Image of that glory which cannot be measured, and withall, that one, and yet universal Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious Lights of Heaven, we perceive a shadow of his divine Countenance; in his merciful provision for all that live, his manifold goodness: and lastly, in creating and making existent the World universal, by the absolute Art of his own Word, his Power and Almightiness; which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisdom, and Goodness, being all but Attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discern per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and variety of Celestial and Terrestrial bodies: Terrestrial, in their strange and manifold diversities; Celestial, in their beauty and magnitude; which in their continual and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermixt, nor confounded. By these potent effects, we approach to the knowledg of the omnipotent cause, and by these motions, their Almighty Maker.

In these more then wonderful works, God (saith * Hugo) speaketh unto man: and it is true, that these be those discourses of God, whose effects, those that live, witness in themselves; selves; the sensible in their sensible natures; the reasonable, in their reasonable souls: for, according to * S. Gregory, Omnis homo eo ipso quòd rationalis conditus est, ex ipsa ratione, illum qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet; Every man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he which made him, is God. This God all men behold (saith Job) which is, according to the Fathers, Dominationem illius conspicere in creaturis, To discern him in his providence by his creatures. That God hath been otherwise seen, to wit, with corporal eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my understanding, grounded on these places of S. John and S. Paul, Ye have not heard his voice at any time, neither have ye seen his shape. And again, Whom never man saw, nor can see.

And this I am sure agrees with the nature of Gods simplicity, of which S. Augustine, Ipsa enim natura, vel substantia, vel quolibet alio nomine appellandum est, id ipsum quod Deus est, corporaliter videri non potest; That nature, or that substance, or by whatsoever name that is to be called which is God, whatsoever that be, the same cannot be corporally perceived. And of this opinion were Origen, Cyril, Chrysostom, Gregory Nazianzene, Hierom, Augustine, Gregory the great, Evaristus, Alcuinus, Dionysius Areopagita, Aquinas, and all others of authority. But by his own Word, and by this visible World, is God perceived of men; which is also the understood language of the Almighty, vouchsafed to all his Creatures, whose Hieroglyphical Characters are the unnumbred Stars, the Sun and Moon; written on these large Volumes of the Firmament: written also on the Earth and the Seas, by the letters of all those living creatures, and plants, which inhabit and reside therein. Therefore said that learned Cusanus, Mundus universus nihil aliud est, quàm Deus explicatus; The World universal is nothing else but God expressed. And the invisible things of God (saith S. Paul) are seen by the creation of the World, being considered in his creatures. Of all which, there was no other cause preceding then his own Will, no other matter then his own Power, no other Workman then his own Word, no other consideration then his own infinite goodness. The example and pattern of these his Creatures, as he beheld the same in all eternity in the abundance of his own love, so was it at length in the most wise order, by his unchanged Will moved, by his high Wisdom disposed, and by his Almighty Power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (saith Mirandula) we ought to love God, ex fide, & ex effectibus (that is) both perswaded by his Word, and by the effects of the Worlds Creation: Neque enim qui causa caret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognosciq; potest, sed vel ex rerum, quæ factæ sunt, quæque fiunt & gubernantur, observatione & collatione; vel ex ipsius Dei verbo: For he of whom there is no higher cause, cannot be known by any knowledg of cause or beginning (saith Montanus) but either by the observing and conferring of things, which he hath, or doth create and govern; or else by the word of God himself.

A. Mont. Nat. Hist. fol. 7.

§. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose authority is not to be despised, have acknowledged the World to have been created by God.

THis work and creation of the World, did most of the antient and learned Philosophers acknowledg, though by divers terms, and in a different manner expressed; I mean all those who are intitled by S. Augustine, Summi Philosophi, Philosophers of highest judgment and understanding. Mercurius Trismegistus calleth God, Principium universorum, The original of the Universal; to whom he giveth also the attributes of Mens, Natura, Actus, Necessitas, Finis, & Renovatio. And wherein he truely with S. Paul, casteth upon God all power; confessing also, that the World was made by Gods Almighty Word, and not by hands: Verbo, non manibus, fabricatus est mundus. Zoroaster (whom Heraclitus followed in opinion) took the word Fire to express God by (as in Deuteronomy, and in S. Paul it is used) Omnia ex uno igne genita sunt, All things (saith he) are caused or produced out of one fire.

Herm. in Pœmandro, & in sermone sacro.

Deut 4.24. Heb.12.19.

So did Orpheus plainly teach, that the World had beginning in time, from the Will of the most high God; whose remarkable words are thus converted; Cum abscondisset omnia Jupiter summus, deinde in lumen gratum emisit, ex sacro corde operans cogitata & mirabilia: Of which I conceive this sense; When great Jupiter had hidden all things in himself, working out of the love of his sacred heart, he sent thence, or brought forth, into grateful light, the admirable works which he had fore-thought.

Pindarus the Poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most High, to be the Father and Creator of all things; Unus Deus, Pater, Creator summus, Plato calleth God the cause and original, the nature and reason of the universal; Totius rerum natura, causa, & origo Deus. But hereof more at large hereafter.

opinions of Philosophers in matters of Divinity: (it being true, that the Scripture hath not want of any forrain testimony) yet as the Fathers, with others excellently learned, are my examples herein; so S. Paul himself did not despise, but thought it lawful and profitable, to remember whatsoever he found agreeable to the word of God among the Heathen, that he might thereby take from them all escape, by way of of ignorance, God rendring vengeance to them that know him not: as in the Epistle to Titus he citeth Epimenides against the Cretians, and to the Corinthians, Menander; and in the seventeenth of the Acts, Aratus &c. For, Truth (saith S. Ambrose) by whomsoever uttered, is of the holy Ghost; Veritas à quocunque dicatur, à Spiritu sancto est: and lastly, let those kind of men learn this rule; Quæ sacris serviunt, prophana non sunt; Nothing is prophane, that serveth to the use of holy things.

§. III.

Of the meaning of In Principio, Genes. 1. 1.

THis visible world of which Moses writeth, God created in the beginning, or first of all: in which (saith Tertullian) things began to be. This word Beginning (in which the Hebrews seek some hidden mystery, and which in the Jews Targum is converted by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to succession of time, nor to order, as some men have conceived, both which are subsequent: but only to Creation then. For before that Beginning, there was neither primary Matter to be informed, nor Form to inform, nor any Being, but the Eternal. Nature was not, nor the next Parent of Time begotten, Time properly and naturally taken: for if God had but disposed of Matter already in being, then as the word Beginning could not be referred to all things, so must it follow, that the institution of Matter proceded from a greater power, then that of God. And by what name shall we then call such an One (saith Lactantius) as exceedeth God in potency: for it is an act of more excellency to make, then to dispose of things made? whereupon it may be concluded, that Matter could not be before this Beginning: except we fain a double creation, or allow of two Powers, and both infinite; the impossibility whereof scorneth defence. Nam impossibile est plura esse infinita: quoniam alterum esset in altero finitum; There cannot be more Infinities then one: for one of them would limit the other. Cusan. de Mente. l. 3.

§. IV.

Of the meaning of the words Heaven and Earth, Genes. 2. 1.

THe Universal matter of the world (which Moses comprehendeth under the names of Heaven and Earth) is by divers diversly understood; for there are that conceive, that by those words was meant the first matter, as the Peripateticks understand it; to which S. Augustine and Isidore seem to adhere, Feciſti mundum (saith S. Augustine) de materia informi; quam feciſti de nulla re, pene nullam rem: that is, Thou hast made the world of a matter without form; which matter thou madest of nothing, and being made, it was little other then nothing.

But this potential and imaginary materia prima, cannot exist without form. Peter Lombard, the Schoolmen, Beda, Lyranus, Comestor, Tostatus, and others affirm that it pleased God first of all to create the Empyrean Heaven: which at the succeeding instant (saith Beda and Strabo) he filled with Angels. This Empyrean Heaven Steuchius Eugubynus calleth Divine clarity and uncreated: an errour, for which he is sharply charged by Pererius, though (as I conceive) he rather failed in the subsequent, when he made it to be a place, and the seat of Angels and just Souls, then in the former affirmation; for of the first, That God liveth in eternal Light, it is written, My soul, praise thou the Lord, that covereth himself with light: and in the Revelation, And the City hath no need of the Sun, neither of the Moon to shine in it: for the glory of God did light it. And herein also John Mercer upon Genesis, differeth not in opinion from Eugubynus: for as by Heaven created in the beginning, was not meant the invisible or supercelestial; so in his judgment, because it was in all eternity the glorious seat of God himself, it was not necessary to be created; Quem Mundum Super-cœlestem meo judicio creari (saith Mercer) non erat necesse.

Ps. 104. 12. Claritas divina non est lux facta, sed Sapientia Dei, non creata, sed nata, Apoc. 21. 23. Mercer. in Gen. 7. 7.

But as Moses forbare to speak of Angels, and of things invisible and incorporate, for the weakness of their capacities, whom he then cared to inform of those things which were most manifest, (to wit) that God did not only by a strong hand deliver them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promise made to their forefathers; but also that he created, and was the sole cause of this aspectable, and perceivable Universal: so on the other side I dare not think, that any supercelestial Heaven, or whatsoever else (not himself) was increate and eternal; and as for the place of God before the world created, the finite wisdom of mortal men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the seat of infinite power, no more then infinite power it self can be limited: for his place is in Himself, whom no magnitude else can contain:

Bar. 3. 24, 25. How great is the house of God (saith Baruch) how large is the place of his possession; it is great, and hath no end, it is high and unmeasurable.

But leaving multiplicity of opinion, it is more probable and allowed, that by the words Heaven and Earth, was meant the solid matter and substance, as well of all the Heavens, and Orbs supernal, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which covered it over, (to wit) that very matter of all things, Materia, Chaos, possibilitas, sive posse fieri. Which matter (saith Calvin) was so called, quod totius mundi semen fuerit; Because it was the seed of the Universal: an opinion of antient Philosophers long before.

Cusan. in Compend. fol. 224. Operis.

Calvin. in Gen.

§. V.

That the substance of the Waters, as mixt in the body of the earth, is by Moses understood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the attributes of unformed and void, is described as the Chaos of the antient Heathen.

Moses first nameth Heaven and Earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word Earth; but afterwards he nameth them apart, when God by his Spirit began to distinguish the confused Mass, and (as Basil saith) Præparare naturam aquæ ad fœcunditatem vitalem; To prepare the nature of water to a vital fruitfulness.

For under the word Heaven, was the matter of all heavenly bodies, and natures expresst: and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatsoever is under the Moon, and subject to alteration. Corrupt seeds bring forth corrupt plants; to which the pure heavens are not subject, though subject to perishing. They shall perish (saith David) and the heavens shall vanish away like smoak, saith Esay. Neither were the waters the matter of Earth; for it is written, Let the waters under the heavens be gathered into one place, and let the dry land appear: which proveth, that the dry land was mixt and covered with the waters and not yet distinguished; but no way, that the waters were the matter or seed of the Earth, much less of the Universal. Initio tu, Domine, terram fundâsti, Thou, O Lord, in the beginning hast founded the Earth: and again, The Earth was covered with the Deep (meaning with waters) as with a garment, saith David. And if by natural arguments it may be proved, that water by condensation may become earth, the same reason teacheth us also, that earth rarified may become water: water, air: air, fire: and so on the contrary. Deus ignis substantiam per aërem in aquam convertit, God turneth the substance of fire by air into water. For the Heavens and the Earth remained in the same state, in which they were created, as touching their substance, though there was afterwards added multiplicity of perfection, in respect of beauty and ornament. Cœlum verò & terra in statu creationis remanserunt quantum ad substantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis postmodum superaddita est. And the word which the Hebrews call Maim, is not to be understood according to the Latine translation simply, and as specifical water; but the same more properly signifieth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Est autem Maim liquor geminus, & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero Aquas fecit; For Maim (saith he) is a double liquor (that is, of divers natures) and this name or word the Latines, wanting a voice to expresse it, call it in the Plural, Aquas, Waters.

Zeno. Gul. Paris. 600. A. Mont. de nat.

This Mass, or indigested matter, or Chaos, created in the beginning, was without form, that is, without the proper form, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had separated the Earth, and digested it from the Waters. And the Earth was void, that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruits, or flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and wrought this indigested matter into that form, which it now retaineth; then did the earth bud forth the herb, which seedeth seed, and the fruitful tree according to his kind, and God saw that it was good; which attribute was not given to the Earth, while it was confused; nor to the Heavens, before they had motion, and adornment. God saw that it was good, that is, made perfect: for perfection is that to which nothing is wanting. Et perfecti Dei perfecta sunt opera; The works of the perfect God, are perfect.

Gen. 1. 2.

From this lump of imperfect Matter had the antient Poets their invention of Demogorgon; Hesiodus and Anaxagoras the knowledg of that Chaos: of which Ovid;

Ovid. Met. l. 1.

Ante Mare, & Terras, & (quod tegit omnia) Cœlum,
Unus erat toto naturæ vultus in Orbe,
Quem dixêre Chaos, rudis indigestaque moles.

Before the Sea and Land was made, and Heaven, that all doth hide,
In all the World one onely face of Nature did abide:
Which Chaos hight, a huge rude heap.

§. VI.

How it is to be understood, that the Spirit of God moved upon the waters; and that this is not to be searched curiously.

AFter the Creation of Heaven and Earth, then void and without form, the Spirit of God moved upon the Waters. The Seventy Interpreters use the word superferebatur, moved upon or over: incubabat or fovebat (saith Hierome) out of Basil; and Basil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meam tibi, sed viri cujusdam Syri sententiam recensebo (saith Basil:) which words incubare or fovere, importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, have a special likeness. Verbum translatum est ab avibus pullitiei suæ incubantibus, quamvis spirituali, & planè inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds hatching their young, not corporally, but in a spiritual and unexpressible manner.

Basil Hexam.

Junius.

Some of the Hebrews convert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volitabat; The Spirit of God did flutter: the Chaldean Paraphrast in this sense, Ventus à conspectu Dei sufflabat: or, as other understand the Chaldean, Flabat, pellebat, removebat: The wind from the face of God did blow under, drive, or remove, or did blow upon; according to the 147. Psalm, He caused his wind to blow, and the waters increase: but there was yet no wind nor exhalation. Arias Montanus in these words, Et Spiritus Elohim Meracheset, id est, efficaciter motitans, confovens, ac agitans super facies gemini liquoris; The Spirit of God effectually and often moving, keeping warm, and cherishing, quickning and stirring upon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh four originals, whereof three are agents, and the last passive and material, to wit, Causa, which is the divine Goodness: Jehi, which is, fiat, sive erit, Let it be, or, It shall be. Quæ vox verbo dei prima prolata fuit: Which voice (saith he) was the first that was uttered by the Word of God. The third, Spiritus Elohim, the Spirit of God, id est, Vis quædam divina, agilis ac præsens, per omnia pertingens, omnia complens; that is, A certain divine power, or strength every where active and extending, and stretching through all, filling and finishing all things. The fourth he calleth Maim, id est, Materies ad omnem rem conficiendam habilis; Matter apt to becom every thing. For my self, I am resolved (Cum Deus sit super rationale omni ratione; Seeing God is in all reason above reason) that although the effects which follow his wonderful waies of working, may in a measure be perceived by mans understanding, yet the manner and first operation of his divine power, cannot be conceived by any mind, or spirit, compassed with a mortal body. Animalis homo quæ Dei sunt non percipit: For my thoughts (saith the Lord in Esay) are not your thoughts, neither are your waies my waies. And as the world hath not known God himself: so are his waies (according to S. Paul) past finding out. O righteous Father, the world hath not known thee, saith Christ. And therefore, whether that motion, vitality, and operation, were by incubation or how else, the manner is onely known to God. Quomodo in omnibus sit rebus vel per essentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noster non capit; For how God (saith S. Augustine, speaking of his Ubiquity) is in all things, either by essence, presence, or power, our understanding cannot comprehend. Nihil inter Deum hominemque distaret, si consilia, & dispositiones illius Majestatis æternæ, cogitatio assequeretur humana: There would be no difference between God and man, if man's understanding could conceive the counsels and disposing of that eternal Majesty; and therefore to be over-curious in searching how the all-powerful Word of God wrought in the Creation of the World, or his all-piercing and operative spirit distinguishing, gave form to the Matter of the Universal, is a labour and search like unto his, who not contented with a known and safe Foord, will presume to pass over the greatest River in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for so doth the one lose his life, and the other his understanding. We behold the Sun, and enjoy his light, as long as we look towards it, but tenderly, and circumspectly: we warm our selves safely, while we stand neer the fire; but if we seek to out-face the one, to enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.

Psal. 147. 18.

Ar. Mont. in sup. Eu gub. in Cos. fol. 13.

Ar. Mont. natura, pag. 345.

Esa. 55. 8.

Aug. Tract. 18. in John 17. 25.

Lact. in Præfat.

But to eschew curiosity: this is true, that the English word (moved) is most proper and significant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatsoever is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truly called, Principium motus, and with Mirandula, Vis causæ efficientis, The force of the efficient cause; S. Augustine sometimes taketh for the Holy Ghost; sometimes for a wind or breath, Sub nomine Spiritus, under the name of a Spirit, which is sometimes so taken: or for virtualis creatura, For a created virtuality: Tertullian and Theodoret call it also a breath or wind: Mercurius nameth it, Spiritum tenuem intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible Spirit: Anaxagoras, Mentem; Tostatus, Voluntatem & mentem Dei, The will and mind of God; which Mens, Plato in Timæo maketh Animam mundi, The soul of the world world: and in his sixth Book de Republica, he calleth it the Law of Heaven; in his Epistles, The Leader of things to come, and the presence of things past. But as Cyprian wrote of the incarnation of Christ our Saviour, Mens deficit, vox silet, & non mea tantùm, sed etiam Angelorum; My mind faileth, my voice is silent, and not mine onely, but even the voice of Angels: so may all men else say in the understanding and utterance of the waies and works of the Creation; for to him (saith Nazianzenus) there is not one substance by which he is, and another, by which he can, Sed consubstantiale illi est, quicquid ejus est, & quicquid est; Whatsoever attribute of him there is, and whatsoever he is, it is the very same substance that himself is.

Nazian. lib. 2. Theol.

But the Spirit of God which moved upon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or wind, nor for any other creature, separate from the infinite active power of God, which then formed and distinguished, and which now sustaineth and giveth continuance to the Universal. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the world; and the same is it which maintaineth all things, saith Solomon. If thou send forth thy Spirit (saith David) they are created: And Gregory, Deus suo præsentiali esse, dat omnibus rebus esse, ita quòd si se rebus subtraheret, sicut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, sic in nihilum defluerent universa; God giveth being to all things, by being present with all things, so as if he should withdraw himself from them, then as of nothing the world was made, it would again fall away and vanish into nothing. And this working of Gods Spirit in all things, Virgil hath expresst excellently:

Lucentemq; globum Lunæ, Titaniaq; astra,
Spiritus intus alit: totamq; infusa per artus,
Mens agitat molem, & magno se corpore miscet.

Virg. Æneid. lib. 8. 724.

The Heaven, and Earth, and all the liquid Mayn,
The Moon's bright Globe, and Stars Titanian
A Spirit within maintains: and their whole mass,
A mind, which through each part infus'd doth pass,
Fashions, and works, and wholly doth transpierce
All this great Body of the Universe.

And this was the same Spirit, which moved in the Universal, and thereby both distinguished and adorned it. His Spirit hath garnished the Heavens, saith Job. So then the Spirit of God moved upon the waters, and created in them their spirituality, and natural motion; motion brought forth heat; and heat rarifaction, and subtilty of parts. By this Spirit (which gave heat and motion, and thereby, operation to every nature, while it moved upon the waters, which were in one indigested lump, and Chaos, disposed to all forms alike) was begotten Aire: an element superiour, as lighter then the waters; through whose vast, open, subtile, Diaphanick, or transparent body, the light, afterwards created, might easily transpierce: Light for the excellency thereof being the first creature which God called good, whose creation immediately followed. This Spirit Chrysostom calleth a vital Operation, Aquis à Deo insitam, ex qua aquæ non solum motionem, sed & vim procreandi animalia habuerint. He calleth it, A vital Operation given by God unto the waters, whereby the waters had not onely motion, but also power to procreate or bring forth living Creatures.

§. VII.

Of the Light created, as the material substance of the Sun, and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledg of it: and of the excellency and use of it: and of motion, and heat annexed unto it.

THese Waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: and this Light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and united, and called the Sun, the Organ and Instrument of created light. For this first and dispersed light did not (as I conceive) distinguish the night from the day, but with a reference to the Suns creation, and the uniting of the dispersed light therein. This is proved by these words, Let there be lights in the Firmament, to separate the day from the night: which lights in the Firmament of Heaven, were also made for signes, and for seasons, and for daies, and for years, implying a motion instantly to follow, by which, days and years are distinguished; after which succeeded Time, or together with which, that Time (which was the measure of motion) began. For that space of the first three days which preceded the Suns creation, or formal perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to be measured, and the Day named in the fifth Verse; was but such a space, as afterwards by the Suns motion made a civil or natural day. And as Waters were the matter of Aire, of the firmament, and of the lower and upper waters, and of the Seas, and Creatures therein; Earth, the matter of Beasts, Plants, Minerals, and Mans body: so may Light (for expression sake) be called the Chaos, or material substance of the

the Sun, and other lights of heaven: Howbeit, neither the Sun, nor any thing sensible. is that light it self, Quæ causa est lucidorum, Which is the cause that things are lightsome (though it make it self and all things else visible:) but a body most illightned, which illuminateth the Moon, by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greeks call Æther, the place of the supposed Element of fire) is effected and qualified, and by it all bodies living in this our ayr. For this light Avicenna calleth Vehiculum & fomentum omnium cœlestium virtutum, & impressionum: The conducter, and preserver, or nourisher of all celestial virtues and impressions, nothing descending of heavenly influences, but by the medium, or means of light. Aristotle calleth light a quality, inherent or cleaving to a Diaphanous body, Lumen est qualitas inhærens Diaphano: but this may be better avouched of the heat, which it transporteth and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which heat (say the Platonicks) Abeunte lumine residet in subjecto, The light being departed, doth reside in the subject, as warmth in the ayr, though the same be deprived of light. This light Plotinus and all the Academicks make incorporal, and so doth Montanus, Cui nec duritia resistit, nec spatium; Which neither hardness resisteth, nor space leaveth.

Aristotle findeth corporality in the beams of light; but it is but by way of repetition of other mens opinions, saith Picolomineus. Democritus, Leucippus, and Epicurus, give materiality to light it self, but improperly: for it passeth at an instant from the Heaven to the Earth, nor is it resisted by any hardness, because it passeth through the solid body of glass, or other Crystalline matter; and whereas it is withstood by unclean and unpure earthy substances, less hard, and more easie to invade then the former, the same is, Quòd obstaculum naturâ terreum atq; sordidum, non capit candidam luminis puritatem; Because an obstacle by nature earthy and foul, doth not receive the pure clearness of light: alluding to that most divine Light, which onely shineth on those minds, which are purged from all worldly dross, and humane uncleanness.

Plotin.

But of this created light, there is no agreement in opinion; neither do I marvel at it, for it cannot be found either in the Fathers, Philosophers, or School-men, or other antient or latter Writers, that any of them understood either it or themselves therein: all men (to cast off ignorance) have disputed thereof, but there is no man that hath been taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferiour to any in wit) as he hath shewed little strength of argument in refuting the opinions of Beda, Hugo, Lombard, Lyranus, and others: so is his own judgment herein, as weak as any mans; and most of the School-men were rather curious in the nature of terms, and more subtile in distinguishing upon the parts of doctrine already laid down, then discoverers of any thing hidden, either in Philosophy or Divinity: of whom it may be truly said, Nihil sapientiæ odiosius acumine nimio; Nothing is more odious to true wisdom, then too accute sharpness. Neither hath the length of time, and the search of many learned men, (which the same time hath brought forth and devoured) resolved us, whether this light be substantial, corporal, or incorporal: Corporal they say it cannot be, because then it could neither pierce the ayr, nor those hard, solid, and Diaphanous bodies, which it doth; and yet every day we see the ayr illightned: Incorporal it cannot be, because it sometime affecteth the sight of the eye with offence, and therefore by most of the Fathers so esteemed. Others say (as Patricius) that it cannot be matter, because no form so excellent as it self to inform it: neither can it be any accident, which is not separable without the destruction of the subject: for light being taken from the Sun, the Sun is no more the Sun in existence. Secondly, if light were proceeding from matter and form, then either, or both must be one of these, lucid or bright, dark or opake, Diaphanous or transparent; but darkness cannot be parent of light; and things Diaphanous (being neither light nor darkness, but capable of either) cannot be the cause of either, and therefore must the matter, or form, or both, be lucid and shining. Lucid and shining obtain their so being of the light; and therefore if we derive this being of light from a former, then would the progress go on infinitely and against nature; and therefore he concludeth, that light in the Sun hath his being primarily, and immediately of it self, and is therefore the Suns form, and the form of all lucid and shining bodies: but what is taught hereby, let others judge.

Lucida corpora sunt plena sua luce, alienis tenebris impervia. Opaca sunt plena suis tenebris alieno lumine. Transparentia seu Diaphana carent suis & lumine & tenebris: alienis & lumine & tenebris permeantur. Scal. sub. ex. 71.

But in my understanding, Lumen (which may be Englished by the word Shine) is an intentional Species of that, which may be Englished by Light; and so, this shining which proceedeth from the Sun, or other lights of Heaven, or from any other light, is an Image, or intentional Species thereof; and an intentional Species may be understood by example of a red or green colour, occasioned by the shining of the Sun through red or green glass: for then we perceive the same colour cast upon any thing opposite; which redness or other colour, we call the intentional Species

cies of the colour in that glass. And again, as this light, touching his simple nature, is no way yet understood: so it is disputed, whether this light first created, be the same which the Sun inholdeth and casteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer than till the Suns creation.

But by the most wise and unchanged order, which God observed in the works of the World, I gather, that the Light, in the first day created, was the substance of the Sun: for Moses repeateth twice the main parts of the Universal: first, as they were created in matter; secondly, as they were adorned with form: first, naming the Heavens, the Earth, the Waters, all confused; and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made dry Land; and the Heavens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was uncovered, and before it was called Arida, or dry Land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or inriched with their virtual forms: So the Sun although it had not its formal perfection, his circle, beauty, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (under the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day united, and set in the Firmament of Heaven: for, to Light created in the first day God gave no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation (which was to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this Light was congregated and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wisdome of God find cause why it should move (by which motion, days and nights are distinguished) till then: because there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by moving, the Sun might give light, heat, and operation.

But after the Earth (distinguished from Waters) began to bud forth the bud of the herb, &c. God caused the Sun to move, and (by interchange of time) to visite every part of the inferiour World; by his heat to stir up the fire of generation, and to give activity to the seeds of all natures: For, as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the same to that use and end, to which it was ordained; so it pleased God (saith Procopius) to command the Light to be; which by his all-powerful Word he approved, and approving it, disposed thereof, to the use and comfort of his future Creatures.

Quemadmodum Rex aliquis, &c. Procop. in Gen. 1.

But in that it pleased God to ask of Job, By what way is the Light parted, and where is the way where Light dwelleth? we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not under mans understanding; and therefore let it suffice, that by Gods grace we enjoy the effects thereof. For this light is of the treasure of God (saith Esdras:) And those which inhabite the Heavens, do onely know the Essence thereof. Nihil ignotum in cœlo, nihil notum in terra: Nothing unknown in Heaven, nothing perfectly known on Earth. Res veræ sunt in mundo invisibili; in mundo visibili umbræ rerum: Things themselves are in the invisible World; in the world visible, but their shadows. Surely, if this Light be not spiritual, yet it approacheth neerest unto spirituality; and if it have any corporality, then of all other the most subtile and pure; for howsoever, it is of all things seen, the most beautiful, and of the swiftest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficial. For it ministreth unto men, and other creatures, all celestial influences; it dissipateth those sad thoughts and sorrows, which the darkness both begetteth and maintaineth; it discovereth unto us the glorious works of God, and carrieth up with an Angelical swiftness, our eyes unto Heaven, that by the sight thereof, our minds being informed of his visible marvels, may continually travel to surmount these perceived Heavens, and to find out their omnipotent Cause and Creator. Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis; Our knowledg doth not quiet it self in things created. Et ipsa lux facit, ut cætera mundi membra digna sint laudibus, cùm suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet; It is the Light (Saith Saint Ambrose) that maketh the other parts of the world so worthy of praise, seeing that it self communicateth its goodness and beauty unto all. Of which, Ovid out of Orpheus:

Ovid. Met. lib. 1.

The world discerns it self, while I the World behold,
By me the longest years, and other times are told,
I the worlds eye.

Lastly, If we may behold in any creature, any one spark of that eternal fire, or any far-off dawning of Gods glorious brightness, the same in the beauty, motion, and virtue of this Light, may be perceived. Therefore was God called Lux ipsa; and the Light, by Hermes, named Lux sancta; and Christ our Saviour said to be that Light which lightneth every man that cometh into the world. Yet in respect respect of Gods incomprehensible sublimity, and purity, this is also true, that God is neither a mind, nor a Spirit of the nature of other Spirits; nor a light, such as can be discerned. Deus profectò non mens est, at verò ut sit mens causa est; nec spiritus, sed causa quâ spiritus extat; nec lumen, sed causa quâ lumen existit: God (saith Hermes in Pœmandro) certainly is not a mind, but the cause that the mind hath his being; nor spirit, but the cause by which every spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth.

Job 38. 24. 9.

Job. 1. 9. & 14. 46.

So then the Mass and Chaos being first created, void, dark, and unformed, was by the operative Spirit of God, pierced and quickned; and the Waters, having now received Spirit and motion, resolved their thinner parts into Ayr, which God illightned: the Earth also by being contiguat, and mixt with waters (participating the same divine virtue) brought forth the bud of the herb that seedeth seed, &c. And for a mean and organ, by which this operative virtue might be continued, God appointed the Light to be united, and gave it also motion and heat, which heat caused a continuance of those severall species, which the Earth (being made fruitful by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begat the time and times succeeding.

Gen. 1. 10.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any Crystalline Heaven, or any Primum mobile.

After that the Spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and light was created, God said, Let there be a Firmament in the middest of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters: that is, those waters which by rarifaction and evaporation were ascended, and those of the Earth and Sea.

But these waters, separate above this Extension, which the Latine Translation calleth firmamentum, or expansum (for so Vatablus, Pagninus, and Junius turn it) are not the Crystalline Heavens created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Basilius Magnus calleth a childish supposition, making in the same place many learned arguments against this infancie. For the waters above the firmament, are the waters in the ayr above us, where the same is more solid and condense, which God separated from the neather waters by a firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space: the words Raqnia (which Montanus writeth Rakiagh), and Shamajim, being indifferently taken for the heaven and for ayr, and more properly for the ayr and Æther, then for the heavens, as the best Hebricians understand them, Quo suprema ac tennia ab infimis crassis diducta, intersectaque distarent, for that whereby the supreme and thin bodies were placed in distance, being severed and cut off from low and gross matters: and the waters above the firmament, expresst in the word Majim, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters above the ayr, or in the uppermost region of the same.

Mon. Nat. hist. fol. 152.

And that the word Heaven is used for the Ayr, the Scriptures every where witness; as in the blessings of Joseph, and in the 104. Psalm: * By these Springs shall the fowl of the Heaven dwell; and upon Sodom and Gomorrah it rained brimstone and fire out of the Heaven; and in Isaacs blessing to Jacob; God give thee therefore of the dew of Heaven: and in Deuteronomy the 11. But the land whither you go to possess it, is a land that drinketh water of the rayne of Heaven; and in Job, Who hath ingendred the frosts of Heaven? and in S. Matthew, Behold the Fowls of Heaven, for they sow not. So as in all the Scriptures of the Old Testament throughout, is the word Heaven very oft used for Ayr, and taken also hyperbolically for any great Height, as, Let us build us a Tower, whose top may reach to Heaven &c. And in this very place Basil avoucheth, that this appellation of Heaven for the Firmament, is but by way of similitude: his own words be these; Et vocavit Deus firmamentum cœlum. Hæc appellatio alii quidem propriè accommodatur, huic autem nunc ad similitudinem; And God called the firmament Heaven: This appellation (saith Basil) is properly applied to another (that is to the Starry Heaven) but to this (that is, to the firmament dividing the waters) it is imposed by similitude. And if there were no other proof, that by the Firmament was meant the Ayr, and not the Heaven, the words of Moses in the eighth verse, conferred with the same word Firmament in the twentieth verse, make it manifest: for in the eighth verse it is written, that God called the Firmament, which divided waters from waters, Heaven; and in the twentieth verse he calleth the Firmament of Heaven, Ayr; in these words, And let the Fowl flye upon the earth in the open firmament of Heaven. And what use there should be of this ycie, or crystalline, or waterie Heaven, I conceive not, except it be to moderate and temper the heat, which the Primum mobile would otherwise gather and increase: though in very truth, instead of this help, it would add an unmeasurable greatness of circle, whereby the swiftness of that first Moveable would exceed all possibility of belief. Sed nemo tenetur ad impossibilia; but no man ought to be held to impossibilities: and faith it self (which surmounteth the height of all humane reason) hath for a forcible conductor the Word of Truth, which also may be called lumen omnis rationis & intellectus; the light of all reason and understanding. Now that this supposed first Moveable, turneth it selfe so many hundred thousand miles in an instant (seeing the Scriptures teach it not) let those that can believe mens imagination, apprehend it; for I cannot. [But of these many Heavens, let the Reader that desireth satisfaction, search Orontius; and of this waterie Heaven, Basilius Magnus, in his Hexam. fol. 40,41. &c. and Matth. Beroaldus, in his second Book and sixth chapter. For my self, I am perswaded, that the waters called, The waters above the Heavens, are but the clouds and waters engendred in the uppermost ayr.

A Conclusion, repeating the summ of the works in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter, The forming of it, The finishing of it.

TO conclude, it may be gathered out of the first Chapter of Genesis, that this was the order of the most wise God in the beginning, and when there was no other nature, or Being, but Gods incomprehensible eternity. First, he created the matter of all things: and in the first three dayes he distinguished, and gave to every nature his proper form; the form of levitie to that which ascended; to that which descended, the form of gravity: for he separated light from darkness, divided waters from waters, and gathered the waters under the firmament into one place. In the last three days, God adorned, beautified, and replenished the World: he set in the Firmament of Heaven, the Sun, Moon, and Starrs; filled the Earth with Beasts, the Ayr with Fowl, and the Sea with Fish, giving to all that have life a power generative, thereby to continue their Species, and kinds; to Creatures vegetative and growing, their Seeds in themselves; for he created all things, that they might have their being: and the generations of the world are preserved.

Wisd. Sol. c. 1. 14.

That Nature, is no Principium per se; nor Form, the giver of being: and of our ignorance how second causes should have any proportion with their effects.

AND for this working-power, which we call Nature, the beginning of motion and rest, according to Aristotle; the same is nothing else, but the strength and faculty, which God hath infused into every creature, having no other selfe-ability, then a Clock, after it is wownd up by a mans hand, hath. Those therefore that attribute unto this faculty, any first or sole power, have therein no other understanding, then such a one hath who, looking into the Stern of a Ship, and finding it guided by the Helm and Rudder, doth ascribe some absolute virtue to the peece of wood, without all consideration of the hand that guides it, or of the judgment, which also directeth and commandeth that hand: forgetting in this and in all else, that by the virtue of the first act, all Agents work whatsoever they work: Virtute primi actus, agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: for as the mind of man seeth by the Organ of the eye, heareth by the ears, and maketh choyce by the will: and therefore we attribute sight to the eye, and hearing to the ears, &c. and yet it is the mind only, that giveth ability, life, and motion to all these his instruments and Organs; so God worketh by Angels, by the Sun, by the Starrs, by Nature or infused properties, and by men as by several Organs, several effects; all second causes whatsoever, being but instruments, conduits, and pipes, which carry and disperse what they have received from the head and fountain of the Universal. For as it is Gods infinite power, and everywhere-presence (compassing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giveth to the Sun power to draw up vapours, to be made clouds; clouds to contain rain, and rain to fall: so all second and instrumental causes together with Nature it self, without that operative faculty which God gave them, would become altogether silent, virtueless, and dead: of which excellently Orpheus; Per te virescunt omnia, All things by thee spring forth in youthful green. I enforce not these things, thereby to annihilate those variable virtues which God hath given to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heavenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all His workes in their virtues prayse him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the Heathen Philosophers, and those that follow them, have taken on them to teach: I say, there is not any one among them, nor any one among us, that could ever yet conceive it, or express it, ever enrich his own understanding with any certain truth, or ever edifie others (not foolish by selfe-flattery) therein. For (saith Lactantius, speaking of the wisdom of the Philosophers) Si facultas inveniendæ veritatis huic studio subjaceret, aliquando esset inventa;

Natura enim, remota providentia & potestate divina, prorsus nihil est. Lact. de fals. Sapientia. l. 3. c. 28.

ta; cum verò tot temporibus, tot ingeniis in ejus inquisitione contritis, non sit comprehensa, apparet nullam ibi esse sapientiam; If in this studie (saith he), were means to find out the truth, it had ere this bin found out: but seeing it is not yet comprehended, after that so much time, and so many wits have been worn out in the inquiry of it, it appeareth, that there is no wisdom there to be had. Nam si de unâ re præcisa scientia haberetur, omnium rerum scientia necessariò haberetur: If the precise knowledg of any one thing were to be had, it should necessarily follow, that the knowledg of all things were to be had. And as the Phylosophers were ignorant in Nature, and the waies of her working; so were they more curious, then knowing, in their first matter and Phisical form. For if their first matter had any being, it were not then the first matter: for, as it is the first matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaveth, when it doth subsist. And seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor a substance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other substance should thence take concrescence, it hath not been taught, neither are these forms (saith a learned Authour) any thing, si ex ea exprimatur potentia, quæ nihil est. Again, how this first matter should be subjectum formarum, and passive, which is understood to precede the form, it is hard to conceive: for to make form, which is the cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrary to all reason, divine and humane: only it may be said, that originally there is no other difference between matter and form, then between heat and fire, of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kind of rational consideration. Leaving therefore these Riddles to their Lovers, who by certain Scholastical distinctions wrest and pervert the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to prove a false eternity of the World, I think it farr safer to affirm with Saint Augustine, That all species and kinds are from God, from whom, whatsoever is natural proceedeth, of what kind or estimation soever; from whence are the seeds of all forms, and the forms of all seeds and their motions; A quo est omnis species, à quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cujuscunq; generis est, cujuscunq; æstimationis est; à quo sunt semina formarum, formæ seminum, motus seminum atq; formarum. And thus much Averrois is forced to confess. For all forms (saith he) are, in primo motore; which is also the opinion of Aristotle in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albertus upon Dionysius.

§. XI.

Of Fate; and that the Starrs have great influence: and that their operations may diversly be prevented or furthered.

AND, as of Nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning Fate or Destinie, of which the opinions of those learned men that have written thereof, may be safely received, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an inevitable necessity, and made it more general, and universally powerful then it is, by giving it Dominion over the mind of man, and over his will, of which Ovid, and Juvenal:

Ratio fatum vincere nulla valet.
Servis regna dabunt, captivis Fata triumphos.

Juven. Sat. 7. 201.

'Gainst Fate no counsel can prevaile.
Kingdoms to Slaves by Destinie,
To Captives triumphs given be.

An errour of the Chaldeans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscillianists, the Bardisanists, and others, as Basil, Augustine, and Thomas have observed: but that Fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceived of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist. Plotinus out of the Astronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celestial Orbs, unchangeably working in inferiour bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things which a rational mind doth not order nor direct. Ptolemie, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to Fate a binding and inevitable necessity; and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod de unoquoq; nostrum fatus est Deus) and the definite lot of all living. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the Starrs are instruments of far greater use, then to give an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after Sunset: it being manifest, that the diversity of seasons, the Winters, and Summers, more hot and cold, are not so uncertained by the Sun and Moon alone, who alway keep one and the same course; but that the Stars have also their working therein.

Basil. Hexa. 4. Aug. de hæres. 70. c. 35. Tho. cont. Gent. 3. cap. 8. 3. Ficin. in 12. de leg. Cic. de fat.

And if we cannot deny, but that God hath given virtues to Springs and Fountains, to cold Earth, to Plants and Stones, Minerals, and to the excremental parts of the basest living creatures, why should we rob the beautiful Stars of their working powers? for seeing they are many in number, and of eminent beauty and magnitude, we may not think, that in the treasury of his wisdom, who is infinite, there can be wanting (even for every Star) a peculiar virtue and operation; as every herb, plant, fruit, and flower adorning the face of the Earth, hath the like. For as these were not created to beautifie the earth alone, and to cover and shadow her dusty face, but otherwise for the use of man and beast, to feed them and cure them; so were not those uncountable glorious bodies set in the Firmament, to no other end, then to adorn it; but for Instruments and Organs of his divine Providence, so far as it hath pleased his just will to determine. Origen upon this place of Genesis, Let there be light in the Firmament, &c. affirmeth, that the Starrs are not causes (meaning perchance binding causes;) but are as open Books, wherein are contained and set down all things whatsoever to come; but not to be read by the eyes of humane wisdom: which latter part I believe well, and this saying of Syracides withall: That there are hid yet greater things then these be, and we have seen but a few of his works. And though, for the capacity of men, we know somewhat, yet in the true and uttermost virtues of herbs and plants, which our selves sow and set, and which grow under our feet, we are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celestial bodies. For hardly (saith Solomon) can we discern the things that are upon the Earth, and with great labour find we out those things that are before us: Who can then investigate the things that are in Heaven? Multum est, de rebus cœlestibus aliquid cognoscere: It is much to know a little of heavenly things. But in this question of Fate, the middle course is to be followed, that as with the Heathen we doe not bind God to his creatures, in this supposed necessity of Destiny; so on the contrary, we do not rob those beautiful creatures of their powers and offices. For had any of these second causes despoiled God of his Prerogative, or had God himself constrained the mind and will of man to impious acts by any celestial inforcements, then sure the impious excuse of some, were justifiable; of whom S. Augustine, Impia perversitate in malis factis rectissimè reprehendendis ingerunt accusandum potiùs Auctorem Syderum, quàm commissorem scelerum; Where we reprehend them of evil deeds, they again with wicked perverseness urge, that rather the Author and Creator of the Stars, then the doer of the evil, is to be accused.

But that the Stars and other celestial bodies incline the will by mediation of the sensitive appetite, which is also stirred by the constitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora cœlestia (saith Damascene) constituunt in nobis habitus, complexiones, & dispositiones. The heavenly bodies (saith he) make in us habits, complexions, and dispositions; for the body (though Galen inforce it further) hath undoubtedly a kind of drawing after it the affections of the mind, especially bodies strong in humour, and weak in virtues; for those of cholerick complexions are subject to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they suffer themselves to be transported, where the Mind hath not reason to remember, that passions ought to be her Vassals, not her Masters. And that they wholly direct the reasonless mind, I am resolved: For all those which were created mortal, as birds, beasts, and the like, are left to their natural appetites; over all which, celestial bodies (as instruments and executioners of Gods providence) have absolute dominion. What we should judge of men, who little differ from beasts, I cannot tell; for as he that contendeth against those inforcements, may easily master or resist them; so whosoever shall neglect the remedies by virtue and piety prepared, putteth himself altogether under the power of his sensual appetite; Vincitur fatum si resistas, vincit si contempseris, Fate will be overcome, if thou resist it; if thou neglect, it conquereth.

But that either the Stars or the Sun have any power over the minds of men immediately, it is absurd to think, other then as aforesaid, as the same by the body's temper may be effected. Lumen solis ad generationem sensibilium corporum confert, & ad vitam ipsam movet, & nutrit, & auget, & perficit: The light of the Sun (saith S. Augustine) helpeth the generation of sensible bodies, moveth them to life, and nourisheth, augmenteth, and perfecteth them: yet still as a Minister, not as a Master: Bonus quidem est Sol, in ministerio, non imperio, The Sun is good to serve, not to sway (saith S. Ambrose.) And S. Augustine, Deus regit inferiora corpora per superiora, God ruleth the bodies below by those above; but he avoucheth not, that superiour bodies have rule over mens minds, which are incorporal.

But howsoever we are by the Stars inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the same, and weaken their operation; and Aristotle himself confesseth, that the Heavens do not always work their effects in inferiour bodies no more then the signs of rain and wind do always come to pass. And it is divers times seen, that paternal virtue and vice hath his counter-working to these inclinations. Est in Juvencis Patrum virtus, In the young Off-spring the Fathers virtue is, and so the contrary, Patrum trum vitia: and herein also there is often found an enterchange; the Sons of virtuous men, by an ill constellation become inclinable to vice, and of vicious men to virtue.

Egregia est soboles scelerato nata parente:

A worthy son is born of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after Gods reserved power) that so much setteth this art of influence out of square and rule, as Education doth: for there are none in the World so wickedly inclined, but that a religious instruction and bringing up, may fashion anew and reform them; nor any so well disposed, whom (the reins being let loose) the continual fellowship and familiarity, and the examples of dissolute men, may not corrupt and deform. Vessels will ever retain a savour of their first liquor: it being equally difficult either to clense the mind once corrupted, or to extinguish the sweet savour of virtue first received, when the mind was yet tender, open, and easily seasoned; but where a favourable constellation (allowing that the Stars incline the will) and a virtuous education do happily arrive, or the contrary in both, thereby it is that men are found so exceeding virtuous or vicious, Heaven and Earth (as it were) running together and agreeing in one: for as the seeds of virtue may by the art and husbandry of Christian counsel produce better and more beautiful fruit, then the strength of Self-nature and Kind could have yielded them; so the plants apt to grow wild, and to change themselves into weeds, by being set in a soyl sutable, and like themselves, are made more unsavoury and filled with poyson. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapiens adjuvabit opus Astrorum, quemadmodum Agricola terræ naturam; A wise man assisteth the work of the Stars, as the Husbandman helpeth the nature of the soyl. And Ptolemy himself confesseth thus much, Sapiens, & omina sapientis Medici, dominabuntur Astris; A wise man, and the ominous art of a wise Physician shall prevail against the Stars. Lastly, we ought all to know, that God created the Stars, as he did the rest of the Universal; whose influences may be called his reserved and unwritten Laws. But let us consider how they bind: even as the Laws of men do; for although the Kings and Princes of the World have by their Laws decreed, that a Thief and a Murderer shall suffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Judges and Magistrates (the Stars of Kings) executed accordingly; yet these Laws do not deprive Kings of their natural or religious compassion, or bind them without prerogative, to such a severe execution, as that there should be nothing left of liberty to judgment, power, or conscience: the Law in his own nature, being no other then a deaf Tyrant. But seeing that it is otherwise, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) do sometimes for causes to themselves known, and by mediation, pardon offences both against others and themselves; it were then impious to take that power and liberty from God himself, which his Substitutes enjoy; God being mercy, goodness, and charity it self. Otherwise that example of Prayer by our Saviour taught; And let us not be led into temptation, but deliver us from evil, had been no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which only knoweth the operation of his own creatures truly) hath assured us, that there is no inclination or temptation so forcible, which our humble Prayers and Desires may not make frustrate and break asunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceive) that Fate or Destiny, though depending upon eternal power, yet being once ordered and disposed, had such a connexion and immutable dependency, that God himself should in a kind have shut up himself therein; How miserable then were the condition of men (saith S. Augustine) left altogether without hope. Mat. 6. 13.

And if this strength of the Stars were so transferred, as that God had quitted unto them all dominion over his creatures; be he Pagan or Christian that so believeth, the only true God of the one, and the imaginary gods of the other, would thereby be despoiled of all worship, reverence, or respect. John 17 4.

And certainly, God which hath promised us the reward of well-doing, which Christ himself claimed at the hands of the Father, (I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do:) and the same God, who hath threatned unto us the sorrow and torment of offences, could not, contrary to his merciful nature, be so unjust, as to bind us inevitably to the Destinies or Influences of the Stars, or subject our souls to any imposed necessity. But it was well said of Plotinus, that the Stars were significant, but not efficient, giving them yet something less then their due: and therefore as I do not consent with them, who would make those glorious creatures of God virtueless: so I think that we derogate from His eternal and absolute power and providence, to ascribe to them the same dominion over our immortal souls, which they have over all bodily substances, and perishable natures: for the Souls of men loving and fearing God, receive influence from that divine light it self, whereof the Sun clarity, and that of the Stars, is by Plato called but a ſhadow. Lumen eſt umbra Dei, Deus eſt lumen luminis; Light is the ſhadow of Gods brightneſs, who is the light of light: But to end this queſtion, becauſe this Deſtiny, together with Providence, Preſcience, and Predeſtination, are often confounded, I think it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two; for every man hath not obſerved it, though all learned men have.

§. XII.

Of Preſcience.

PReſcience, or fore-knowledg (which the Greeks call Prognoſis, the Latines præcognitio, or præſcientia) conſidered in order and nature (if we may ſpeak of God after the manner of men) goeth before Providence: for God fore-knew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Preſcience is no other then an infallible fore-knowledg. For whatſoever our ſelves fore-know, except the ſame be to ſucceed accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Preſcience of God (as it is Preſcience onely) is not the cauſe of any thing futurely ſucceeding: neither doth Gods fore-knowledge impoſe any neceſſity, or bind. For in that we fore-know that the Sun will riſe, and ſet; that all men born in the World ſhall die again; that after Winter, the Spring ſhall come; after the Spring, Sommer, and Harveſt; and that according to the ſeveral ſeeds that we ſow, we ſhall reap ſeveral ſorts of grain; yet is not our fore-knowledg the cauſe of this, or any of theſe: neither doth the knowledg in us bind or conſtrain the Sun to riſe and ſet, or men to die; for the cauſes (as men perſwade themſelves) are otherwiſe manifeſt and known to all. The eye of man (ſaith Boetius) beholdeth thoſe things ſubject to ſenſe, as they are; the eye ſeeth that ſuch a beaſt is an horſe, it ſeeth men, trees, and houſes, &c. but our ſeeing of them (as they are) is not the cauſe of their ſo being, for ſuch they be in their own natures. And again out of the ſame Author; Divina providentia rebus generandis non imponit neceſſitatem, quia ſi omnia evenirent ex neceſſitate, præmia bonorum, & pœna malorum periret; Divine Providence (ſaith he) impoſeth no neceſſity upon things that are to exiſt; for if all come to paſs of neceſſity, there ſhould neither be reward of good, nor puniſhment of evil.

Boetius de conſol.

§. XIII.

Of Providence.

NOw Providence (which the Greeks call Pronoia) is an intellectual knowledg, both fore-ſeeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not onely behold all paſt, all preſent, and all to come, but is the cauſe of their ſo being, which Preſcience (ſimply taken) is not: and therefore Providence by the Philoſophers (ſaith S. Auguſtine) is divided into Memory, Knowledge, and Care: Memory of the paſt; Knowledg of the preſent; and Care of the future: and we our ſelves account ſuch a man for provident, as, remembring things paſt, and obſerving things preſent, can by judgment, and comparing the one with the other, provide for the future, and times ſucceeding. That ſuch a thing there is as Providence, the Scriptures every where teach us; Moſes in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions, Chriſt himſelf and his Apoſtles aſſure us hereof; and beſides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledg the Providence of God; yea the Turks themſelves are ſo confident therein, as they refuſe not to accompany and viſit each other in the moſt peſtilent diſeaſes, nor ſhun any peril whatſoever, though death therein do manifeſtly preſent it ſelf.

The places of Scripture proving Providence, are ſo many, both in general and particular, as I ſhall need to repeat but a few of them in this place: Sing unto God (ſaith David) which covereth the Heavens with clouds, and prepareth rain for the earth, and maketh the graſs to grow upon the Mountains, which giveth the beaſts their food, and feedeth the young Raven that cries: All theſe wait upon thee, that thou mayeſt give them food in due ſeaſon: And thou ſhalt drink of the River Chearеth (ſaith God to Eliah) and I have commanded the Ravens to feed thee there. Behold, the Fowls of the Air, they ſow not, nor reap, and yet your heavenly Father feedeth them: Again, Are not two Sparrows ſold for a farthing? and one of them ſhall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea, all the hairs of your head are numbred: And S. Peter, Caſt all your care on him, for he careth for you: And his judgments are written, ſaith David.

God therefore, who is every where preſent, Who filleth the Heavens and the Earth, whoſe eyes are upon the righteous, and his countenance againſt them that do evil, was therefore by Orpheus called oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things; and cannot therefore be eſteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his power to any other; for it is contrary to his own word, Gloriam meam alteri non dabo, I will not give my glory to another. No man commandeth in the Kings presence, but by the Kings direction; but God is every where present, and King of Kings. The example of Gods universal Providence is seen in his creatures. The Father provideth for his children: beasts and birds and all livings, for their young ones. If Providence be found in second Fathers, much more in the first and Universal: and if there be a natural loving care in men, and beasts, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whose Divine love was the beginning, and is the bond of the Universal: Amor divinus rerum omnium est principium, & vinculum universi (saith Plato:) Amor Dei est nodus perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumque ejus immobile sustentaculum, ac universæ machinæ fundamentum; The love of God is the perpetual knot, and link or chain of the world, and the immovable pillar of every part thereof, and the Basis and foundation of the Universal. God therefore who could onely be the cause of all, can onely provide for all, and sustain all; so as, to absolute power; to every where presence; to perfect goodness; to pure and divine love; this attribute transcendent hability of Providence is onely proper and belonging.

§. XIV.

Of Predestination.

NOw for Predestination, we can difference it no otherwise, from Providence and Prescience, then in this; that Prescience onely fore-seeth; Providence fore-seeth and careth for, and hath respect to all creatures, even from the brightest Angels of Heaven to the unworthiest Worms of the Earth: and Predestination (as it is used specially by Divines) is onely of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their salvation properly, in the common use of Divines; or perdition, as some have used it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernensis Theologus, and others, take the word Predestination more strictly, and for a preparation to felicity. Divers of the Fathers take it more largely sometimes: among whom Saint Augustine speaking of two Cities, and two Societies, useth these words, Quarum est una, quæ prædestinata est in æternum regnare cum Deo, altera æternum supplicium subire cum Diabolo; Whereof one is it, which is predestinated to reign for ever with God, but the other is to undergo everlasting torment with the Devil; for according to Nonius Marcellus, Destinare, est præparare; and of the same opinion are many Protestant Writers, as Calvin, Beza, Bucanus, Danæus, and such like: and as for the manifold questions hereof arising, I leave them to the Divines; and why it hath pleased God to create some vessels of honour, and some of dishonour, I will answer with Gregory, who saith, Qui in facti is Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerans, cur non videat, rationem videt; He that seeth no reason in the actions of God, by consideration of his own infirmity, perceiveth the reason of his blindness. And again, with S. Augustine, Occulta esse causa potest, injusta esse non potest; Hidden the cause of his Predestination may be, unjust it cannot be.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seem to be by Fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

LAstly, seeing Destiny or Necessity is subsequent to Gods Providence, and seeing that the Starrs have no other dominion, then is before spoken, and that Nature is nothing, but, as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificiosum Dei Organum, The art, or artificial Organ of God: and Cusanus, Divini præcepti instrumentum; The instrument of the divine precept: we may then with better reason reject that kind of Idolatry, or God of fools, called, Fortune or Chance; a Goddess, the most reverenced, and the most reviled of all other, but not antient: for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pausanias witnesseth in his Messeniacks. The Greeks call her Τυχὼ, signifying a relative being, or betiding, so as before Homers time this great Lady was scarce heard of; and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfeit gods, hath not a word of Fortune; yet afterward she grew so great and omnipotent, as from Kings and Kingdoms, to Beggars and Cottages, she ordered all things; resisting the wisdom of the wisest, by making the Possessor thereof miserable; valuing the folly of the most foolish, by making the success prosperous: insomuch as the actions of men were said to be but the sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens lives, but her pastimes: of which Palladius, Vita hominum ludus fortunæ est; The life of man is the play of Fortune: and because it often falleth out, that enterprises guided by ill counsels, have equal success to those by the best judgment conducted; therefore had Fortune the same external figure with Sapience; whereof Athenæus:

Longissimè

Sen. ep. 91. Aur. vict. de Pertinace. Sen ep 74. Demetrius Poliorcetes in the great and often changes of his Fortune, is said, to have used to cry out upon Fortune, applying to her a Verse of Æschilus, Tu me exulisti eodem mels (sentio) perditum.

Longissimè à Sapientia Fors dissidet,
Sed multa perficit tamen similima:

From Wisedom Fortune differs far,
And yet in works most like they are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly understood) is nothing else but a power imaginary, to which the successes of human actions and endevours were for their variety ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be given, then was it attributed to Fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant; contrary to this true ground of Plato, Nihil est ortum sub Sole, cujus causa legitima non præcesserit; Nothing ever came to pass under the Sun, of which there was not a just preceding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distinction, whatsoever may be objected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen, besides the intention of the Inferior, but not besides the intention of the Superior; Præter intentionem Inferioris, sed non præter intentionem Superioris (to wit, the ordinance of God;) and therefore (saith Melanchthon) Quod poetæ Fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God. And that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth us; as in the Law of Murther, He that smiteth a man, and he die, shall die the death; and if a man hath not laid wait, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now, where the Scripture hath these words, God hath offered him into his hands, we say, If he hurt him by Chance: and in Deuteronomy the nineteenth, where the slipping of an Ax from the helve, whereby another is slain, was the work of God himself; we in our phrase attribute this accident, to Chance or Fortune: and in Proverbs the sixteenth, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: so as that which seemeth most casual and subject to Fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and hereof the wiser sort, and the best learned of the Philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his Sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academicks, to this effect, That the same power which they called Animam mundi; The soul of the World, was no other then that incomprehensible Wisdom, which we express by the name of God, governing every Being aswell in heaven as in earth; to which Wisdom and Power they sometime gave the title of Necessity or Fate, because it bindeth by inevitable ordinance: sometime, the style of Fortune, because of many effects there appear unto us no certain causes. To this effect speaketh S. Augustine in his questions upon Genesis the first Book: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which Sect he was: For whatsoever (saith he) thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same, differenced by divers terms, according as he useth, and exerciseth his power diversly.

But it may be objected, That if Fortune and Chance were not sometimes the causes of good and evil in men, but an idle voice, whereby we express success; how comes it then, that so many worthy and wise men depend upon so many unworthy and empty-headed fools? that riches and honour are given to external men, and without kernel; and so many learned, virtuous, and valiant men wear out their lives in poor and dejected estates? In a word, there is no other inferiour, or apparent cause, beside the partiality of mans affection, but the fashioning and not fashioning of our selves according to the nature of the times wherein we live: for whosoever is most able, and best sufficient to discern, and hath withal an honest and open heart and loving truth; if Princes, or those that govern, endure no other discourse then their own flatteries: then, I say, such an one, whose virtue and courage forbiddeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall evermore hang under the wheel; which kind of deserving well and receiving ill, we alwayes falsly charge Fortune withal. For whosoever shall tell any great Man or Magistrate, that he is not Just; the General of an Army, that he is not valiant; and great Ladies that they are not fair; shall never be made a Counseller, a Captain, or a Courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wise with a wise Prince, valiant with a valiant, and just with him that is just, for such a one hath no estate in his prosperity; but he must also change with the successor, if he be of contrary qualities; sail with the tyde of the time, and alter form and condition, as the Estate or the Estate's Master changeth: Otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attain to honour and riches, but by such an observant slavish course? These men having nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfeit kind of wondering at other men, and by making them believe that all their vices are virtues, and all their dusty actions crystalline, have yet in all ages prospered equally with the most virtuous, if not exceeded them. For, according to Menander, Omnis insipiens, arrogantiâ & plausibus capitur; Every fool is wonne with his own pride, and others flattering applause: so as whosoever will live altogether out of himselfe, and study other mens humours, and observe them, shall never be unfortunate; and on the contrary, that man which prizeth truth and virtue (except the season wherein he liveth be of all these, and of all sorts of goodness, fruitful) shall never prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a worldly wise man, not to war or contend in vain against the nature of times wherein he liveth: for such a one is often the author of his own misery; but best it were to follow the advice, which the Pope gave the Bishop of that age, out of Ovid, while the Arian Heresie raged:

While fury gallops on the way,
Let no man furie's gallop stay.

And if Cicero (then whom that world begat not a man of more reputed Judgment) had followed the counsel of his Brother Quintus, Potuisset (saith Petrarch) in lectulo suo mori, potuisset integro cadavere sepeliri; He might then have died the death of nature, and been with an untorn and undissevered body buried; for, as Petrarch in the same place noteth Quid stultius quàm desperantem, (præsertim de effectu) litibus perpetuis implicari? What more foolish then for him that despairs (especially of the effect) to be entangled with endless contentions? Whosoever therefore will set before him Machiavel's two marks to shoot at (to wit) Riches, and Glory, must set on and take off a back of yron to a weak wooden Bow, that it may fit both the strong and the feeble; for as he who first devised to add sayls to rowing vessels, did either so proportion them as being fastened aloft, and towards the head of his Mast, he might abide all winds and storms, or else he sometime or other perished by his own invention: so that man which prizeth virtue for it selfe, and cannot endure to hoyse and strike his sayls, as the divers natures of calmes and stormes require, must cut his sayls and his cloth of mean length and breadth, and content himself with a slow and sure navigation, (to wit) a mean and free estate. But of this dispute of Fortune, and the rest, or whatsoever Lords or Gods, imaginary powers, or causes, the wit (or rather foolishness) of man hath found out: let us resolve with S. Paul, who hath taught us, that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him; there are diversities of operations, but God is the same which worketh all in all. 1 Cor. c. 8. v. 6. c. 12. v. 6.

CHAP. II.

Of Man's estate in his first Creation, and of God's rest.

§. I.

Of the Image of God, according to which man was first created.

THe creation of all other creatures being finished, the heavens adorned, and the earth repleni shed, God said, Let us make man in our own Image, according to our likeness. Gen. 1. 26.

Man is the last and most admirable of Gods works to us known: Ingens miraculum homo; Man is the greatest wonder (saith Plato out of Mercurius:) Naturæ ardentissimæ artificium, The artificial work of the most ardent or fire-like nature (as saith Zoroaster) though the same be meant, not for any excellency external, but in respect of his internal form, both in the Nature, Qualities, and other Attributes thereof: in nature, because it hath an essence, immortal, and spiritual; in qualities, because the same was by God created holy and righteous in truth; in other attributes, because man was made Lord of the world, and of the creatures therein. Trif. Asel. 2. & de volunt Dei. Plat. leg. l. 1.

Sanctius his animal, mentisq; capacius altæ,
Deerat adhuc, & quod dominari in cætera posset:
Natus homo est.

Sanctum, quia pars prior immortalis, anima, quia in mortali. In locum Ovid. Met. l. 1. 76.

More holy then the rest, and understanding more,
A living creature wants, to rule all made before:
So man began to be.

Of this Image and Similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers, Schoolmen, and late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceive, that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire and Dominion, as S. Chrysostom, Ambrose, and some others: which S. Ambrose denieth to the woman in these words, Ut sicut Deus unus, ab eo fieret homo unus; & quomodo ex Deo uno

omnia, ita ex uno homine omne genus esset super faciem totius terræ: unus igitur, unum fecit, qui unitatis ejus haberet imaginem; That as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kind should be upon the face of the whole earth: Therefore he being one, made one, that should have the Image of his unity. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the same Verse, that man was after the Image of God in respect of rule and power; it is written Dominamini in the plural number; and let them rule over the fish in the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceive, that Man is said to be after the Image of God in respect of his immortal soul onely: because as God is invisible, so the soul of man is invisible; as God is immortal and incorporal, so is the soul of Man immortal and incorporal; and as there is but one God which governeth the world, so but one soul which governeth the body of man; and as God is wholly in every part of the world, so is the soul of man wholly in every part of the body: Anima est tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte; The soul is wholly in the whole body, and wholly in every part thereof, according to Aristotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men deny that doctrine; which that it is otherwise then potentially true, all the Aristotelians in the world shall never prove. These and the like arguments do the Jews make (saith Tostatus) and these resemblances, between the infinite God, and the finite Man.

The School-men resemble the Mind or Soul of Man to God, in this respect especially; because that as in the Mind there are three distinct powers, or faculties (to wit) Memory, Understanding, and Will; and yet all these, being of real differences, are but one Mind: so in God there are three distinct persons, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and yet but one God. They also make the Image and Similitude diverse; and again, they distinguish between Imaginem Dei, and ad Imaginem Dei; and spin into small threds with subtile distinctions, many times the plainness and sincerity of the Scriptures: their wits being like that strong water, that eateth thorow and dissolveth the purest gold. Victorinus also maketh the Image of God to be substantial, but not the similitude: Sed in substantia nomen qualitatis declarativum; A word declaring quality in the substance. Out of which words, and that which followeth, it is inferred, that as the Image and Similitude do greatly differ, so the sinful soul doth not therefore leave to be the Image of God; but it hath not his Similitude, except it be holy and righteous. S. Augustine also against Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth, that by sin, the perfection of this image is lost in man; and in his Retractations maintaineth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the Similitude is more largely taken, then the Image.

But howsoever the School-men and others distinguish, or whatsoever the Fathers conceive; sure I am, that S. Paul maketh the same sense of the Image, which Victorinus doth of the similitude, who saith: As we have born the image of the earthy, so shall we bear the image of the heavenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scripture, that the words Image and Similitude were used but in one sense, and in this place the better to express each other; whatsoever Lombard hath said to the contrary. For God knows, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himself in the Scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophets, or Apostles, ever conceived. Now as S. Paul useth the word (Image) for both: so Saint James useth the word (Similitude) for both, in these words: Therewith bless we God even the Father, and therewith curse we Men, which are made after the similitude of God. Howsoever therefore S. Augustine seemeth, out of a kind of elegancy in writing, to make some difference: as where he writeth, Confitemur imaginem in æternitate, similitudinem in moribus inveniri; we confess that this image is found in eternity, but his similitude in manners, that is in the spiritual dispositions and qualities of the mind; yet thus he elsewhere speaketh plainly: Quasi verò possit esse imago aliqua, in qua similitudo non sit: si enim omnino similis non est, procul dubio nec imago est; As if (saith he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not: no, out of doubt, where there is no likeness, there is no image. The very words of the Text make this most manifest, as, Let us make man in our image, according to our likeness: which is, Let us make man in our image, that he may be like us: and in the next Verse following, God himself maketh it plain; for there he useth the word (Image) only as thus: God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguity, in the first Verse of the fifth Chapter, the word (Similitude) is used again by it self, as, In the day that God created Adam, in the likeness of God made he him. And this similitude S. Paul. Coloss. the third, calleth the Image; Put on (saith he) the new man which is renewed in knowledg after the image of him that created him. And in Syracides it is written, He made them according to to his image. Now if we may believe S. Paul before Peter Lombard and other Schoolmen, then it is as manifest as words can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same; for S. Paul useth both the words directly in one sense. For they turned the glory of the incorruptible God, to the similitude of the image of a corruptible man. Rom. 1. 23.

Zanchius laboureth to prove, that Man was formed after the image of God, both in body and mind: Nulla pars in homine, quæ non fuerit hujusce imaginis particeps; No part in a man (saith he) which was not participating God image; for God said, Let us make man according to our own image. But the soul alone is not man, but the Hypostasis or whole Man compounded of body and soul. The body of man (saith he) is the image of the world, and called therefore Microcosmus; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his body, must needs be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his own objection seemeth to me sufficient, where he allegeth that it may be said, that Moses spake by the figure Synechdoche, As when a man is called a mortal man, yet is not the whole man mortal, but the body onely: so when God said, Let us make man after our image, he meant the soul of man, and not the body of earth and dust: Maledictus qui Deitatem ad hominis lineamenta refert (saith S. Augustine:) Cursed is he that referreth the Deity of God to the lineaments of mans body: Deus enim non est humanæ formæ particeps, neque corpus humanum divinæ (saith Philo;) God is not partaker of humane form, nor humane body of the form divine. The Hebrew word for image, is Tselem, which signifieth a shadow or obscure resemblance: In imagine pertransit homo; Man passeth away in a shadow: Let us then know and consider, that God, who is eternal and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition; for it is both against his Nature and his Word; an errour of the Anthropomorphitæ, against the very essence and Majesty of God. Zanch. de oper. Dei. l. 3. c. 1. In Gen.

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more divine understanding then these gross Hereticks: Ad similitudinem Dei propius accedebat humana virtus, quàm figura; The virtue which is in man (saith he) came nearer the similitude of God then the figure. For God is a spiritual substance, invisible, and most simple; God is a just God, God is Merciful, God is Charity it self, and (in a word) Goodness it self, and none else simply good. And thus much it hath pleased God himself to teach us, and to make us know of himself. What then can be the shadow of such a substance, the image of such a nature, or wherein can man be said to resemble his unexcogitable power and perfectness? Certainly, not in Dominion alone; for the Devil is said to be the Prince of this World, and the Kingdom of Christ was not thereof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father: Neither because man hath an immortal soul, and therein the faculties of Memory, Understanding, and Will; for the Devils are also immortal, and participate those faculties, being called Dæmones, because scientes of knowledg and subtilty: Neither because we are reasonable creatures, by which we are distinguished from beasts: For who have rebelled against God? Who have made gods of the vilest beasts, of Serpents, of Catts, of Owls, yea, even of shameful parts, of lusts and pleasures, but reasonable men? Yet do I not condemn the opinion of S. Chrysostom and Ambrose, as touching Dominion, but that, in respect thereof, man was in some sort after the image of God, if we take Dominion, such as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with Justice and Piety; for God did not onely make man a Ruler and Governour over the Fishes of the Sea, the Fowls of Heaven (or of the air) and over the Beasts of the Field; But God gave unto man a dominion over men, he appointed Kings to govern them, and Judges to judge them in equity. Neither do I exclude Reason, as it is the ability of Understanding. For I do not conceive, that Irenæus did therefore call Man, the image of God, because he was animal rationale onely; but that he understood it better, with Sybilla; Imago mea est homo, rectam rationem habens, Man that is endued with right reason is said to resemble God, (that is) by right reason to know and confess God his Creatour, and the same God to serve, love, and obey: and therefore said S. Augustine (who herein came nearer the Truth) Fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & similitudinem suam in mente; God made man in respect of the intellect after his own image and similitude; and Reynerius, Homo, quod habet mentem, factus est ad imaginem Dei; Man was made after the image of God, in mind, or, in that he hath a mind, Eph. 6. 12. Joh. 18. 36. Plat. in Cratol. Osorius de Just. lib. 5. Reyn. de ment.

§. II.

Of the Intellectual mind of man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by Sin.

BUt Mens is not taken here for anima physica, according to Aristotle, which is, forma vel natura hominis, The form or nature of man; but this faculty or gift of God, called Mens, is taken for prima vis animi, the principal ſtrength of the mind, or ſoul, cujus actus eſt perpetua veritatis contemplatio; whoſe act, exerciſe, or office, is the perpetual contemplation of truth; and therefore it is alſo called Intellectus divinus, intellectus contemplativus, & Pæmand. anima contemplativa, A divine underſtanding, and an intellect or mind contemplative. Eſt au- De mente Idiot. l. 3. tem mens noſtra (ſaith Cuſanus) vis comprehendendi; & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compoſitum: Our intellectual mind (ſaith he) is a power of comprehending; even the whole, that is in this kind powerful, compounded of all the powers of comprehenſion: unto which Mercurius attributeth ſo much (if his meaning accompany his words) that he eſteemeth it to be the very eſſence of God (which was alſo the errour of the Manichees, and others) and no otherwiſe ſeparate from God (ſaith he) then the light from the Sun: for this Mens or underſtanding (ſaith Mercurius) Sen. ep. 65. f. & 31. f. Lib. 9. c. 5. eſt Deus in hominibus, Is God in men; or rather (and which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For, as the Sun is not of the ſame eſſence or nature with the divine light, but a body illightned, and an illumination created; ſo is this Mens or underſtanding in men, not of the eſſence of Gods infinite underſtanding, but a power and faculty of our ſouls the pureſt; or, the lumen animæ rationalis, by the true and eternal light illightned. And this Mens, others call Animam animæ, The ſoul of the ſoul, or, with S. Auguſtine, the eye of the ſoul, or receptacle of Sapience and divine Knowledg, Quæ amorem ſapientiæ tanquam ducem ſequitur, Which followeth after the love of ſapience as her guide (ſaith Philo;) between which and reaſon; between which and the mind, called anima; between which and that power which the Latines call animus, there is this difference: Reaſon, is that faculty by which we judge and diſcourſe; Anima, by which we live. Hereof it is ſaid, Anima corpus animat, id eſt, vivificat; or, The ſoul is that which doth animate the body, that is, giveth it life; for death is the ſeparation of body and ſoul: and the ſame ſtrength (ſaith Philo) which God the great Director hath in the World, the ſame hath this Anima, or mind, or, ſoul in Man. Animus, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Baſil agreeth, which called this Mens, or divine underſtanding, Perſpicacem animæ partem, The perceiving part of the mind, or, The light by which the ſoul diſcerneth: Dormientum mens, non anima, ſopitur; & in furioſis mens extinguitur, anima manet: In men that ſleep it is this (mens, or) underſtanding, and not the mind or ſoul, which reſteth, during which time it is but habitual in wiſe men, and in mad men this (mens) is extinguiſhed, and not the ſoul; for mad men do live, though diſtract.

Therefore this word being often uſed for the Soul giving life, is attributed abuſively to mad men, when we ſay that they are of a diſtract mind, in ſtead of a broken underſtanding: which word (Mind) we uſe alſo for Opinion, as, I am of this mind, or, that mind: and ſometimes for mens conditions or virtues, as, He is of an honeſt mind, or, a man of a juſt mind: ſometimes for affection, as, I do this for my mind's ſake: and Ariſtotle ſometimes uſeth this word (Mens) for the phantaſie, which is the ſtrength of the imagination: ſometimes for the knowledg of principles, which we have without diſcourſe: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels, and Intelligences: but as it is uſed in the proper ſignification, including both the underſtanding agent and poſſible, it is deſcribed to be, A pure, ſimple, ſubſtantial act, not depending upon matter, but having relation to that which is intelligible, as to his firſt object: or more at large, thus; A part or particle of the Soul, whereby it doth underſtand, not depending upon matter, nor needing any organ, free from paſſion coming from without, and apt to be diſſevered, as, eternal from that which is mortal. Hereof excellently Mercurius; Anima eſt imago mentis, mens imago Dei. Deus menti præeſt, mens animæ, anima corpori; The Soul (meaning that which giveth life) is the image of this underſtanding, or Mens; and this (Mens) or underſtanding is the Image of God. God is Preſident or Ruler over this underſtanding, this underſtanding over the Soul, and this Soul over the body. This diviſion and diſtinction out of the Platonicks and Peripateticks, I leave to the Reader to judge of. That Mens humana hath no need of any organ, Zanch. de oper. Dei, part. 3. l. 1. cap. 2. Marſilius Ficinus in his ninth Book of the Soul's immortality, laboureth to prove. Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in words; for (ſaith he) Ad facultatem intelligentem exercendam, non eget Mens organo; tanquam medio, per quod intelligat: quanquam eget objecto in quod intuatur, & ex quo intellectionem concipiat. Hoc autem objectum ſunt phantaſmata, ſeu rerum à ſenſibus perceptarum ſimulachra ad phantaſiam prolata: To exerciſe the faculty of underſtanding, the mind of man (ſaith he) needeth no inſtrument, as a mean, by which it may underſtand: but it needeth an object, whereon to look, and whence to conceive the act of underſtanding. This object are the phantaſms, or the reſemblances of things received from the ſenſe, and carried to the phantaſie. But in effect, his concluſion ſeemeth to carry a contrary ſenſe, when he maketh the Phantaſie, sie, in representing the object to the understanding, to be a corporal Organum; neither can it be understood to be an Organum of any thing, but of the understanding. And he addeth, that the resemblance of things in mans imagination, are to his understanding and mind, as colours are to the sight; whence it so followeth, that the imagination or phantasy it self is to the faculty of understanding, as the eye is to the faculty of seeing: and as this is an Organum, so that. Of this question, How the mind in all her actions maketh use of the body, and hath communion with the body, I refer the Reader to a most grave and learned Discourse in the last Reply of M. D. Bilson, late Bishop of Winchester, unto Henry Jacob. Howsoever the Truth be determined, we must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which we discourse, nor in respect of the mind it self, by which we live, nor in respect of our souls simply, by which we are immortal, that we are made after the Image of God. But most safely may we resemble our selves to God in mente, and in respect of that pure faculty, which is never separate from the contemplation and love of God. Yet this is not all; For Saint Bernard maketh a true difference between the nature and faculties of the Mind or Soul, and between the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which, being added to the nature, essence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to be after the Image of God: whose words are these, Non propterea imago Dei est, quia sui meminit Mens, seque intelligit & diligit (which also was the opinion of S. Augustine,) sed quia potest meminisse, intelligere, ac diligere eum à quo facta est, (that is) The Mind (or Mens) was not therefore the Image of God, because it remembreth, understandeth, and loveth it self; but because it can remember, understand, and love God, who created it. And that this Image may be deformed and made unprofitable, hear Basil; Homo ad Imaginem & Similitudinem Dei factus est. Peccatum verò Imaginis hujus pulchritudinem deformavit, & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corruptis concupiscentiæ affectibus immersit: Man was made after the Image and Similitude of God, but Sin hath deformed the beauty of this Image, and made it unprofitable, by drawing our minds into corrupt concupiscence.

Pag. 185. & sequent. Ad imaginem. Dei creavit illum, id est, sapientiæ, virtutis, ac bonitatis compotem, qui sese intuitus Creatorem agnosceret suum; atque imitari, pro ingenii, proq; auctoritatis, sibi concessa ratione, studeret. Exam.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of Immortality, nor in Reason, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of these by it self, nor in all these joyned, by any of which, or by all which we resemble, or may be called the shadow of God, though by reason and understanding, with the other faculties of the Soul, we are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of Original righteousnes, most perfectly infused by God into the Mind and Soul of man in his first Creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberality, that we were printed with the seal of Gods Image (though Reason may be said to be of her gift, which, joyned to the Soul, is a part of the Essential Constitution of our proper Species) but from the bountiful grace of the Lord of all goodnes, who breathed life into Earth, and contrived within the Trunk of Dust and Clay, the inimitable hability of his own Piety and Righteousnes.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which Dominion hath) do those that are powerful retain the Image of God, as according to his Commandments they exercise the Office or Magistracy to which they are called, and sincerely walk in the ways of God, which in the Scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other men so long retain this Image, as they fear, love, and serve God truly, that is, for the love of God alone, and do not bruise and deface his Seal by the weight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obstinate sins. For the unjust mind cannot be after the Image of God, seeing God is Justice it self; The bloud-thirsty hath it not, for God is Charity and Mercy it self; Falshood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of Satan; and therefore cannot dwell in one soul, together with God: and to be short, there is no likelihood between pure light and black darkness, between beauty and deformity, or between righteousness and reprobation. And though Nature, according to common understanding, have made us capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receive this Image of Gods goodness, which the sensual souls of Beasts cannot perceive; yet were that aptitude natural more inclinable to follow and imbrace the false and dure-less pleasures of this Stage-play World, then to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanship of God's Wisdom, and the liberality of his Mercy, formed eyes to our souls, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impurity of our flesh, behold the highest Heavens, and thence bring Knowledg and Object to the Mind and Soul, to contemplate the ever-during Glory, and term-less Joy, prepared for those which retain the Image and Similitude of their Creatour, preserving undefiled and unrent the garment of the new man, which, after the Image of God, is created in Righteousnes, and Holiness, as saith S. Paul. Now whereas it is thought by some of the Fathers, as by S. Augustine,

Gen. 5. 22.

S Ambroſe Auguſtine, with whom S. Ambroſe joyneth, that by ſin, the perfection of the Image is loſt, and not the Image it ſelf: both opinions by this diſtinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the Image of God, in man, may be taken two wayes; for, either it is conſidered according to natural gifts, and conſiſteth therein; namely, to have a reaſonable and underſtanding nature, &c. and in this ſenſe, the Image of God is more loſt by ſin, then the very reaſonable or underſtanding nature, &c. is loſt, (or ſin doth not aboliſh and take away theſe natural gifts:) or, the Image of God is conſidered, according to ſupernatural gifts, namely, of divine Grace and heavenly Glory, which is indeed the perfection and accompliſhment of the natural Image; and this manner of ſimilitude and Image of God is wholly blotted out, and deſtroyed by Sin.

§. III.

Of our baſe and frail Bodies: and that the care thereof ſhould yield to the immortal Soul.

THE external man God formed out of the duſt of the Earth, or (according to the ſignification of the word, Adam) of Adamath, of red Earth, or ex limo terræ, out of the ſlime of the Earth, or a mixed matter of Earth and Water. Non ex qualibet humo, ſed ex ghaphar adamath (id eſt) ex pinguiſſima & molliſſima: Not that God made an Image or Statue of Clay, but out of Clay, Earth, or Duſt, God formed and made fleſh, bloud, and bone, with all parts of man.

Arias Mont. de nat. f. 156.

That, man was formed of Earth and Duſt did Abraham acknowledg, when in humble fear he called unto God, to ſave Sodom: Let not my Lord now be angry, if I ſpeak, I that am but duſt and aſhes: And, In theſe Houſes of Clay, whoſe foundation is in the duſt, do our ſouls inhabit, according to Job. And though our own eyes do every where behold the ſudden and reſiſtleſs aſſaults of Death, and Nature aſſureth us by never-failing experience, and Reaſon by infallible demonſtration, that our times upon the Earth have neither certainty nor durability; that our Bodies are but the Anvils of pain and diſeaſes, and our Minds the Hives of unnumbred cares, ſorrows, and paſſions: and that (when we are moſt glorified) we are but thoſe painted poſts, againſt which Envy and Fortune direct their darts; yet ſuch is the true unhappineſs of our condition, and the dark ignorance which covereth the eyes of our underſtanding, that we onely prize, pamper, and exalt this Vaſſal and Slave of death, and forget altogether (or onely remember at our caſt-away leiſure) the impriſoned immortal Soul, which can neither dye with the Reprobate, nor periſh with the mortal parts of virtuous men: ſeeing Gods juſtice in the one, and his goodneſs in the other, is exerciſed for evermore, as the ever-living ſubjects of his reward and puniſhment. But when is it that we examine this great account? Never while we have one vanity left us to ſpend: we plead for Titles, till our breath fail us; dig for Riches, while our ſtrength enableth us; exerciſe Malice, while we can revenge; and then when time hath beaten from us both youth, pleaſure, and health, and that Nature it ſelf hateth the houſe of old age, we remember with Job, that we muſt go the way from whence we ſhall not return, and that our bed is made ready for us in the dark; And then, I ſay, looking over-late into the bottom of our conſcience (which Pleaſure and Ambition had locked up from us all our lives,) we behold therein the fearful Images of our actions paſt, and withal this terrible Inſcription: That God will bring every work into judgment, that man hath done under the Sun.

Job 10. 21. & 17. 13.

Eccl. 12. 14.

But what examples have ever moved us? what perſwaſions reformed us? or what threatnings made us afraid? we behold other mens Tragedies plaid before us, we hear what is promiſed and threatned: but the World's bright glory hath put out the eyes of our minds, and theſe betraying lights, (with which we onely ſee) do neither look up towards term-leſs joyes, nor down towards endleſs ſorrows, till we neither know, nor can look for any thing elſe at the Worlds hands. Of which excellently Marius Victor:

Nil hoſtes, nil dira fames, nil denique morbi
Egerunt, ſumus, qui nunc ſumus; iiſque periclis
Tentati: nihilo meliores reddimur unquam;
Sub vitiis nullo culparum fine manentes.

Diſeaſes, famine, enemies, in us no change have wrought,
What er'ſt we were, we are; ſtill in the ſame ſnare caught:
No time can our corrupted manners mend;
In Vice we dwell, in Sin that hath no end.

But let us not flatter our immortal Souls herein; for to neglect God all our lives, and know that we neglect him; to offend God voluntarily, and know that we offend him, caſting our hopes on the Peace, which we truſt to make at parting, is no other then a rebellious preſumption, and (that which is the worſt of all) even a contemptuous laughing to ſcorn, and deriding of God, his Laws and Precepts. Fruſtra ſperant qui ſic de miſericordia cordia Dei ſibi blandiuntur; They hope in vain, ſaith Bernard, which in this ſort flatter themſelves with Gods mercy.

§. IV.

Of the Spirit of Life, which God breathed into man in his creation.

IN this frame and carcaſs God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a living Soul: (that is) God gave a body of Earth and of corruptible matter, a Soul ſpiritual and incorruptible; not that God had any ſuch bodily inſtruments as men uſe, but God breathed the Spirit of Life and Immortality into man, as he breatheth his grace daily into ſuch as love and fear him. The Spirit of God (ſaith Elihu in Job) hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life: In qua ſententia (ſaith Rabanus) vitanda eſt paupertas ſenſus carnalis, ne fortè putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formâſſe corpus hominis, vel faucibus aut labiis ſuis inſpirâſſe in faciem formati, ut vivere poſſit & ſpiraculum vitæ habere: Nam & Propheta cum ait, Manus tuæ fecerunt me, &c. tropica hac locutione magis quàm propria, (id eſt, juxta conſuetudinem, qua ſolent homines operari) loquutus eſt: In which ſentence (ſaith he) the beggarlineſs of carnal ſenſe is to be avoided, leſt perhaps we ſhould think, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of ſlime, or breathed with jaws or lips upon his face (being formed) that he might live, and have the Spirit of life: for the Prophet alſo when he ſaith; Thy hands have made me, ſpeak this Tropically, rather then properly (that is) according to the cuſtom which men uſe in working. Quantum eſt periculi his, qui Scripturas ſenſu corporeo legunt? In what danger are they that read the Scriptures in a carnal ſenſe? By this breath was infuſed into man, both life and ſoul, and therefore this (Soul) the Philoſophers call Animam, quæ vivificat corpus, & animat; Which doth animate and give life to the body. The inſpiration of the Almighty giveth underſtanding, ſaith Job; and this ſpirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reaſonable ſoul of man, returneth again to God that gave it, as the body returneth unto the Earth, out of which it was taken; according to Eccleſiaſtes: And duſt ſhall return to the Earth, out of which it was taken, and the ſpirit ſhall return to God that gave it. Neither is this word (Spirit) uſually otherwiſe taken in the Scriptures, then for the ſoul; as when Stephen cried unto God: Domine, ſuſcipe ſpiritum meum; Lord Jeſus receive my ſpirit: and in S. John, And Jeſus bowed his head and gave up the Ghoſt, or Spirit; (which was) that his life and ſoul left his body dead. And that the immortal ſoul of man differeth from the ſouls of beaſts, the manner of creation maketh it manifeſt: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance every creeping thing, and let the earth bring forth the living thing according to his kind, the beaſt of the Earth, &c. But of man it is written, Let us make man in our own Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the Water and Earth were thoſe creatures brought forth, and thence received life; ſo ſhal they again be diſſolved into the ſame firſt matter, whence they were taken: but the life of breath everlaſting, which God breathed into Man, ſhall, according to Eccleſiaſtes, return again to God that gave it.

§. V.

That man is (as it were) a little World: with a digreſſion touching our mortality.

MAn, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abſtract or model or brief Story in the Univerſal: in whom God concluded the Creation, and work of the World, and whom he made the laſt, and moſt excellent of his Creatures, being internally endued with a divine underſtanding, by which he might contemplate, and ſerve his Creatour, after whoſe Image he was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of Reaſon and other abilities, that thereby alſo he might govern and rule the World, and all other God's Creatures therein. And whereas God created three ſorts of living natures, (to wit) Angelical, Rational, and Brutal; giving to Angels an intellectual, and to Beaſts a ſenſual nature, he vouchſafed unto Man, both the intellectual of Angels, the ſenſitive of Beaſts, and the proper rational belonging unto man: and therefore (ſaith Gregory Nazianzene) Homo eſt utriuſque naturæ vinculum, Man is the bond and chain which tieth together both Natures: and becauſe in the little frame of man's body there is a repreſentation of the Univerſal, and (by alluſion) a kind of participation of all the pars there, therefore was man called Microcoſmos, or the little World. Deus igitur hominem factum, velut alterum quendam mundum, in brevi magnum, atque exiguo totum, in terris ſtatuit; God therefore placed in the Earth the man whom he had made, as it were another World; the great and large World in the ſmall and little World: for out of the Earth and Duſt, was formed the fleſh of man, and therefore heavy and lumpiſh: the a ſtony nature are.

His bloud, which diſperſeth it ſelf by the branches of veins through all the body, may be reſembled to thoſe waters, which are carried by Brooks and Rivers over all the earth; his breath to the Air, his natural heat to the incloſed warmth which the Earth hath in it ſelf, which ſtirred up by the heat of the Sun, aſſiſteth Nature in the ſpeedier procreation of thoſe varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth; Our radical Moiſture, Oyl, or Balſamum (whereon the natural heat feedeth and is maintained) is reſembled to the fat and fertility of the Earth; the hairs of mans body, which adorns, or overſhadows it, to the graſs, which covereth the upper face and ſkin of the Earth; our generative power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the leight, wandring and unſtable clouds, carried every where with uncertain winds; our eyes to the light of the Sun and Moon; and the beauty of our youth, to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very ſhort time, or with the Sun's heat, dry up and wither away, or the fierce puffs of wind blow them from the ſtalks; the thoughts of our mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure underſtanding (formerly called Mens, and that which always looketh upwards) to thoſe intellectual Natures, which are always preſent with God; and laſtly, our immortal ſouls (while they are righteous) are by God himſelf beautified with the title of his own Image and Similitude. And although, in reſpect of God, there is no man juſt, or good, or righteous (for, In Angelis deprehenſa eſt ſtultitia, Behold, He found folly in his Angels, ſaith Job); yet, with ſuch a kind of difference, as there is between the ſubſtance and the ſhadow, there may be found a goodneſs in men: which God being pleaſed to accept, hath therefore called Man, the Image and Similitude of his own Righteouſneſs. In this alſo is the little World of man compared, and made more like the Univerſal (man being the meaſure of all things; Homo eſt menſura omnium rerum, ſaith Ariſtotle and Pythagoras) that the four Complexions reſemble the four Elements, and the ſeven Ages of man the ſeven Planets; Whereof, our infancie is compared to the Moon, in which we ſeem onely to live and grow, as Plants; the ſecond Age to Mercurie, wherein we are taught and inſtructed; our third Age to Venus, the days of Love, Deſire, and Vanity; the fourth to the Sun, the ſtrong, flouriſhing, and beautifull age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which we ſeek honour and victory, and in which our thoughts travel to ambitious ends; the ſixth Age is aſcribed to Jupiter, in which we begin to take accompt of our times, judge of our ſelves, and grow to the perfection of our underſtanding; the laſt and ſeventh, to Saturn, wherein our days are ſad, and over-caſt, and in which we find by dear and lamentable experience, and by the loſs which can never be repaired, that of all our vain paſſions and affections paſt, the ſorrow onely abideth: Our attendants are ſickneſſes, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more we are accompanied with plenty, by ſo much the more greedily is our end deſired, whom when Time hath made unſociable to others, we become a burthen to our ſelves: being of no other uſe, then to hold the riches we have from our Succeſſors. In this time it is, when (as aforeſaid) we, for the moſt part, and never before, prepare for our eternal habitation, which we paſs on unto with many ſighs, grones, and ſad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanſhip of death, finiſh the ſorrowfull buſineſs of a wretched life; towards which we always travel both ſleeping and waking: neither have thoſe beloved companions of honour and riches any power at all to hold us any one day, by the glorious promiſe of entertainments; but by what crooked path ſoever we walk, the ſame leadeth on directly to the houſe of death, whoſe doors lie open at all hours, and to all perſons. For this Tide of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, ever runneth with a perpetual Ebb and falling Stream, but never floweth again: our Leaf once fallen, ſpringeth no more; neither doth the Sun or the Summer adorn us again, with the garments of new Leaves and Flowers.

For if there were any baiting place, or rest, in the course or race of mans life, then, according to the doctrine of the Academicks, the same might also perpetually be maintained; but as there is a continuance of motion in natural living things, and as the sap and juyce, wherein the life of Plants is preserved, doth evermore ascend or descend; so is it with the life of man, which is alwayes either increasing towards ripeness and perfection, or declining and decreasing towards rottenness and dissolution.

§. VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his first Creation, to dispose of himself.

THese be the miseries which our first Parents brought on all Mankind, unto whom God in his creation gave a free and unconstrained will, and on whom he bestowed the liberal choice of all things, with one onely Prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God set before him, a mortal and immortal Life, a nature celestial and terrene, and (indeed) God gave man to himself, to be his own Guide, his own Workman, and his own Painter, that he might frame or describe unto himself what he pleased, and make election of his own form. Eccles. 15. 14. God made man in the beginning (saith Siracides) and left him in the hands of his own counsel. Such was the liberality of God, and man's felicity: whereas beasts, and all other creatures reasonless, brought with them into the World (saith Lucilius), and that even when they first fell from the bodies of their Dams, the Nature, which they could not change; and the supernal Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soon after, of that condition, in which they remain in perpetual eternity. But (as aforesaid) God gave unto man all kind of Seeds and Grafts of life (to wit) the vegetative life of Plants, the sensual of Beasts, the rational of Man, and the intellectual of Angels; whereof which soever he took pleasure to plant and cultive, the same should futurely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his own choice and plantation. This freedom of the first man Adam, and our first Father, was ænigmatically described by Asclepius Atheniensis (saith Mirandula) in the person and Fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagoreans, and antient Poets, wherein it was fained, that men were transformed into divers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mens conditions, from Reason to Brutality, from Virtue to Vice, from Meekness to Cruelty, and from Justice to Oppression. For by the lively Image of other creatures did those Antients represent the variable passions, and affections of mortal men; as by Serpents were signified Deceivers; by Lyons, Oppressors, and cruel men; by Swine, Men given over to lust and sensuality; by Wolves, ravening, and greedy men; which also S. Matthew resembleth to false Prophets, which come to you in sheeps clothing, but inwardly they are ravening Wolves: by the images of stones and stocks, foolish and ignorant Men; by Vipers, ungrateful Men: of which S. John Baptist, O ye generation of Vipers, &c. Matth. 7. 15. Matth. 3. 7.

Of God's ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the Universal created was exceeding good.

IN this work of Man, God finished the Creation; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished, Cui voluisse est fecisse; With whom, to will is to make, saith Beda. Neither did God so rest, that he left the World made, and the Creatures therein to themselves: for my Father worketh to this day (saith Christ) and I work; but God rested (that is) he created no new species or kinds of creatures, but (as aforesaid) gave unto man a power generative, and so to the rest of living creatures, to Plants and Flowers, their seeds in themselves; and commanded Man to multiply and fill the Earth, and the Earth and Sea to bring forth creatures according to their several kinds: all which being finished, God saw that his works were good; not that he foreknew not, and comprehended not the beginning and end before they were; for God made every Plant of the field before it was in the Earth; but he gave to all things which he had created the name of Good, thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whose John 5. 17. Gen. 1. 28. 22. 24.

simple purity and from so excellent a cause there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect. For man having a free will and liberal choice, purchased by disobedience his own death and mortality; and for the cruelty of mans heart, was the Earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the first Age destroyed, but the righteous man Noah and his Family, with those creatures which the Ark contained, reserved by God to repleniſh the Earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.

That the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marvel that men should erre.

CONcerning the first Habitation of man, we read, that the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, Gen. 2. 6. Of this seat and place of Paradise, all Ages have held dispute; and the opinions and judgments have been in effect, as divers, among those that have written upon this part of Genesis, as upon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: Some there are, that have conceived the being of the terrestrial Paradise, without all regard of the Worlds Geography, and without any respect of the East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the Heavens) the way how to find out and judg, in what Region of the World this Garden was by God planted, wherein he was exceeding respective and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first Interpretation; or, trusting to their own judgments, understood one place for another; and one Errour is so fruitful, as it begetteth a thousand Children, if the licentiousnes thereof be not timely restrained. And thirdly, those Writers which gave themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things so observant Sectators of those Masters, whom they admired and believed in, as they thought it safer to condemn their own understanding, then to examine theirs. For (saith Vadianus in his Epistle of Paradise) Magnos errores, magnorum virorum authoritate persuasi, transmittimus; We pass over many gross errours, by the authority of great men led and perswaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were far wide from the understanding of this place. I speak it not, that I my self dare presume to censure them, for I reverence both their Learning and their Piety, and yet not bound to follow them any further, then they are guided by truth: for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should be proud of himself, GOD hath distributed unto men such a proportion of Knowledg, as the wisest may behold in themselves their own weakness: Nulli unquam dedit omnia Deus; God never gave the knowledg of all things to any one. Saint Paul confes'd that he knew not, whether he were taken up into the third Heaven in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himself acknowledgeth thus much, that neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, seeing knowledg is infinite, it is God (according to S. Jude) who is only wise. Sapientia ubi invenitur, (saith Job)? But where is wisdom found? and where is the place of understanding? Man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Land of the living. And therefore seeing God found folly in his Angels, mens judgments (which inhabit in houses of Clay) cannot be without their mistakings: and so the Fathers, and other learned men, excusable in particulars, especially in those whereupon our salvation depended not.

§. II.

A recital of strange Opinions touching Paradise.

NOw touching Paradise, first it is to be enquired, Whether there were a Paradise, or no? or whether Moses description were altogether mystical, and allegorical? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others, have affirmed; and that under the names of those four Rivers Pison, Gehon, Hiddekel, and Perath, the Tree of Life, and the Tree of Knowledg, there were delivered unto us other mysteries and significations; as, that by the four Rivers were meant the four Cardinal Virtues, Justice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence; or (by other) Oyle, Wine, Milk, and and Honey. This Allegorical understanding of Paradise by Origen divulged, was again by Franciscus Georgius received (saith Sixtus Senensis;) whose frivolous imaginations Sixtus himself doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34. Annotation of his fift Book, *fol.*338. the last Edition.

S. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the Allegorical construction, and set Paradise in the third Heaven, and in the virtues of the mind, & in nostro principali, which is, as I conceive it, in mente, or in our souls: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or garden of Paradise, was meant the Soul or Mind; by Adam, Mens, or, Understanding; by Eve, the Sense; by the Serpent, Delectation; by the Tree of good and evil, Sapience; and by the rest of the Trees, the virtues of the mind, or in the mind planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, upon the first of the Corinth. c.6. he in direct words alloweth both of a celestial and terrestrial Paradise; the one into which S. Paul was wrapt; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysamensis was of opinion, that a Paradise had been; but that there was not now any mark thereof on the earth: the same being not onely defaced, but withall the places now not so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

Amb. de Parad.

The Manichees also understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth; to which opinion, Vadianus inclineth, as I conceive his words, in two several places. First, upon this; Fill the earth, Gen. 10. Of which he gives this judgment. Hoc ipso etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini universis animantibus, subjicite terram, clarissimè docet, totam terram extantem, & omnigenis (ut tum erat) fructibus consitam, sedem & hortum illum Adæ, & posteritatis futuræ fuisse; These words (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruit and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it, and rule over every creature, do clearly shew, that the Universal earth, set or filled with all sorts of fruits (as then it was,) was the garden and seat of Adam, and of his future posterity. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the Acts, Cap. 17. Apostolus ex uno sanguine omne genus humanum ideò factum docet, ut habitarent super universam faciem terræ: tota igitur terra Paradisus ille erat; The Apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one bloud all mankind, to dwell over all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (saith he) was that Paradise. Which conjectures I will answer in order. Goropius Becanus differeth not much from this opinion, but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certain place, and peculiar Garden; which place Goropius findeth near the River of Acesines, in the Confines of India.

Vers. 26.

Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus, make Paradise under the Equinoctial; and Postellus, quite contrary, under the North-pole: the Chaldeans also for the most part, and all their Sectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradise a figure, or Sacrament onely, or else would have it seated out of this sensible world, or raised into some high and remote Region of the Air. Strabus, and Rabanus, were both sick of this vanity, with Origen, and Philo: so was our venerable Beda, and Peter Comestor, and Moses Barcephas the Syrian, translated by Masius. But as Hopkins sayes of Philo Judæus, that he wondred, Quo malo genio afflatus, By what evil Angel he was blown up into this errour; so can I but greatly marvel at the learned men, who so grosly and blindly wandred; seeing Moses, and after him the Prophets, do so plainly describe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the Kingdoms and Provinces bordering it, by the Rivers which watered it, and by the points of the Compass upon which it lay, in respect of Judea, or Canaan.

Bart. 16. 126.

Bed. in Gen. Pet. Comest. l. 1. cap. 3. Moses Barc. de Par.

Noviomagus also upon Beda, De natura rerum, believeth that all the Earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole Earth (saith he) hath the same beauty ascribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the Ocean was that Fountain from whence the four Rivers, Pison, Gehon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning; for he could not think it possible, that these Rivers, of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates, (whereof the one ran through India, the other through Egypt, and the other through Mesopotamia and Armenia) could rise out of one Fountain, vvere it not out of the Fountain of the Ocean.

§. III.

That there was a true local Paradise Eastward, in the Countrey of Eden.

TO the first therefore, that such a place there was upon the earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the Man whom he had made: and howsoever the vulgar translation, called Jerom's translation, hath converted this place thus, Plantaverit Dominus Deus Paradisum voluptatis à principio, The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning; putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eastward: it is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For, What sense hath this translation (saith our Hopkins, in his Treatise of Paradise) that he planted a Garden in Pleasure, or, that a River went out of pleasure to water the Garden? But the Seventy Interpreters call it Paradisum Edenis, The Paradise of Eden; and so doth the Chaldean Paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a Place, and for a Noun appellative; which Region, in respect of the fertility of the Soil, of the many beautiful Rivers and goodly Woods, and that the Trees (as in the Indies) do always keep their leaves, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, Pleasantness, or delicacy; as the Spaniards call the Country, opposite to the Isle of Cuba, Florida: and this is the mistaking, which may end the dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, That as Florida was a Country, so called for the flourishing beauty thereof; so was Eden a Region, called Pleasure, or Delicacy, for its pleasure or delicacy: and as Florida signifieth Flourishing; so Eden signifieth Pleasure: and yet both are the proper names of Countries; for Eden being the proper name of a Region (called Pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choise seat of all that Region, Paradise was truely the Garden of Eden, and truely the Garden of Pleasure.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrary to the translation of the Seventy; to the ancient Greek Fathers, as Basil, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Gregory; and to the Rabines, as Ramban, Rabbi Solomon, R. Abraham, and Chimchi; and of the Latines, Severinus, Damascenus, &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and set the word (Eastward) for ab initio; for Damascene's own words are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter constitus; Paradise is a place marvellously planted by the hands of God in Eden, toward the East.

And after all these Fathers, Guilhelmus Parisiensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senensis, of latter times, do both understand these words of Eden and of the East, contrary to the vulgar Translation; Parisiensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which these are their own words: After this I will begin to speak of Paradise terrestrial, which God planted from the beginning, or Eastward, &c. Post hæc incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantâsse Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem &c. And then Senensis; Moses enim clarissimè prodit, Paradisum à Deo constitum in regione terræ Orientalis, quæ dicitur Heden: Heden autem esse proprium nomen, apparet ex quarto capite Gen. ubi legimus, Cham habitâsse ad Orientalem plagam Heden; For Moses (saith he) doth shew most clearly, that Paradise was planted of God in a Region of the East Countrey, which is called Heden: but that Heden is a proper name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Genesis, where we read, that Cham dwelt on the East border of Heden. Pererius endeavoureth to qualifie this Translation; for this particle (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the Creation, and not to the very first day; alledging this place of Christ, that although the Devil was said to be a Man-slayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I think (referring my self to better judgment) the Devil was from the instant of his fall a Man-slayer in disposition, though he had not whereon to practise till mans Creation. And for conclusion, S. Hierom (if that be his translation) adviseth himself better in the end of the third Chapter of Genesis, converting the word (Eden) by (ante) and not (à principio) as, God did set a Cherubin before the Garden of Eden; Collocavit Deus ante Paradisum voluptatis, Cherubin; and Pererius himself acknowledgeth, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew, Posuit à parte Orientali horti Heden, Cherubin; He set on the East-side of the Garden of Heden, a Cherubin. Becanus affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) signifieth (with) as well as (in) and so the Text beareth this sense; That God planted a Garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But Becanus followeth this construction, onely to the end to find Paradise upon the River of Asecines; for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great abundance, which he supposeth to be the Tree of knowledg of good and evil, and would therefore draw Paradise to the Fig-Tree: which Conceit of his I will answer hereafter.

Verse 15. Job. 8. 44. Gen. 3. 24.

Now, because Paradise was seated by Moses toward the East, thence came the custom of praying toward the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans: and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, as to the point where the Sun riseth in March, which is directly over Paradise (saith Damascenus:) affirming, that we always pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradise, whence we were cast out; and yet the Temple of Solomon had their Priests and Sacrifices, which turned themselves in their service and divine ceremonies, always towards the West, thereby to avoid the superstition of the Egyptians and Chaldeans.

But

But becauſe Eaſt and Weſt are but in reſpect of places; (for although Paradiſe were Eaſt from Judea, yet it was Weſt from Perſia) and the ſerving of God is every where in the world; the matter is not great, which way we turn our faces, ſo our hearts ſtand right, other then this, that we who dwell Weſt from Paradiſe, and pray turning our ſelves towards the Eaſt, may remember thereby to beſeech God, that as by Adams fall we have loſt the Paradiſe on earth; ſo by Chriſts death and paſſion we may be made partakers of the Paradiſe celeſtial, and the Kingdom of Heaven. To conclude, I conceive, that there was no other myſtery in adding the word (Eaſt) to Eden by Moſes, then to ſhew, that the Region of Eden, in which Paradiſe was, lay Eaſtward from Judea and Canaan: for the Scriptures alwayes called the people of thoſe Nations, the Sons of the Eaſt which inhabited Arabia, Meſopotamia, Chaldea, and Perſia: of which Ovid.

Eurus ad Auroram, Nabathæaq; regna receſſit,
Perſidaque, & radiis juga ſubdita matutinis.

The Eaſt wind with Aurora hath a biding
Among th' Arabian and the Perſian Hills,
Whom Phœbus firſt ſalutes at his firſt riſing.

And if it be objected, that Jeremy the Prophet, threatning the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, doth often make mention of Northern Nations, it is to be noted, that the North is there named, in reſpect of thoſe Nations that followed Nabuchodonozer, and of whom the greateſt part of his Army was compounded; not that Babylon it ſelf ſtood North from Jeruſalem, though inclining from the Eaſt towards the North.

Now to the difference of this Tranſlation, Peter Comeſtor giveth beſt ſatisfaction: for he uſeth the word From the beginning, that is, from the firſt part of the World, (à principio) id eſt, (ſaith he) à prima orbis parte; and afterward he affirmeth, that à principio, and ad Orientem, have the ſame ſignification: From the beginning and Eaſt-ward is all one; à principio idem eſt quod ad Orientem.

But to return to the proof of this place, and that this ſtory of Mankind was not Allegorical, it followeth in the Text of the 2. Chap. and 9. Verſe, in theſe words: For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every Tree pleaſant to the ſight, and good for meat, &c. ſo as firſt it appeared that God created Adam elſe-where as in the World at large, and then put him into the Garden: and the end why, is expreſs'd: that he might dreſs it and keep it; Paradiſe being a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the moſt excellent kinds, pleaſant to behold, and (withal) good for meat: which proveth that Paradiſe was a terreſtrial Garden, garniſhed with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taſte. And to make it more plain, and to take away all opinion of Allegorical conſtruction, he affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a River; expreſſing alſo the Region, out of which this River ſprang, which he calleth Heden; and that Heden is alſo a Country neer unto Charon in Meſopotamia, Ezekiel witneſſeth.

Verſ. 10.

Ezek. 27. 23.

But to all theſe Cabaliſts, which draw the Truth and Story of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius anſwereth in theſe words; Si Paradiſus non eſt ſenſibilis, non eſt etiam fons; ſi non eſt fons, non eſt flumen; ſi non eſt flumen, non ſunt quatuor principia, non Piſon, non Gehon, non Trigis, nec Euphrates; non eſt ficus, non folia, non comedit Eva de arbore, non eſt Adam, non ſunt homines, ſed veritas jam fabula eſt, & omnia ad Allegorias revocantur; If Paradiſe be not ſenſible, then there was no fountain, and then no river; if no river, then no ſuch four heads or branches, and then not any ſuch river, as Piſon, or Gehon, Tigris, or Euphrates; no ſuch fig-tree, or fruit, or leaves; Eve then did not eat of the fruit, neither was there any Adam, or any man, the truth was but a fable, and all things eſteemed are called back into Allegories. Words to the ſame effect hath S. Hierome upon Daniel: Contiteſcant eorum deliramenta, qui umbras & imagines in veritate ſequentes, ipſam conantur evertere veritatem, ut Paradiſum & flumina, & arbores putent Allegoriæ Legibus ſe debere ſubruere: Let the dotage of them be ſilent, who following ſhadows and images in the Truth, endeavour to ſubvert the Truth it ſelf, and think that they ought to bring Paradiſe, and the Rivers, and the Trees, under the Rules of Allegory.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Story, is the place made more manifeſt. For, God gave Adam free liberty to eat of every Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of knowledg excepted) which Trees Moſes in the ninth Verſe ſaith that they were good to eat; meaning the fruit which they bare. Beſides, God left all beaſts to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and theſe beaſts were neither in the third heaven, nor neer the circle of the Moon, nor beaſts in imagination: for if all theſe things were Enigmatical or myſtical, the ſame might alſo be ſaid of the creation of all things. And Ezechiel, ſpeaking of the glory of the Aſſyrian Kings, uſeth this ſpeech: All the Trees of Eden, which were in the Garden of God, envied him; which proveth both Eden, and Paradiſe therein ſeated, to be terreſtrial: for the Prophets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple style, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, than in any other place of Scripture; of purpose, to take away all scruple from the incredulity of future ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of Prophecy) to be apt to fabulous inventions; and that if he had not described both the Region and the Rivers, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the unbelieving Israelites, and others after them, would have misconstrued this Story of Man-kind. And, is it likely, there would have been so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the same had been an Utopia? For we find that the Valley, wherein Sodome and Gomorrah stood, Gen. 13.10 (sometimes called Pentapolis, of the five principal Cities therein) was before the destruction (which their unnatural sin purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the Land of Egypt toward Zoar: In like manner was Israel resembled to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonians wasted it: which proveth plainly, that Paradise it self, exceeded in beauty and fertility, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof: being compared to a seat and soil of far exceeding excellency.

Besides, whence had Homer his invention of Alcinous Gardens, as Justin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gen. 2. And whence are their praises of the Elizian fields, but out of the Story of Paradise? To which also appertain those Verses of Ovid. Met. l. 1. the Golden Age in Ovid:

Ver erat æternum; placidique tepentibus auris,
Mulcebant Zephyri natos sine semine flores.

The joyfull Spring did ever last,
And Zephyrus did breed
Sweet flowers by his gentle blast,
Without the help of Seed.

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hesiodus, and Homer, and, after him, Ovid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their Sectators, did greatly enrich their Inventions, by venting the stoln Treasures of Divine Letters, altered by prophane additions, and disguised by poetical conversions, as if they had been conceived out of their own speculations and contemplations.

But besides all these testimonies, if we find what Region Heden, or Eden was; if we prove the River that ran out of it, and that the same afterwards was divided into four Branches; together with the kingdoms of Havila, and Cush; and that all these are Eastward from Canaan, or the Desarts of the Amorites, where Moses wrote; I then conceive that there is no man that will doubt, but that such a place there was. And yet I do not exclude the Allegorical sense of the Scripture; for as well in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the old Testament throughout: the Story being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (saith Saint Augustine) Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententiæ: una est eorum, qui tantummodò corporaliter Paradisum intelligi volunt: alia eorum, qui spiritualiter tantùm (id est) Ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui utroque modo Paradisum accipiunt; (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of those men, which will have it altogether corporal: a second of those, which conceive it altogether spiritual, and to be a figure of the Church: the third of those, which take it in both senses; which third Opinion, S. Augustine approveth, and of which Suidas giveth this allowable judgment: Quemadmodum homo sensibilis, & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & hujus sanctissimum nemus sensibile simul & intelligibile, & duplici specie est præditum; (that is) As man was created at one time, both sensible, and intelligible; so was this holy Grove, or Garden, to be taken both ways, and endued with a double form. Aug. de Civit. Dei. l. 13. c. 21. Suidas in verbo Paradisus.

§. IV.

Why it should be needfull to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

BUt it may be objected, that it is needless, and a kind of curiosity to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no use. To which I answer, that there is nothing written in the Scripture, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Story be necessary, then by the place proved, the same is also made more apparent. For if we should conceive that Paradise were not on the Earth, but lifted up as high as the Moon; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the known World; from whence, Adam was said to wade through the Sea, and thence to have come into Judea, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the World, that would give any credit unto it. For what could seem more ridiculous than the report of such a place? and besides, what maketh this seat of Paradise so much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Pishon should be Ganges, which watereth the East India; and Gehon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt: and these two Rivers so far distant, as (except (except all the World were Paradise) these streams can no way be comprised therein?

Secondly, if the birth and works, and death of our Saviour, were said to have been in some such Countrey, of which no man ever heard tell, and that his Miracles had been performed in the Air, or no place certainly known: I assure my self, that the Christian Religion would have taken but a slender root in the minds of men: for times and places are approved witnesses of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we should relie, or give place to the judgment of some Writers upon this place of Genesis (though otherwise for their doctrine in general, they are worthy of honour and reverence) I say that there is no Fable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would believe that there were a piece of the World so set by it self, and separated, as to hang in the Air under the circle of the Moon? or who so doltish to conceive, that from thence the four Rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tygris, should fall down, and run under all the Ocean, and rise up again in this our habitable world, and in those places where they are now found? Which lest any man think that I enforce, or strain to the worst, these are Peter Comestor's own words. Est autem locus amœnissimus, longo terræ & maris tractu à nostra habitabili Zona secretus, adeò elevatus, ut usque ad lunarem globum attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, severed from our habitable Zone, by a long tract of Land and Sea, elevated so, that it reacheth to the globe of the Moon.

Bart. converted by Masius.

And Moses Barcephas upon this place writeth in this manner: Deinde hoc quoque responsum volumus, Paradisum multò sublimiore positum esse regione, atque hæc nostra extet terra, eòque fieri ut illinc per præcipitium delabantur fluvii tanto cum impetu, quantum verbis exprimere non possis; eóque impetu impulsi pressique sub Oceani vado rapiuntur, unde rursus prosiliant ebullidntque in hoc à nobis culto orbe: which have this sense: Furthermore (saith he) we give this for an answer, that Paradise is set in a Region far raised above this part which we inhabit; whereby it comes to pass, that from thence these Rivers fall down with such a headlong violence, as words cannot express; and with that force so impulsed and prest, they are carried under the deep Ocean, and do again rise and boil up in this our habitable World: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephram, which is this: Ephram dicit, Paradisum ambire terram, atque ultra Oceanum ita positum esse, ut totum terrarum orbem ab omni circumdet Regione, non aliter atque Lunæ orbis Lunam cingit; (which is) That Paradise doth compass or embrace the whole Earth, and is so set beyond the Ocean Sea, as it environeth the whole Orbe of the Earth on every side, as the Orbe of the Moon doth embrace the Moon. To the end therefore that these ridiculous Expositions and Opinions do not bring question unto Truth it self, or make the same subject to doubts or disputes, it is necessary to discover the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisdom appointed in the very Navel of this our World, and (as Melanchon saies) in parte Terræ meliore, in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a Center, the Universal might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, we shall the better judge of the beginning of Nations, and of the Worlds inhabitation: for near unto this did the Sons of Noah also disperse themselves after the Floud, into all other remote Regions and Countreys. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their own forefathers have come, and out of what Regions and Nations; it cannot be displeasing to understand the place of our first Ancestor, from whence all the streams and branches of Mankind have followed and been deduced. If then it do appear by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be unprofitable, it followeth in order to examine several Opinions before remembred, by the Truth it self; and to see how they agree with the sense of the Scripture, and with common Reason; and afterward to prove directly, and to delineate the Region in which God first planted this delightfull Garden.

§. V.

That the Floud hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

AND first, whereas it is supposed by Aug. Chysamensis, that the Floud hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no man can find any mark or memory thereof (of which opinion there were others also, ascribing to the Floud the cause of those high Mountains, which are found on all the Earth over, with many other strange effects): for mine own opinion, I think neither the one, nor the other to be true. For although I cannot deny, but that the face of Paradise was after the Floud withered, and grown old, in respect of the first beauty (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed): yet if there had been no sign of any such place, or if the soil and seat had not remained, then would would not Moſes, who wrote of Paradiſe about 850 years after the Floud, have deſcribed it ſo particularly, and the Prophets long after Moſes, would not have made ſo often mention thereof. And though the very Garden it ſelf were not then to be found, but that the Floud, and other accidents of time made it one common field and paſture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is ſtill the ſame, and the Rivers ſtill remain the ſame Rivers. By two of which (never doubted of) to wit, Tygris, and Euphrates, we are ſure to find in what longitude Paradiſe lay; and learning out one of theſe Rivers, which afterward doth divide it ſelf into four branches, we are ſure that the partition is at the very border of the Garden it ſelf. For it

Gen. 2.10. is written, that out of Eden went a River to water the Garden, and from thence it was divided, and became into four heads; Now, whether the word in the Latine Tranſlation (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it ſelf, or to Paradiſe; yet the diviſion, and branching of thoſe Rivers, muſt be in the North, or South ſide of the very Garden (if the Rivers run as they do, North and South) and therefore theſe Rivers yet remaining, and Eden manifeſtly known, there could be no ſuch defacing by the Floud, as is ſuppoſed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be ſo altered, as future ages knew it not, ſo is there no probability that either theſe Rivers were turned out of their courſes, or new Rivers created by the Floud which were not, or that the Floud (as aforeſaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decreaſe, was the cauſe of high Hills, or deep Valleys. For what deſcent of waters could there be in a Spherical and round body, wherein there is nor high nor low? ſeeing that all violent force of waters is either by the ſtrength of wind, by deſcent from a higher to a lower, or by the Ebb or Floud of the Sea. But that there was any wind (whereby the Seas are moſt enraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrary is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a wind
Gen. 8. 1. to paſs upon the Earth, and the waters ceaſed. So as it appeareth not, that, untill the waters ſank, there was any wind at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodneſs, cauſed the wind to blow, to drie up the abundant ſlime and mud of the Earth, and make the Land more firm, and to cleanſe the Air of thick vapours, and unwholſome miſts: and this we know by experience, that all downright rains do evermore diſſever the violence of outragious winds, and beat down, and level the ſwelling and mountainous billows of the Sea: for any Ebbs and Flouds there could be none, when the waters were equal, and of one height over all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraughts, Bays, or Gulfs to receive a Floud, or any deſcent, or violent falling of waters in the round form of the Earth and Waters, as aforeſaid: and therefore it ſeemeth moſt agreeable to reaſon, that the Waters rather ſtood in a quiet calm, than that they moved with any raging or overbearing violence. And for a more direct proof that the Floud made no ſuch deſtroying alteration, Joſephus avoweth that one of thoſe pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be ſeen in his days; which pillars were ſet up above 1426 years before the Floud; counting Seth to be an hundred years old at the erection of them; and Joſeph himſelf to have lived ſome fourty or fifty years after Chriſt: of whom, although there be no cauſe to believe all that he wrote, yet that which he avouched of his own time, cannot (without great derogation) be called in queſtion. And therefore it may be poſſible, that ſome foundation or ruine thereof might then be ſeen. Now, that ſuch pillars were raiſed by Seth, all Antiquity hath avowed. It is alſo written in Beroſus (to whom, although I give little credit, yet I cannot condemn him in all) that the City of Enoch, built by Cain about the mountains of Libanus was not defaced by length of time: yea, the ruines thereof, Annius (who commented upon that invented fragment) ſaith, were to be ſeen in his days, who lived in the reign of Ferdinand and Iſabella of Caſtile. And if theſe his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent: for, ſpeaking of this City of Enoch, he concludeth in this ſort: Cujus maximæ & ingentis molis fundamenta viſuntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Civitas Cain, ut noſtri mercatores, & peregrini referunt; The foundation of which huge maſs is now to be ſeen, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the City of Cain, as both our ſtrangers and Merchants report. It is alſo avowed by Pomponius Mela (to whom I give more credit in theſe things) that the City of Joppa was built before the Floud, over which Cepha was King: whoſe name, with his brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their Religion, was found graven upon certain Altars of ſtone. And it is not impoſſible, that the ruines of this other City, called Enoch by Annius, might be ſeen, though founded in the firſt age: but it could not be of the firſt City of the World, built by Cain; the place rather than the time denying it.

And to prove directly that the Floud was not the cauſe of mountains, but that there were were mountains from the Creation, it is written, that the waters of the Floud overflowed by fifteen Cubits the higheſt Mountains. And Maſius Damaſcenus, ſpeaking of the Floud, writeth in this manner: Eſt ſupra Minyadam excelſus Mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo confugientes multos, ſermo eſt, Diluvii tempore liberatos. And upon Minyada there is an high Mountain in Armenia (called Baris) unto which it is ſaid, that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they ſaved themſelves thereon. Now, although it is contrary to Gods Word, that any more were ſaved than eight perſons (which Maſius doth not avouch, but by report) yet it is a teſtimony, that ſuch Mountains were before the Floud, which were afterward, and ever ſince, known by the ſame names; and on which Mountains it is generally received, that the Ark reſted: but untruly, as I ſhall prove hereafter. And again it appeareth, that the Mount Sion (though by another name) was known before the Floud; on which the Thalmudiſts report, that many Giants ſaved themſelves alſo; but, as Annius ſaith, without all authority, either divine or humane.

Gen. 4. 17.

Laſtly, it appeareth that the Floud did not ſo turn upſide down the face of the earth, as thereby it was made paſt knowledge, after the waters were decreaſed, by this, that when Noah ſent out the Dove the ſecond time, ſhe returned with an Olive leaf in her mouth, which ſhe had pluckt, and which (until the Trees were diſcovered) ſhe found not: for otherwiſe ſhe might have found them floting on the water; a manifeſt proof, that the Trees were not torn up by the roots, nor ſwam upon the waters, for it is written: folium, olivæ raptum, or decerptum, a leaf pluckt, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to tear off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the Floud made no ſuch alteration, as was ſuppoſed, but that the place of Paradiſe might be ſeen to ſucceeding Ages, eſpecially unto Moſes, by whom it pleaſed God to teach the truth of the Worlds Creation, and unto the Prophets which ſucceeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Diſcovery.

Gen. 8. 11.

§. VI.

That Paradiſe was not the whole Earth, as ſome have thought: making the Ocean to be the fountain of thoſe four Rivers.

THis conceit of Aug. Chyſamenſis being anſwered, who onely giveth his opinion for reaſon, I will in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Noviomagus, Vadianus, Goropius, Becanus, and all thoſe that underſtood, that by Paradiſe was meant the whole Earth. But in this I ſhall not trouble the Reader with many words, becauſe by thoſe places of Scripture formerly remembred, this Univerſality will appear altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alledgeth, Bring forth fruit and multiply, Fill the Earth, and ſubdue it, Rule over every Creature, &c. with this of the Acts, And hath made of one bloud all Mankind, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, do no way prove ſuch a generality: for the World was made for man, of which he was Lord and Governour, and all things therein were ordained of God for his uſe. Now, although all men were of one and the ſame fountain of bloud originally; and Adam's Poſterity inhabited in proceſs of time over all the face of the Earth: yet it diſproveth in nothing the particular Garden, aſſigned to Adam, to dreſs and cultive, in which he lived in ſo bleſſed an eſtate before his tranſgreſſion. For if there had been no other choice, but that Adam had been left to the Univerſal; Moſes would not then have ſaid, Eaſtward in Eden, ſeeing the World hath not Eaſt nor Weſt but reſpectively. And to what end had the Angel of God been ſet to keep the Eaſt-ſide, and entrance into Paradiſe after Adam's expulſion, if the Univerſal had been Paradiſe? for then muſt Adam have been chaſed alſo out of the World. For if all the Earth were Paradiſe, that place can receive no better conſtruction than this, That Adam was driven out of the World into the World, and out of Paradiſe into Paradiſe, except we ſhould believe with Metrodorus, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to deny, he thinks all one, as to affirm, That in ſo large a field, as the Univerſal, there ſhould grow but one Thiſtle. Noviomagus upon Beda, ſeemeth to be led by this, that it was impoſſible for thoſe three Rivers, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates (which water three portions of the World ſo far diſtant) to riſe out of one Fountain, except the Ocean be taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.

Gen. 1. 28. Acts 17. 26.

And it is true, that thoſe four Rivers, being ſo underſtood, there could be no conjecture more probable; but it ſhall plainly appear, that Piſon was falſly taken for Ganges, and Gehon falſly for Nilus, although Ganges be a River by Havila in India, and Nilus run through Ethiopia. The Seventy write Chus for Ethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Maniches, and the miſtakings of Noviomagus, Goropius, and Vadianus, with others, are made manifeſt. Yet was their conjecture far more probable, than that of Ephrem, Cyrillus, and Athanasius, That Paradise was seated far beyond the Ocean Sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Countrey in which he was created, and was buried at Mount Calvary in Hierusalem. And certainly, though all those of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many years after the Floud, yet Adam's shinbones must have contained a thousand fathome, and much more, if he had scoorded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needs no argument to disprove it.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moon: and of others which make it higher than the Middle Region of the Air.

THirdly, whereas Beda saith, and as the School-men affirm, Paradise to be a Place altogether removed from the knowledge of men, (locus à cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Barcephas conceived, that Paradise was far in the East, but mounted above the Ocean, and all the Earth, and near the Orbe of the Moon (which opinion, though the School-men charge Beda withall, yet Pererius lays it off from Beda, upon Strabus, and his Master Rabanus:) and whereas Rupertus, in his Geographie of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but finds it seated next or neerest Heaven; It may seem, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates: but neither of them (as I conceive) well understood; who (undoubtedly) took this place for Heaven it self, into which the Souls of the blessed were carried after death.

Diog. Laert. Soc. True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for fear of the Areopagites (in this, and many other divine apprehensions) set down what they believed in plain terms, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death for acknowledging one onely powerfull God; and therefore did the Devil himself do him that right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Justine Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and S. Augustine gave this judgment of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to me, that both Tertullian and Eusebius conceive, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestial Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightfull, and healthfull, upon the top of Mount Atho (called Acrothonos) which being above all Clouds of Rain, or other inconvenience, the people (by reason of their so many years) are called Macrobici (that is) Long-liv'd. A further Argument is used, for proof of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch preserved from the violence of the Floud: approved by Isidore, and Peter Lombard: in which place also Tertullian conceived, that the blessed Souls were preserved till the last Judgment; which Irenæus and Justine Martyr also believed. But this opinion was of all Catholique Divines reproved, and in the Florentine Councel damned; of which Saint Augustine more modestly gave this judgment: Sicut certum est, Enoch & Eliam, nunc vivere: ita ubi nunc sunt, an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certain that Enoch and Elias do now live; so where they live, in Paradise, or elsewhere, it is uncertain. But Barcephas gives a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessary that Paradise should be set at such a distance and height, because the four Rivers (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not have had sufficient force to have thrust themselves under the great Ocean, and afterward have forced their passage through the Earth, and have risen again in the far distant Regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

These strange fancies and dreams have been answered by divers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins, and Pererius, writing upon this subject; of whose arguments I will repeat these few: (for to use long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be judged a vanity in the Answerer, not much inferiour to that of the Inventer.)

It is first therefore alledged, that such a place cannot be commodious to live in: for being set so near the Moon, it had been too near the Sun, and other heavenly bodies. Secondly, because it must have been too joynct a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the Air in that Region is so violently removed, and carried about with such swiftness, as nothing in that place can consist or have abiding. Fourthly, because the space between the Earth and the Moon (according to Ptolemie and Alfraganus) is seventeen times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes in a gross account about one hundred and twenty thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this height, must have the compass of the whole Earth for a Basis and foundation. But had it been so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men, seeing it would deprive us of the the Sun's light, all the fore-part of the day, being ſeated in the Eaſt, as they ſuppoſe. Now, to fortifie the former opinions, Toſtatus addeth this, that thoſe people which dwell neer thoſe fals of waters, are deaf from their infancy, like thoſe that dwell neer the Catadupæ, or over-fals of Nilus. But this I hold as feigned. For I have ſeen in the Indies, far greater water-fals, then thoſe of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling neer them are not deaf at all. Toſtatus (the better to ſtrengthen himſelf) citeth Baſil and Ambroſe together: to which Pererius, Sed ego hæc apud Baſilium & Ambroſium in eorum ſcriptis, quæ nunc extant, nuſquam me legere memini; But I do not remember (ſaith he) that I ever read thoſe things either in Baſil or Ambroſe.

Cicero Somn. Scip.

But for the bodies of Enoch and Elias, God hath diſpoſed of them according to his wiſdom. Their taking up might be into the celeſtial Paradiſe, for ought we know. For although fleſh and bloud, ſubject to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdom of Heaven, and the ſeed muſt rot in the ground before it grow, yet we ſhall not all die (ſaith Saint Paul) but all ſhall be changed: which change in Enoch and Elias, was eaſie to him that is Almighty. But for the reſt, the Scriptures are manifeſt, that by the Floud all periſhed on the earth, ſaving eight perſons; and therefore in the terreſtrial Paradiſe they could not be.

1 Cor. 15. 36. 51.

1 Pet. 3. 20.

For Toſtatus his own opinion, who ſoared not altogether ſo high as the reſt, but believed that Paradiſe was raiſed above the middle Region of the Ayr, and twenty cubits above all Mountains, that the Floud did not therefore reach it (which Scotus and other latter School-men alſo believed; for, ſay they, there were no ſinners in Paradiſe, and therefore no cauſe to over-whelm it:) this is alſo contrary to the expreſs letter of the Scripture, which directly, and without admitting of any diſtinction, teacheth us, that the waters over-flowed all the mountains under heaven. And were it otherwiſe, then might we aſwell give credit to Maſius Damaſcenus, and the Thalmudiſts, who affirm, that there were of the Gyants that ſaved themſelves on the Mountain Baris, and on Sion. But to help this, Scotus being (as the reſt of the School-men are) full of diſtinction, ſaith; That the waters ſtood at Paradiſe, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Jordan; and as the Floud was not natural, ſo was Paradiſe ſaved by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifieth this high conceit with this ſuppoſition, That it was not believed, that Paradiſe was ſo ſeated, as Beda and others ſeem to affirm in words, but by Hyperbole and comparatively, for the delicacy and beauty ſo reſembled.

Gen. 7. 19.

Exod. 14. 21.

But this I dare avow of all thoſe School-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better teach all their Followers to ſhift, then to reſolve, by their diſtinctions. Wherefore not to ſtay long in anſwering this opinion of Toſtatus, I confeſs that it is written, that the Mountains of Olympus, Atho, and Atlas, over-reach and ſurmount all winds and clouds, and that (notwithſtanding) there is found on the heads of the Hills both ſprings and fruits; and the Pagan Prieſts, ſacrificing on theſe mountain-tops, do not find the aſhes (remaining of their ſacrifices) blown thence, nor thence waſh'd off by rains, when they return: yet experience hath reſolved us, that theſe reports are fabulous; and Pliny himſelf (who was not ſparing in the report of wonders) avoweth the contrary. But were it granted, yet the height of theſe Mountains is far under the ſuppoſed place of Paradiſe; and on theſe ſelf-Hills the ayr is ſo thin (ſaith S. Auguſtine, whom herein I miſtruſt) that it is not ſufficient to bear up the body of a bird, having therein no feeling of her wings, or any ſenſible reſiſtance of ayr to mount her ſelf by.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that ſeat Paradiſe under the Æquinoctial: and of the pleaſant habitation under thoſe Climats.

THoſe which come neerer unto Reaſon, find Paradiſe under the Æquinoctial line, as Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus: judging, that there-under might be found moſt pleaſure, and the greateſt fertility of ſoil: but againſt it Thomas Aquinas objecteth the diſtemperate heat, which he ſuppoſeth to be in all places ſo directly under the Sun. But this is (non cauſa pro cauſa,) for although Paradiſe could not be under the Line, becauſe Eden is far from it, in which Paradiſe was; and becauſe there is no part of Euphrates, Tygris, or Ganges under it (Ganges being one of the four rivers, as they ſuppoſe) yet this conceit of diſtemper (being but an old opinion) is found to be very untrue, though for the conjecture not to be condemned, conſidering the age when thoſe Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that every Country, as it lay by degrees neerer the Tropick, and ſo toward the Æquinoctial, did ſo much the more exceed in heat; it was therefore a reaſonable conjecture, that thoſe Countries which were ſituated directly under it, were of a diſtemper uninhabitable: but it ſeemeth that Tertullian conceived better, and so did Avicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in those days it might be thought a fantastical opinion (as all are which go against the vulgar) yet we now find, that if there be any place upon the earth of that nature, beauty, and delight that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed uninhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and neerest to the Line it self. For hereof Experience hath informed Reason, and Time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden and could not by any contemplation be discovered. Indeed, it hath so pleased God to provide for all living creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that such inconveniences which we contemplate a far off, are found by tryal and the witness of mens travails, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vain, or as a fruitless lump to fashion out the rest. For God himself (saith Esay) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we find that these hottest Regions of the world, seated under the Æquinoctial line, or neer it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of Easterly wind (which the Spaniards call the Brize) that doth evermore blow strongest in the heat of the day, as the down-right beams of the Sun cannot so much master it, that there is any inconvenience or distemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh, and equal, by reason of the entire interposition of the earth, as (for those places which my self have seen, neer the Line and under it) I know no other part of the World of better, or equal temper: Only there are some tracts, which by accident of high Mountains are barr'd from this ayr and fresh wind, and some few sandy parts without trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of soils we find also in all other parts of the world. But (for the greatest part) those Regions have so many goodly Rivers, Fountains, and little Brooks, aboundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees, casting shade; so many sorts of delicate fruits, ever bearing, and at all times beautified with blossom and fruit both green and ripe, as it may of all other parts be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughs and branches are never unclothed and left naked, their sap creepeth not under ground into the root, fearing the injury of the frost: neither doth Pomona any time despise her withered Husband Vertumnus, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countries called Terræ vitiosæ, Vicious Countries: for Nature being liberal to all without labour, necessity imposing no industry or travel, idleness bringeth forth no other fruits then vain thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that, to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion, were not deceived in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who misliked this opinion, and followed a worse; and (to say the truth) all the School-men were gross in this particular.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Cœlosyria, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proved, out of Esa. 37. and Ezek. 27.

THese opinions answered, and the region of Eden not found in any of those imaginary worlds, nor under Torrida Zona; it followeth that now we discover and find out the seat thereof, for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficulty of which search resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations have often changed names with their Masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembred, forgotten by those names of all Historians and Geographers, as well antient as modern.

Besides, we find that the Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians (Cyrus only and a few other excepted) sought to extinguish the Hebrews. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romans despised, once to remember them in any of their Stories. And as those three Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they transform the names of all those principal Places and Cities in the East: And after them, the Turk hath sought (what he could) to extinguish in all things, the antient memory of those people, which he hath subjected and inthralled.

Now besides those notable marks, Euphrates and Tygris, the better to find the way which leadeth to the Country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two Considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and Judæa; and, that it was of all other the most beautiful and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to Judea Eastward was Arabia Petræa; but in this Region was Moses himself when he wrote: and the next unto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desart, both which in respect of the infertility could not be Eden; neither have any of the Arabians any such Rivers, as are expres'd to run out of it: So as it followeth of necessity, that Eden must be Eastward, and and beyond both Arabia Petræa, and Deſerta. But becauſe Eden is by Moſes named by it ſelf, and by the fertility, and the rivers only deſcribed, we muſt ſeek it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour-Nations better deſcribed. In the Prophet Iſay, I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countries, in theſe words, ſpoken in the perſon of Senacherib by Rabſakeh: Have the gods of the Nations delivered them, which my Fathers have deſtroyed; as Goſan, and Haran, and Reſeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telaſſar? and in Ezechiel, where he prophecieth againſt the Tyrians: They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Aſhur, and Chilmad, were thy Merchants, &c.

Iſai. 77. v. 12.

Cap. 27. v. 23.

But to avoid confuſion, we muſt underſtand that there were two Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembreth, where he divideth Syria into three Provinces, whereof the firſt he maketh Syria Damaſcene, or Decapolitan: the ſecond part is that Valley called Avenis, otherwiſe Convallis, or the tract of Chamath, where Aſſyria is joyned to Arabia the Deſart, and where Ptolemie placeth the City of Averia: and the third is knowen by the name of Domus Edenis, or Cœlo-Syria, otherwiſe Vallis cava, or the hollow Valley, becauſe the mountains of Libanus and Anti-Libanus, take all the length of it on both ſides, and border it: for Cœle in Greek is Cava in Latine. But this is not that Eden, which we ſeek: neither doth this Province lie Eaſt from Canaan, but North, and ſo joyneth unto it, as it could not be unknown to the Hebrews. Yet, becauſe there is a little City therein called Paradiſe, the Jews believed this Cœlo-Syria to be the ſame which Moſes deſcribeth. For the ſame cauſe doth Hopkins in his Treatiſe of Paradiſe reprehend Beroaldus, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradiſe, though, to give Beroaldus his right, I conceive that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other later Writers, ſaving, That he failed in diſtinguiſhing theſe two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether miſ-underſtood two of the four Rivers (to wit) Piſon and Gehon, as ſhall appear hereafter. Now to find out Eden, (which as Moſes teacheth us) lay Eaſtward from the Deſarts, where he wrote, after he had paſſed the Red-Sea; we muſt conſider where thoſe other Countries are found, which the Prophet Iſaiah and Ezechiel joyneth with it. For (ſaith Iſaiah) Goſan, Haran, and Reſeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telaſſar. Alſo Ezechiel joyneth Haran with Eden, who together with thoſe of Sheba, Aſhur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the City of Tyre, which was then (ſaith Ezechiel) The Mart of the people for many Iſles. And it hath ever been the cuſtom, that the Perſians conveyed their Merchandiſe to Babylon, and to thoſe Cities upon Euphrates, and Tygris, and from thence tranſported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterrane Sea: as in ancient times to the City of Tyre, afterward to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Iſſicus, now Lajazzo. Ezechiel in the deſcription of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the Eaſt, as the onely Mart-town of that part of the World, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and alſo what commodities every Country yielded; and having counted the ſeveral People and Countreys, he addeth the particular Trade, which each of them exerciſed: They were thy Merchants (ſaith the Prophet) in all ſorts of things, in rayments of blue Silk, and of broydered works, fine Linnen, Coral, and Pearl: and afterwards ſpeaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and what kinds they traded, he hath theſe words: The Merchants of Sheba, and Raamah were thy Merchants, they occupied in thy Fairs, with the chief of all Spices, and with all pretious Stones, and Gold. Now, theſe be indeed the riches which Perſia and Arabia Fœlix yield: and becauſe Sheba and Raamah are thoſe parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Perſian Gulf, therefore did thoſe Nations both vent ſuch Spice, ſweet Gumms, and Pearls, as their own Countries yielded: and (withall) having trade with their Neighbors of India, had from them alſo all ſorts of Spices, & plenty of Gold. The better to convey theſe commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebans, or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tygris, and from the City of Terredon, (built or enlarged by Nebuchodonozor, now called Balſara) thence ſent up all theſe rich Merchandizes by Boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as far as it bended Weſtward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reached within three days journey of Aleppo, and then over Land they paſt to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripoly, (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforeſaid. Now, the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezechiel joyneth with Eden, inhabited far up the River, and received this trade from Arabia and India, beſides thoſe proper commodities which themſelves had, and which they received out of Perſia, which bordered them. Saint Hierome underſtandeth by Cannch, Selencia, which is ſeated upon Euphrates, Euphrates, where it breaketh into four heads, and which took that name from Seleucus, who made thereof a magnificent City. Hierosolymitanus thinks it to be Ctesiphon: but Ctesiphon is seated down low upon Tygris, and Canneh cannot be on that side. I mean, on the East-side of Tygris; for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Plinie placeth the Schenitæ upon Euphrates, where the same beginneth to be foordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaveth to be the bound of Arabia the Desart, and where the River of Euphrates reflecteth from the Desart of Palmirena: for these people of Canneh (afterward Schenitæ) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselves, from their own City of Canneh in Shinar, Westward along the banks of Euphrates, as far as the City of Thapsacus, where Ptolemy appointed the Foords of Euphrates: which also agreeth with the description of the Schenitæ by Strabo, whose words are these: Mercatoribus ex Syria Seleuciam, & Babyloniam euntibus iter est per Schenitas; The Merchants which travel from Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore those that take Canneh for Charran, do much mistake it. For Charran, to which Abraham came from Ur in Chaldea (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia; not upon Euphrates it self, but upon the River of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Ezechiel (as) They of Haran and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Asher, and Chilmad, were thy Merchants. Wherefore Charran, which is sometimes called Charre, and Haran, and Aran, is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; and when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the Region of Mesopotamia; or Aran fluviorum, the Greek word (Mesopotamia) importing, A countrey between Rivers: for Mesos in Greek, is medius in Latine, and Potamos, fluvius. And when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the City it self, to which Abraham came from Ur (as aforesaid.) For Strabo in the description of Arabia, giveth that tract of Land from the borders of Cœlosyria, to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Schenitæ, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates, and were in after-ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabit Batanea, and the North part of the Desarts, stretching themselves toward the inhabited solitude of Palmirena, which lieth between Syria, and Arabia the Desart. So as these of Canneh lay in the very high-way from Babylon to Tyre, and were neighbours (in different) to Charran, and to Eden: and therfore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, &c. But S. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneh, or Chalne, by Seleucia: for Seleucia was antiently called Chalanne (witness Appian) and so Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries upon Genesis; the name by time and mixture of Languages being changed from Chalne, or Canneh, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other Cities, standing in Triangle with Seleucia, and almost the next unto it (as) Thelbe-Canne, and Mann-Canne, the one a little to the West of Seleucia, and the other opposite unto it; where these Rivers of Tygris and Euphrates are ready to joyn. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canne was (being all three within the bound of the Valley Shinar) it is uncertain: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certain seat thereof, that so many other Cities did retain a part of the name in so many ages after. Neither is it unlikely, that these additions of Thelbe and Man to the word Canne, were but to make difference between the East and the West, or the greater and the less Canne, or between Canne the old and the new: which additions to distinguish Cities by, are ordinary in all the Regions of the World.

Gen. 11. 31.

Now of the other City joyned with Eden, as Haran, or Charran, S. Hierome on the Judges speaketh thereof in these words: Cumque reverterentur, pervenerunt ad Charran, quæ est in medio itinere contra Ninevem, undecimo die; When they returned, they came to Charran (which is the mid-way against Nineveh) the eleventh day. Judg. 1.

This City is by the Martyr Stephen, named Charran (speaking to the High-Priest:) Ye Men, Brethren, and Fathers, hearken: the God of glory appeared to our Father Abraham, while he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran. But the seat of this City is not doubted of: for it is not only remembred in many Scriptures, but withall exceeding famous for the death and overthrow of Crassus the Romane, who for his unsatiable greedines, was called Gurges avaritiæ; the Gulf of avarice. Whereof Lucan: Acts 7. 1.

Assyrias Latio maculavit sanguine Carras. Lucan. l. 1. 105.

With Roman bloud th'Assyrian Carre he defil'd.

But this City Canne, or Chalne, is made manifest by Moses himself, where it is written of Nimrod: And the beginning of his Kingdoms was Babel, & Erech, and Acad, and Chaln, in the Land of Sinaar, or Shinar: where Moses sheweth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what Cities and People were subject unto Nimrod; all which lay in the Gen. 10. 10.

the said Valley of Shinar, or near it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldea, into which also Eden stretcheth it self, Chaldæa, Babylonia, Sinar, idem sunt (saith Comestor.) Three names of one Countrey: which Region of Babylonia, took name of the Tower Babel; and the Tower of the confusion of Tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proved in the eleventh Chapter of Genesis, in these words: And as they went from the East, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinar, and there they Verse 2. abode: in which Plain Babylon was built (as aforesaid.)

Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Canneh, in the first beginning of Nimrod's greatness, and before he had subdued any strange, or far-off Nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proveth that Canneh joyneth to Babylonia; which also Ezechiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth that those of Eden were also the Merchants which traded with the Tyrians: and Isaiah in the threats of Senacherib against Jerusalem (with other Nations that Senacherib vaunted that his Fathers had destroyed) nameth the children of Verse 7. Eden which were at Telassar. But before I conclude where Eden it self lyeth, it is necessary to describe those other Countreys, which Ezechiel joyneth therewith, in the places before remembred, as, those of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Genesis the tenth: Moreover the Sons of Ham were Cush, &c. And the Sons of Cush were Seba, and Havila and Sabtah, and Raamah, &c. And the Sons of Raamah were Sheba, &c. and anon after; Cush begat Nimrod: so as Sheba was the grand-child of Cush, and Nimrod the Son of Cush, whose elder brother was Sebah: though some there are that conceive to the contrary, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and understanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Raamah or Regma took that part adjoyning to Shinar, toward the Sea side and Persian gulf (called afterwards Raama and Sheba, by the Father and his Sons, which possessed it.) For (saith Ezechiel) the Merchants of Raamah and Sheba were thy Merchants, they occupied in thy fairs with the chief of all Spices, and all precious Stones, and Gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Countrey, which parteth Arabia Deserta Strabo. l. 16. from Arabia Fœlix, and which joyneth to the Sea where Tygris and Euphrates fall out, and render themselves to the Ocean. This part, and the confining Countrey, Strabo calleth Catabria, where the best Myrrhe and Frankincense is gathered: which people have an interchange or trade with Elana, lying on the East-side of the Persian gulf. By this it appeareth who were the Shebeans spoken of by Ezechiel, and said to have been the Merchants of Tyre, for Gold, Spices, and precious Stones: of which they had not onely plenty of their own, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromatiques, and other proper commodities. For, as Strabo reporteth out of Eratosthenes, In Persicæ oræ initio Insula est, in qua multi & pretiosi uniones gignantur: in aliis verò, clari & perlucidi lapilli. Eratosthenes (saith Strabo) affirmeth, that, In the beginning of the Persian gulf, there is an Island, in which there are many precious Pearls bred: and in other, very clear and shining Stones. Now, the difference between Sheba the Son of Raamah, and Seba the Son of Cush, is in this, That Seba is written with the Hebrew (Samech;) and Sheba with (Schin:) but whatsoever the difference may be in the Hebrew Orthography, their Countreys and Habitations are diverse. For Sheba is that which bordereth the Persian Sea, and Saba (whence the Queen of Saba) neighboured the Red-Sea; and so that place of the 72 Psalm expounded Reges Arabum & Sabæ, hath in the Hebrew this sense: Reges Shebæ & Sabæ.

The Shebans, Ezechiel nameth together with the Edenites, because they inhabited upon the Out-let of the same River, upon which the Edenites were seated: and so those of Sheba, towards the Sea-coast, and upon it, past up the Countrey, by Tygris and Euphrates, being joyned in one main stream, and so through the Region of Eden, which Tygris boundeth, thereby the better to convey their merchandise toward Tyre. And as the Cities of Charran, and Channeh, border Eden on the West and North-west: so doth Sheba on the South, and Chilmad on the North-east: Chilmad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldean Paraphrast; which Countrey, by the Geographers is called Coromitena, (L) placed by exchange for (R) which change the Hebrews also often use.

Thus much of those Counnries which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chief were the Edenites, inhabiting Telassar: for these Senacherib vaunted, that his Fathers had destroyed; and this place of Telassar lay most convenient, both to receive the Trade from Sheba and Arabia, and also to convey it over into Syria, and to Tyrus. Now, to make these things the more plain, we must remember, that that before the death of Senacherib, many parts of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death these Monarchies were utterly dis-joyned.

For it appeareth both in Esay the 37. and in the second of Kings. by the threats of Rabsache, the while the Army of Assyria lay before Jerusalem, that the Cities of Gosan, Haran, Reseph, and the Edenites at Telassar, had resisted the Assyrians: though by them (in a sort) mastered and recovered. Have the Gods of the Nations delivered them whom my Fathers have destroyed as Gosan, and Haran, Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar? But it appeared manifestly after Senacherib's death, that those Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others subjection: for Esar-Haddon held Assyria; and Merodach Baladan, Babylonia. And after that the Army of Senacherib, commanded by Rabsache which lay before Jerusalem (Hezekias then reigning) while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the Angel of God destroyed; the King of Babel sent to Hezekias, both to congatulate the recovery of his health, and his victory obtained over the Assyrians. After which overthrow, Senacherib himself was slain by his own sons in the Temple of his Idols, Esar-Haddon succeeding him in Assyria. To the Babylonian Ambassadours sent by Merodach, Hezekias shewed all his treasures as well proper as consecrate, which invited the Kings of Babylon afterward to undertake their conquest and subversion. So as, the suspition of war encreasing between Babylon and Assyria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Assyria, were employed to bear off the incursions of the Assyrians; and their Garrison-place was at Telassar: and the very word (Telassar) saith Junius, signifying as much as a Bulwork against the Assyrians. This place Hierosolymitanus takes for Resem, others for Seleucia: but this Telassar is the same, which Am. Marcellinus in the History of Julian (whom he followed in the enterprize of Persia) calleth Thilutha in stead of Telassar, who describeth the exceeding strength thereof in his 24. Book: It is seated in an Island of Euphrates upon a steep and unassaultable Rock, in so much as the Emperour Julian durst not attempt it; and therefore it was a convenient place for a Garrison against the Assyrians, being also a passage out of Mesopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the Country adjoyning were lodged to defend the same. This place Ptolemy calleth Teridata, having Reseph (which he calleth Resepha) on the left hand; and Canneh, (which he calleth Thelbe-Canne) on the right hand; not far from whence is also found the City of Mann-Canne) upon Tygris; and all these seated together, as Esay and Ezechiel have sorted them. But the understanding of these places is the more difficult, because Assyria (which the Chaldeans call Atturia) and Mesopotamia, were so often confounded; the one taken for the other by interchanging of Dominion. Assyria & Mesopotamia in Babyloniæ nomen transierunt (saith Niger,) Assyria and Mesoptamia took the name of Babyliona. Lastly, it appeareth by those adjacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what part of the World Eden is seated, as, by Charran or Haran in Mesopotamia: also by Canneh and Reseph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in these words translateth this place: Plantaverat autem JEHOVAH Deus hortum in Eden, ab Oriente; The Lord God planted a Garden in Eden Eastward: that is (saith he in his Annotations) Jusserat nasci arbores in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabiæ & Mesopotamiæ; He commanded Trees to grow in Eden, an Eastern Region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

Of divers other testimonies of the Land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

AND for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it seemes by the two Epistles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabit Mesopotamia: which Epistles in the year 1552. they sent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch, and Andræas Masius hath published them, translated out of Syriac into Latine. By these Epistles (I say) it seemes we may have some farther light for the proof of that, which we have said about the Region of Eden in those parts. For in them both, there is mention of the Island of Eden in the River Tygris, or at least, Tygris in both these Epistles is called the River of Eden. This Island, as Masius in his Preface to these Epistles saith, is commanly called Gozoria (as it were, The Island, by an eminency.) It hath (saith he) ten miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the Island Eden may (doubtless) remaine to this day; though in the rest of the Region so called, this name be swallowed up with the fame of those flourishing Kingdoms of Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, and Chaldea. This Island of Eden hath up the River, and not far beyond it, the City of Hasan-Cepha, otherwise Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Mosal or Mosel, from which (as in that which which followeth it ſhall appear out of Maſius) it is not above twelve miles diſtant. Neither is it to trouble us, That Moſal or Moſel, by Marius Niger is remembred among the Cities higher up Tygris, in theſe words, Juxta autem Tygrim, Civitates ſunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, quæ nunc Moſel dicitur; magna ſanè, &c. (that is) By Tygris are theſe Cities, Dorbeta neer unto mount Taurus (which is now called Moſel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, diſplacing Moſel, and making it to be Dorbeta (I ſay) needs not here to trouble us: ſeeing for this matter, the teſtimony of Maſius, informed by the Chriſtians that dwelt there (the Seat of whoſe Patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, avowing that this Moſal (or Mozal) is in the Confines of Meſopotamia and Aſſyria, ſeated upon Tygris, and in the neighbour-hood of Nineve; and that it is the famous Seleucia Parthorum. The Neſtorian Chriſtians in their former Epiſtle, call it Attur in theſe words: Ex omnibus civitatibus & pagis quæ ſunt circum Civitatem Moſel (hoc eſt) Attur, in vicinia Nineves; Of all the Cities and Townes which are about the City of Moſal (that is) Attur in the neighbour-hood of Nineve. As alſo Niger acknowledgeth Cteſiphon a City thereabout to be called Aſſur, (which is the ſame as Attur, after the Dialect of thoſe Nations, which change Sh into T.) Neither is it much that he ſhould miſtake Cteſiphon, (which is not far off Seleucia) for Seleucia, to be Aſſur. By this then we may come ſomewhat near the end of our purpoſe. For the Iſle of Eden, which lieth in the breſt of Tygris, is but twelve miles from Moſal, and that antient City, which Ptolemy and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures Nineve; Philoſtratus, and Simeon Sethi, Moſula, and John Lean, Moſal, others Moſſe, (though it be not the ſame with Moſal) is ſet but a little higher upon the ſame River of Tygris, near Moſal: ſo that we are like to find this Iſle of Eden hereabout. For the ſame Andræas Maſius, which placeth it above Moſal, makes it to be below Haſan-Cepha, which is upon the ſame River of Tygris.

The only difficulty is this, that ſome perhaps may think, that the words of the Neſtorians in both their Epiſtles, ſpeak not of any Iſle in Tygris, called the Iſle of Eden, but of an Iſle in Tygris, a River of Eden. But this ſenſe of their words in my opinion ſeemeth the more unprobable. And yet, if this were the meaning here, we have a teſtimony from the Learned of thoſe parts, that not only Euphrates, but alſo Tygris was a River of Eden, and that the name of Eden in thoſe parts is not yet quite worn out, though the Region hath been ſubject to the ſame change; that all other Kingdoms of the world have been, and hath by conqueſt and corruption of other Languages, received new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which ſtretcheth over Euphrates, was after the Floud called Shiner, and then, of the Tower of Babel, Babylonia; and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Meſopotamia, Aſſyria, and Armenia, which imbraceth both the banks of Tygris between Mount Taurus, and Seleucia. And of this Region of Eden that antient Æthicus maketh mention, (not that latter Æthicus, Diſciple of Gallinicus, otherwiſe by Plutarch and Athæneus called Iſtri, who lived in Egypt in the Reign of Philadelphus; but another of a far higher and remote time) the ſame being made Latine out of the Greek by Saint Hierom. And though by corruption of the antient Copie it be written, in Æthicus, Adonis for Edenis: yet Adonis being a River of Phœnicia, cannot be underſtood to be the Region named by Æthicus. For Æthicus makes it a Country, and not a River, and joyneth it with Meſopotamia and Æthiopia, calling the land of Chus Æthiopia, after the Vulgar, and Septuagint. And laſtly, the River which watereth the Regions (ſaith Æthicus) falleth into the Gulf of Perſia: which River he called Armodius for Tygris; Tygris being but a name impoſed for the ſwiftneſs thereof. And out of Armenia, both Tygris and Euphrates have their original: for out of Eden came a River, or Rivers, to water the Garden, both which Rivers (to wit) Tygris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them traverſe Meſopotamia, Regions firſt of all known by the name of Eden, for their beauty and fertility. And it is very probable, that Eden contained alſo ſome part of Armenia; and the excellent fertility thereof in divers places is not unworthy the name of Eden. For in ſome part thereof (ſaith Strabo) the leaves are alway green, and therefore therein a perpetual Spring. Alſo Stephanus, de Urbibus, mentioneth the City of Adana upon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in uſe in Amos's time, though he ſpake not of Eden in the Eaſt, but of Eden in Cælo-Syria. But to the end I may not burthen the Readers patience with too long a Diſcourſe, it may ſuffice to know, that Euphrates and Tygris (once joyned together, and afterward ſeparate) are two of thoſe four heads, into which theſe Rivers which are ſaid to water the Garden of Paradiſe, were divided: whoſe courſes being known, Eden (out of which they are ſaid to come) cannot be unknown. Now that Hiddekel and Perath, were Tygris and Euphra- tes, it is agreed by all: for the Seventy and all others convert Perath by Euphrates: & Hiddekel, Tygrim omnes exponunt; And all men understand Hiddekel by Tygris (saith Vatablus.) And because that which I have said of the Isle of Eden shall not be subject to the censure of self-invention, I have here-under set down the words out of the two general Epistles of the Nestorians, as Masius (ad verbum) hath converted them into Latine. The occasion of those Letters and Supplications to the Pope, were, That the Nestorian Christians, which inhabit Mesopotamia, Assyria, Persia, Babylonia, and have to this day (at least in Queen Marys time they had) fifteen Churches in one City called Seleucia Parthorum, or Mosel upon the River of Tygris; having no sufficient authority to choose themselves a Patriarch (which cannot be done without four or three Metropolitan Bishops at the least) sent to the Bishop of Rome, in the year of Christ 1552. (as afore-said) a Petition to obtain allowance unto such an Election, as themselves had made: having three hundred year before that, upon the like defect, sent one Marius thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they made known to the Bishop of Rome the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for, upon the death of their Patriarch (who of a covetous desire to enrich himself, had forborn to institute Metropolitan Bishops, when the places fell void) they all assembled themselves together to consult of the Church-government. And because all the Patriarchs for an hundred years had been of one House and Family to the prejudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Bishop of the same Stock and Kindred, who aspired to the same dignity which his Predecessors had held; the rest of the professors refused to allow him. Upon which occasion, and for the choice of a Governour more sufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches assembled themselves. The words of the general Epistle to the Pope are these, about the middle of the said Epistle; Verùm nos non acceptavimus, neq; proclamavimus ipsum; sed subitò convenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Civitatibus & Pagis quæ sunt circum civitatem Mosel (hoc est, Attur) in vicini â Nineves, ex Babylonià, ex Charrâ, ex Arbelâ, ex Insulâ quæ est in medio Tygris, fluminis Eden, &c. i. e. But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him: but suddenly we assembled our selves out of all parts of the East, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Mosel (or Attur) neighbouring upon Nineve; and out of Babylon, Carrha, Arbella; and out of the Island which lyeth in the middle of Tygris, a River of Eden, or rather out of the Isle of Eden, which lyeth in the River Tygris. And in a second Epistle at the same time sent, they used these words: Neq; supersunt apud nos Metropolitæ, quorum est ordinare Catholicum: sed soli panci Episcopi, Episcopus Arbelæ, Episcopus Salmasti, Episcopus Adurbeigan; en è vestigio convenimus in Insulam, quæ est intra Tygrim flumen, Eden; fecimusq; compactum inter nos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among us any Metropolitan Bishops, to whom it belongs to ordain a Patriarch, but only a few Bishops, as the Bishop of Arbela, the Bishop of Salmastus, and the Bishop of Adurbeigan: but lo, we assembled speedily in the Island of Eden, which is in Tygris, and agreed between our selves, &c.

Now this Island of Eden, Masius describeth with other places; which being well conceived, the Nestorian Epistles, and the state of the Church may be in those parts (saith he) the better understood. And after he hath distinguished the four sorts of Christians in those parts of the World, and in the South part of Africa, which he calleth Nestorians, Jacobites, Marcnitæ, and Cophti, he goeth on in these words: Mox, audita illius morte, concurrisse aiebant tumultuariò in illam quam modò dixi Tygris Insulam, quæ duodecim circiter passuum millibus supra Mosal posita, decem fere millia passuum suo ambitu continet, muris undiq; cincta, & à paucis aliis quàm Christianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the Patriarck, (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuously together into that Island of Tygris or Eden before spoken of, which Island is situated about twelve miles above Mosal, containing very neer ten miles in compass, and every where inviroued with a wall, inhabited by few other men then Christians. And afterward, he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest he addeth the Isle of Eden by the name of Geserta, Insula Tygris; sive Geserta. Furthermore, describing the City of Hosan-Cepha, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra prædictam Tygris Insulam, rupi asperæ impositam; Above the aforesaid Island of Tygris, being seated on a steep Rock. Of this Island of Geserta, Andrew Thevet maketh mention in his tenth Book of his general Cosmography, in these words: Geserta ou Gesire est au milieu de la Riviere du Tygre, & pense que c'est une terre des plus fertiles de toute l'Asie; Geserta or Gesire is in the middle of Tygris, the soyle the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we see that the antient name of Eden liveth; and of that Eden which lyeth Eastward from Arabia Petræa, and the Desart where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Carran according to Ezechiel, and that that Eden which is seated according to the assertion of the said Prophet, and joyned with those Nations of Reseph, Canneh, and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two Regions of Assyria, and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Thelassar were garrisoned to resist the Assyrians, whose displantation Senacherib vaunted of (as above written;) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tygris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the known Rivers of those four, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

§. XI.

Of the difficulty in the Text, which seemeth to make the four Rivers to rise from one stream.

BUt it may be objected, that it is written in the Text, That a River went out of Eden, and not Rivers in the plural: which scruple Matthew Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation, saith he, hath these words: Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde dividebatur in quatuor capita: Quæ verba melius consentient cum rei narratione, & ejusdem explicatione, si ita reddantur; Et fluvius erat egrediens ex Edene (hoc est) fluvii procedebant ex Edene regione ad rigandum pomarium; & inde dividebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a River went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was divided into four heads: Which words (saith Beroaldus) do better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated; And a River was going forth of Eden (that is) Rivers went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard; and from thence it was divided, and they became four heads. The Tygurine differs from the Vulgar or Latine; for it converts it thus, Et fluvius egrediebatur de deliciis; And a River went out of pleasure, in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word locus, or place, Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a River went out of the place of pleasure: and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightful and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence, was divided, hath reference to the Country of Eden, and not to the Garden it self.

And for the word (River) for Rivers, it is usual among the Hebrews: for it is written: Let the Earth bud forth the bud of the Herb that seedeth Seed, the fruitful Tree, &c. Here the Hebrew useth the Singular for the Plural, Herb and Tree, for Herbs and Trees; and again, We eat of the fruit of the Tree, in stead of (Trees:) And thirdly, The man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God; In medio ligni Paradisi; In the middle of the tree of the Garden, for (Trees.) And of this opinion is David Kimchi, and Vatablus, who upon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrews do often put the Singular for the Plural, as illud, for unumquodq; illorum; and he giveth an instance in this question it self, as, A River (for Rivers) went out of Eden.

And this answer out of divers of the Learned, may, not without good reason, be given to the objection, That Moses speaketh but of one River, from which the heads should divide themselves. Howbeit I deny not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, we may expound the four heads, to be four notable passages into famous Countries. And so we may take the word (River) Verse the tenth for one River, (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this River (after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to have been) divides it self, and ere long yieldeth four notable passages into several Countries, though not all the way down stream (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the River downward, there is conveyance into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countries (to wit, to Assyria) were up Tygris.

To this end the Text speaking of Hiddekel, as it riseth from the River of Eden, doth not say, it compasseth or washeth the whole Region of Assyria (as it had used this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth towards Assyria. The first branch Pison, is Nahar-malcha (by interpretation) Basilius, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tygris under Apamia; whence riseth the name of Pasi-Tygris, as it were Piso-Tygris. This leadeth to the Land of Havila or Susiana. The second branch Gehon, is that which in Historians is Nabarsares or Narragas; for Nahar-ragas: both which names signifie flumen derivatum (a River derived,) also Acracanus, quasi Ranosus, by reason of the Froggie Fens which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the first seat of Chus, about the borders of Chaldea and Arabia, and it is lost at length in the Lakes of Chaldea. The third branch Hiddekel, may be expounded the upper stream of Pison, or Basilius, which runneth into Hiddekel, properly so called (that is, into Tygris) above Seleucia, where it sheweth a passage up Tygris into Assyria: where, because at length it is called Hiddekel or Tygris, having before no known proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Euphrates, so called per excellentiam, being the body of the River Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon and Otris. But be it a River or Rivers, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tygris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can be no doubt, but that Paradise was not far from these Rivers: for that Perath in Moses is Euphrates, there can be no question; and (indeed) as plain it is that Hiddekel is Tygris. For Hiddekel goeth (saith Moses) Eastward towards Assur, as we find, that Tygris is the River of Assyria proprie dicta, whose chief City was Nineveh, as in Genesis the tenth it is written: That out of that Land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Assur, and builded Nineveh, which was the chief City of Assyria.

And as for the kind of speech here used in the Text, speaking of four heads; though the heads of Rivers be (properly) their Fountains, yet here are they to be understood, to be spoken of the beginning of their division from the first stream. Caput aquæ (saith Ulpianus) illud est unde aqua noscitur; si ex fonte nascatur, fons; si ex flumine, vel ex lacu, prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a Fountain, then is the Fountain taken for the head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a main River any branch be separate and divided, then where that branch doth first bound it self with new banks, there is that part of the River, where the branch forsaketh the main stream, called the head of the River.

§. XII.

Of the strange fertility and happiness of the Babylonian Soyl, as it is certain that Eden was such.

IT may also be demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by us described, be of such fertility and beauty, as Eden the seat of Paradise was: which, if it be denied, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the Earth, that retained that fertility and pleasure, that it had before the Curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulness to any part of the Earth, nor the same virtue to any Plant thereon growing, that they had before the Floud; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now no such flourishing Countrey, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I find written of it: First, in Herodotus, who was an eye-witness, and speaketh of the very place it self; for the Isle of Eden is but twelve miles, or thereabout, from Nineveh, and so from Mosal. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tygrim, alterum flumen, juxta quod Urbs Ninì sita erat. Hæc Regio, omnium quas nos vidimus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tygris, not far from the place where Ninus is seated. This Region, of all that we have seen, is most excellent: and he addeth afterward; Cereris autem fructu procreando adeò ferax est, ut nunquam non ferè ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitfull in bringing forth Corn, that it yieldeth two hundred fold: The leaves of Wheat and Barley, being almost four fingers broad. As for the height of Millet and Sesame, they are even in length like unto Trees; which although I know to be true, yet I forbear to speak hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulness, will seem very incredible to those, which never were in the Countrey of Babylon. They have commonly in all the Countrey Palm-Trees growing of their own accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both Meats and Wine, and Honey, ordering them as the Fig-Trees. Thus far Herodotus.

To this Palm-Tree, so much admired in the East-India, Strabo and Niger add a fourth excellency, which is, that it yieldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt; Of which these people make Bread, Wine, Honey, and Vineger. But Antonius the Eremite findeth a fifth commodity, not inferiour to any of those four, which is, that from this self-same Tree, there is drawn a kind of fine Flax, of which people make their garments, and with which in East India they prepare the cordage for their Ships. And that this is true, Athanasius in the life of Antonius the Eremite, confesseth, saying: That he received a garment made thereof from the Eremite himself, which he brought with him out this Region. So therefore those Trees which the East Indies so highly esteem and so much admire (as indeed the Earth yielded no plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this upper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any Trees of the Field. Sunt etiam (saith Strabo) passim per omnem Regionem palmæ sua sponte nascentes; There are of Palms over all the whole Region, growing of their own accord. Of this place, Quintus Curtius maketh this report: Euntibus à parte læva Arabiæ (odorum fertilitate nobilis) regio campestris interest inter Tygrim & Euphratem jacens, tam ubere & pingui solo, ut à pastu repelli pecora dicantur, ne satietas perimat; (that is) As you travel on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plenty of sweet Odours) there lieth a Champain Countrey placed between Tygris and Euphrates, of so fruitfull and fat a soil, that they are said to drive their their Cattel from pasture, lest they should perish by satiety. Bis in anno segetes Babylonii secant; The Babylonians cut their Corn twice a year (saith Niger.) And as Countreys generally are more fruitfull to the Southward, than in the Northern parts: so we may judge the excellency of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South parts of America, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof. His words be these in the Latine: Tota enim hæc regio frugibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis, itemque semper virentibus; This Region aboundeth with pleasant fruits, and Trees always green: which witnesseth a perpetual Spring, not found elsewhere but in the Indies onely, by reason of the Sun's neighourhood, the life and stirrer up of Nature in a perpetual activity. In brief, so great is the fertility of the ground, that the people are constrained twice to mow down their Corn-fields, and a third time to eat them up with Sheep: which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first fourty years, could not make our kind of Wheat bear seed, but it grew up as high as the Trees, and was fruitless. Besides, those fields are altogether without weeds (saith Pliny) who addeth this singularity to that soil, That the second year, the very stubble (or rather falling down of the seeds again) yieldeth them a harvest of Corn without any further labour: his words are these, Ubertatis tantæ sunt, ut sequenti anno sponte restibilis fiat seges.

§. XIII.

Of the River Pison, and the Land of Havilah.

AFter the discovery of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertility thereof, it resteth to prove that Pison and Gehon are branches of Tygris and Euphrates: For, that the knowledge and certainty of these two Rivers should trouble so many wise men, it is strange to me; seeing necessity it self (Tygris and Euphrates being known) findeth them out: for Euphrates, or Tygris, or both, be that River or Rivers of Eden, which water Paradise; which River or Rivers, Moses witnesseth afterward divided into four heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gehon, &c. Could there be a stranger fancy in the world, than when we find both these (namely) Tygris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia, to seek the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two Rivers as far distant as any of fame known or discovered in the world: the Scriptures making it so plain, that these Rivers were divided into four branches, and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason, and Experience bearing witness. There is no errour which hath not some slippery and bad foundation, or some appearance of probability, resembling truth, which when men (who study to be singular) find out (straining Reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the world matter of contention and jangling; not doubting, but in the variable deformity of mens minds, to find some partakers or sectators, the better by their help to nurse and cherish such weak Babes, as their own inventions have begotten.

But this mistaking (and first for the River of Pison) seemeth to have grown out of the not-distinguishing of that Region in India, called Havilah, from Havilah which adjoyneth to Babylonia, afterward known by the name of Susiana. For Havilah upon Tygris, took name from Havilah the Son of Cush; and Havilah in India, from Havilah the Son of Joctan; the one remembred by Moses in the description of Paradise, the other where Moses setteth down the generations of Noah, and his Sons after the Floud. For the Sons of Cush were Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, and Raamah; and the Sons of Joctan were Ophir, and Havilah, &c. of which latter (to wit) of Ophir and Havilah the Sons of Joctan, that Island of Ophir, (whence Solomon had Gold) and Havilah adjoyning, had their names. Now, because Ganges is a great and a famous River of the East India, and Havilah a Country of the same, and is situated upon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was taken for Pison, which River is said by Moses, to water the Land of Havilah. Or perhaps, it was supposed, that those four Rivers named by Moses, must of necessity be four of the greatest in the World; whence (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous River after Tygris and Euphrates) they chose out this River to make one of the four. And yet certainly there is another River, whom in these respects they should rather have chosen than Ganges: for the River Indus on this side India, for beauty, for nearness, and for ability, giveth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceive, that Ganges can be of the four heads, seeing Indus cometh between it and Tygris? and between Tygris and Indus is all that large Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdoms. And again, farther towards the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie between those two proud

Rivers

Rivers of Indus and Ganges, now called the Kingdom of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the four, becauſe it is removed from Tygris by all the breadth of Perſia, then how much leſs Ganges, which falleth into the Ocean, little leſs than fourty degrees to the Eaſtward of Indus? Surely, whoſoever readeth the Story of Alexander, ſhall find that there is no River in Aſia, that can exceed Indus. For Hydaſpis was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies tranſported himſelf, and the greateſt part of his Army, and in ſailing down that branch of Indus, found it ſo large and deep, and by reaſon thereof ſo great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleet, which was ready to be ſwallowed up therein: Hydaſpis (as aforeſaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great as it, having beſides this, the Rivers of Coas, of Suaſtus, Aceſines, Adris (otherwiſe Hirotis,) Hiſpalis, and Zaradus, all which make but one Indus, and by it are ſwallowed up with all their children and companions, which being all incorporated and made one ſtream, it croſſeth athwart Aſia, and then at Cambaia viſiteth the Ocean Sea.

But becauſe Piſon, which compaſſeth Havilah, as alſo Gehon, which watereth Cuſh, muſt ſomewhere be joyned with the reſt in one body, or at leaſt be found to proceed out of the ſame Country of Eden, out of which the other two heads do proceed; out of doubt they cannot either the one or the other be Ganges, or Nilus: For Nilus riſeth in the uttermoſt of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterran Sea; and the River Ganges riſeth out of the Mountain Imaus, or (as others will have it) Caucaſus, which divides the Northern Scythia from India, and runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tygris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, near Georgiana or Iberia, the other is not far off in the ſame Armenia, by the Georgian Mountains; ſo as Ganges, who only travaileth in her own India, and Nilus through Ethiopia and Egypt, never ſaw the land of Eden, or joyned themſelves in one channel, either with themſelves, or with either of the other; and therefore could not at any time from thence be ſeparated, or divided into four heads or branches, according to Moſes.

Gen. 2.15.

Therefore the River Piſon, which inricheth Havilah, is the ſame which by joyning it ſelf with Tygris, was therefore called Piſi-Tygris or Piſo-Tygris, of Piſon and Tygris, which River watereth that Havilah, which

Gen. 2. v. 12.

Havilah the ſon of Cuſh gave name unto, and not Havilah of India, ſo called of Havilah the Son of Joctan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the Eaſt. And this Havilah of the Cuſhites had alſo Gold, Bdellium, and the Onyx ſtone. This Bdellium is a Tree of the bigneſs of an Olive, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yieldeth a certain Gum ſweet to ſmell to, but bitter in taſte, called alſo Bdellium. The Hebrews take the Loadſtone for Bdellium. Beroaldus affirmeth, that Bdela in Hebrew ſignifieth Pearl: ſo doth Eugubinus; and Hierom calls it Oleaſter: be it what it will, a tree bearing Gum or Pearl, Havilah or Suſiana hath plenty of both. Now this Country of Suſiana or Havilah, ſtretcheth it ſelf towards the North as far as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence imbraceth all the Tract of Land Southward, as far as the Perſian Gulfe, on the Eaſt ſide thereof: from which Eaſt ſide had the Shebans (which traded with the City of Tyre according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of Gold; which Strabo alſo witneſſeth, as was ſhewed before.

The Greeks had a conceit, that Piſon was Danubius: the Rabbins take it for Nilus. Aben-Ezra (ſaith Hopkins) out of Rabbi Saadia, tranſlateth Piſon into Nilus: But Nilus findeth the ſame impoſſibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Helleſpont, and all Aſia the leſs between it and Tygris. Now Piſon, which runneth through Havilah or Suſiana, doth to this day retain ſome ſigne of this name; for where it and Tygris embraceth each other under the City of Apamia, there do they agree of a joynt and compounded name, and are called Piſo-Tygris. And it is ſtrange unto me, that from ſo great antiquity there ſhould be found remaining any reſembling ſound of the firſt name: for Babylon it ſelf, which dwelleth ſo near theſe Rivers, is by ſome writers known by the name of Bandas, as, by Poſtellus: by Caſtaldus, of Balduch: by Barius, of Bagdad; and of Boughedor, by Andrew Thevet; and yet all thoſe that have lately ſeen it, call it Bagdet. To this River of Piſon Ptolemy indeed with many others give the name of Baſilius or Regius, and Gehon they term Maharſares, and Marſias, and Baarſares. So is Euphrates, near the Spring and Fountain, by Strabo and Pliny called Pixirates: by Junius, Puck-perah, out of the Hebrew (that is) The proſuſion, or coming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh through the Mountain Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the Hebrews Parath (ſaith Ar. Montanus:) Pagninus, Perath: Joſephus, Phorah; Euſebius, Zozimus: Ammianus,

Plin. lib. 5. c. 24.

Ammianus, Chalymicus: Giſtilianus and Colinutius, term it Cobar: which Ezechiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Aſſyrians know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nahor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

The ſame confuſion of names hath Tygris, as Diglito and Diglath, Seilax and Sollax: of the Hebrews it was called Hiddekel: now of the inhabitants, Tegil.

But Mercer upon Geneſis conceiveth rightly of theſe Rivers: for Euphrates and Tygris (ſaith he) ſtream into four branches; two of which keep their antient names, and the other two are called Piſon and Gehon. The reaſon why theſe two Rivers, joyned in one (below Apamia,) loſe their names and are called Piſi-Tigris, and the memory of Euphrates extinguiſhed, is, becauſe the beſt part of Euphrates running through the channel of Gehon, ſinketh into the Lakes of Chaldea, not far from Ur, the City of Abraham, and fall not entirely into the Perſian Sea, as Tygris, accompanied with Piſon, doth.

This errour, That Piſon was Ganges, was firſt broached by Joſephus, (whoſe fields, though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weeds) and other men (who take his authority to be ſufficient in matter of deſcription, whereupon depended no other important conſequence) were not curious in the examination thereof. For, Epiphanius, Auguſtine, and Hierom, take this for currant; whereof it followed, that as Piſon was tranſported into the Eaſt India to find out Havilah: ſo was Gehon drawn into Africa to compaſs Æthiopia. But if Havilah, whereof Moſes ſpeaketh in the deſcription of Paradiſe, be found to be a Region, adjoyning to Babylon on the one ſide, and Cuſh (which is falſly interpreted Æthiopia) faſthed to it on the other ſide, we ſhall not need then to work wonders (that is) to impoſe upon men the tranſportation of Rivers, from one end of the World to the other, which (among other uſes) were made to tranſport men. Now it was in the Vally of Shinar, where Cuſh the Son of Ham firſt ſate down with his Sons Shebah, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Havilah, the Son of Cuſh did that Region take name, which Piſon compaſſeth; and the Land (called Cuſh) which Gehon watereth, took name of Cuſh himſelf. For as the Sons of Joctan, Ophir, and Havilah, ſeated themſelves as near together as they could in India, ſo did the Sons of Cuſh in Shinar, or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Havilah, or Chavilah, was firſt Chuſea, of Cuſh; then Chuſa, Suſa, and Suſiana.

From this Havilah unto the Deſarts of Sur, did the Iſraelites and Amalekites poſſeſs all the interjacent Countries: for Saul ſmote the Amalekites from Havilah to Sur: which Sur, the Chaldean Paraphraſt converteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the Red-Sea. But this was not meant from Sur upon the Red-Sea, to Havilah in the Eaſt India, for Saul was no ſuch Travailer or Conquerour, and therefore Havilah muſt be found nearer home, where the Sons of Iſmael inhabited, and which Country Saul waſted: for Amalek and the Amalekites poſſeſs'd that neck of Country, between the Perſian Sea, and the Red Sea; Havilah being the extream of the one, towards the Eaſt, and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the Weſt, leaving that great body of Arabia fœlix towards the South, and they ſpread themſelves with the Midianites and Edumæans, from the Eaſt-part, or backſide of the Holy Land, to the banks of Euphrates, compriſing the beſt part of Arabia Petræa, and Deſerta.

§. XIV.

Of the River Gehon, and the Land of Cuſh, and of the ill tranſlating of Ethiopia for Cuſh, 2 Chron. 21. 16.

NOw as Havilah in the Eaſt India drew Piſon ſo far out of his way thither, ſo I ſay did Cuſh (being by the Seventy tranſlated Ethiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cuſh being taken for Ethiopia by the Greeks, whom the Latines followed, Gehon conſequently was eſteemed for Nilus. But Ethiopians are, as much as black or burnt faces, whoſe proper Country called Thebaides, lyeth to the Southward of all Egypt. And although there be many other Regions of Ethiopians, and far South in Africa; yet thoſe of Thebaides are thoſe ſo often remembred in the Egyptian ſtories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Egypt: all which Ethiopians are very near, or elſe directly under the Equinoctial line, which is very far from that Land inhabited by the Chuſites, who are neither black of colour, nor in any ſort neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this tranſlation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualifie in this manner: There are (ſaith he) two Ethiopia's, the Eaſt, and Weſt: and this diviſion he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now becauſe there is no colour to make Chus Ethiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Ckuſh and the land of the Chuſites (which is Arabia Petræa, and part of Arabia the Happy, with the Region of Madian) to be the Eaſt Ethiopia.

See more of this point c. 7. Sect. 10.

Now, if it be granted, that Chuſh, and the Land

Land of the Chuſhites be that Tract from Sur to Havilah, according to the Scriptures: Habitavit Iſhmael ab Havilah uſque Sur, quæ reſpicit Ægyptum introeuntibus Aſſyrios, Iſmael dwelt from Havilah unto Sur, that is, towards Egypt, as thou goeſt toward Aſſyria. The ſame ſufficeth to prove that Gehon cannot be Nilus, but a River that watereth Cuſh, and not Æthiopia. But this place of Scripture, Habitavit Iſmael, &c. hath this ſenſe: Iſmael dwelt from Havilah, which is the way of Aſſyria, or the Countrey bordering Aſſyria; and Sur, which lieth toward Egypt, which is as much to ſay, as, The iſſues of Iſhmael (whereof there were twelve Princes) whom God had promiſed to make a great people, inhabited all thoſe Regions between the border of Egypt and Aſſyria. And that they were (according to the Word of God) ſo increaſed and multiplied, it well appeared, when Zearah the Chuſite, which others call Tharantha, brought an Armie of ten hundred thouſand againſt Aſa King of Juda. Which Armie came not out of Æthiopia beyond Egypt; for that had been a ſtrange progreſs for ſuch a multitude, as ten hundred thouſand, having ſo mighty a King as the King of Egypt, between Paleſtina and Æthiopia. But theſe were the Chuſites, Amalekites, Madianites, Iſmaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Aſa (ſtrengthened by God) had defeated this world of an Armie, he in following his Victory took ſome of the Cities of King Zearah round about, as Gerar. Now, that Gerar is a City of the Æthiopians, it cannot be ſuſpected: for theſe be the words of the Scripture diſproving it: And Abraham departed thence, toward the South Countrey, and dwelt between Kadeſh and ſojourned in Gerar: Now Sur is that part upon which Moſes and the Iſraelites firſt ſet their feet after they paſſed the Red-Sea, where the Amalekites in Rephidim ſet on them, ſuppoſing that they had been weary, and unable to reſiſt. Again, in the Story of Iſaac it is written: Wherefore Iſaac went to Abimelech, and the Philiſtines unto Gerar: and I am ſure Abimelech and the Philiſtines were no Æthiopians. And laſtly, Moſes himſelf, where he deſcribeth the bounds of Canaan, hath theſe words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou comeſt to Gerar: for Sydon was the frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gaza towards the South. But indeed, howſoever Pererius doth, with an honeſt excuſe, ſalve this Tranſlation of Chus for Æthiopia; yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint and Joſephus did altogether miſ-underſtand this place. And firſt, for Homer's Eaſt and Weſt Æthiopia, they are both found elſewhere: For Pliny in his fifth Book, and eighth Chapter, citeth Homer for an Authour of theſe two Æthiopia's. But the Eaſt Æthiopia is that which compaſſeth Nilus to the South of Egypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Abiſſines under Preſter John; And the Weſt Æthiopia is that which joyneth it ſelf with the River Niger, which we call Senega and Gambra: for thereabouts are theſe Æthiopians called Perorſi, Dararites, with divers other names, which Pliny numbreth. But all theſe are in Africa, and beyond the Deſarts thereof, ſaith Pliny out of Homer, Agrippa and Juba; which Regions indeed (I mean that of Niger, and that of Preſter John, and the Troglodites) lie due Eaſt and Weſt. But as for Cuſh, and the Region of the Iſmaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Æthiopia, which is beyond Egypt. Now, that Joſephus was exceeding groſs herein, it appeareth by that fiction which he hath of Moſes when he ſerved Pharaoh, in the Wars againſt the Æthiopians: for in that (to make Chus, Æthiopia) he tranſporteth Madian by miracle over the Red-Sea, and beyond all Egypt, and ſetteth it in Æthiopia, as ſhall be ſhewed more at large in the Chapter of the World's Plantation. Again, that Gehon was improperly tranſlated Nilus, Pererius confeſſeth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greek Copie, than otherwiſe. And whereas the Septuagint have converted this place of the Prophet Hieremie; And what haſt thou now to do in the way of Egypt, to drink the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Egypti, ut bibas aquam Gehon? To this ſaith Pererius, profectò Hebraicè ibi non eſt vox Gehon, ſed Sichor, quæ ſignificat Nigrum & turbidum: Truly (ſaith Pererius) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor; which ſignifieth black and troubled water.

Furthermore, this is a manifeſt and unanſwerable argument, that Chus was ill taken for Æthiopia. Moſes married the daughter of Jethro, Prince and Prieſt of Madian, whom both the Greek and Latine call a Madiante, and not Æthopiſſan, as (with Joſephus) the Geneva converts it, though it help it a little with a marginal Note. Now it is without diſpute, that Zipporah was of the Countrey of Madian, which is that part of Arabia Petræa, bordering the Red-Sea; for it is written in the ſecond of Exodus, that Moſes fled from Pharaoh into the Land of Midian, and ſate down by a Well, &c. And again, in the third of Exodus; When Moſes kept the Sheep of Jethro, his father-in-law, Prieſt of Madian, &c. Indeed, theſe four Nations are every where mixt in the Scriptures, becauſe they they dwell confuſedly together (to wit) the Madianites, the Iſmaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chuſites, which were all, in one general word, Arabians; and in the Scriptures ſometimes called by one of theſe names, and ſometimes by another; as in Gen. 37. v. 25, 27, and 28. that Joſeph was ſold to the Iſmaelites; and in the ſame Chapter, v. 36. it is written, that the Madianites ſold Joſeph to Potiphar, Pharaoh's Steward. The Genevians, in a marginal Note (to avoid this confounding of the Nations) ſay, that Moſes wrote according to their opinon, who took the Madianites and Iſmaelites to be all one. But Moſes wrote not after any mans opinion, he wrote the truth; and theſe were all Arabians: and ſo in this very place it appeareth by their Merchandiſe, which they brought with them, when they bought Joſeph: for their Camels were loaden with Spicerie, and Balm, and Myrrhe, which are the trades of Arabia fœlix: from whence chiefly, and from the Eaſt India, all the World is ſerved with Myrrhe and Frankincenſe; and their Spices they received from the Eaſt ſide of the Arabian Gulf, as aforeſaid. And in the 39 Chapter, it is ſaid: That Potiphar bought Joſeph of the Iſmaelites, which the Chaldean Paraphraſt in the ſame place calleth Arabians. Now to make this the more manifeſt, it is written, Judg. 6. That when Iſrael had ſown, then came up the Madianites, and the Amalekites, and they of the Eaſt, and came upon them: they of the Eaſt were Arabians of the Deſart; ſo as where before in the buying of Joſeph, the Madianites and the Iſmaelites were confuſed, here the Madianites and Amalekites are made one Nation. For in the proſecution of the Story of Gedeon, the Madianites onely are named, as comprehending both Nations; and in the eighth Chapter, v. 24. theſe Nations are called Iſmaelites, and neither Madianites, nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon deſired that every man would give him the golden Ear-rings, which they had taken after the victory againſt Zeba and Zalmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 1700. ſhekels of Gold, it is written: For they had golden Ear-rings, becauſe they were Iſmaelites. And theſe Iſmaelites were a great and valiant Nation, and ever in action of War. Manus ejus contra omnes, & manus omnium contra eum; His hand (ſaith God, of Iſmael) ſhall be againſt all men, and every mans hand againſt him. Of theſe Iſmaelites come the Mahometan Arabians, though ſome Writers think Mahomet to be of the Schenitæ. And theſe Iſmaelites, which inhabit chiefly in Cedar, and the Deſarts of Sur and Pharan (ſaith Joſephus) uſe poyſon upon their Arrows, as the Indians do. Toward the South-eaſt are the Madianites, and Chuſites: and beyond them towards the Deſarts of Arabia, the Amalekites, and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Gen. 16. 12.

Laſtly, the ill Tranſlation of Æthiopia for Chus, is, among other places, made moſt apparent in the ſecond of Chronicles, in theſe words: So the Lord ſtirred up againſt Jehoram the ſpirit of the Philiſtines, and the Arabians, which confine the Æthiopians; ſo Hierome reads it: the Geneva Tranſlation hath it, which were beſides the Æthiopians. Now, how far it is off between the Philiſtines and the Negro's or the Æthiopians, every man that looketh in a Map may judge. For the Philiſtines and Arabians do mixe and joyn with the Land of the Chuſites, and are diſtant from Æthiopia about two and thirty, or three and thirty degrees; and therefore not their next neighbours; but all Egypt, and the Deſart of Sur and Pharan are between them. So as this place of the ſecond of Chronicles, ſhould have been tranſlated in theſe words: So the Lord ſtirred up againſt Jehoram, the ſpirits of the Philiſtines, and the Arabians, which confine and border upon the Chuſites, who indeed are their next neighbours. * Nulla ſupereſt dubitatio quin Æthiopia in ſacris literis ſit Arabia propinqua; There remaineth no doubt (ſaith Steuchius) but Æthiopia in the Scriptures, is taken for that Countrey which joyneth to Arabia.

2 Chro. 21. 16.

* Steuch. Eugub. in Gen. c. 2.

Now, may we think, is it probable, or poſſible, that Moſes could be ignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no living man ſo well, and therefore would never have named Gehon for Nilus, or Nilus for Gehon. Surely, if Moſes had meant Nilus, when he named Gehon, he would have called the River (into which he was caſt upon Reeds, and preſerved by God, working compaſſion in the Daughter of Pharaoh) a River of Egypt, wherein he was born and bred, and wrought ſo many miracles. Beſides, the River of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but never by the name of Gehon. And if Moſes had told the Iſraelites, that Nilus had been a River of Paradiſe, they might juſtly have thought, that he had derided them: for they had lived there all days of their lives, and found no ſuch Paradiſe at all, nor any memory, or ſpeech thereof, except we ſhall believe the Paradiſe of Heſperides, where (ſaith Pliny) there was nothing found in his time, but wilde Olives in ſtead of golden Apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in Iſaiah, and once in the Prophet Jeremie; and yet in thoſe places it is not ſaid to be a River of Æthiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Iſraelites had never any communion or affairs with the Æthiopians, nor any intelligence or trade beyond Egypt, to the South; but the enemies which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites, and Madianites: who being often governed by many little kings, or Reguli, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers or Heads of those Nations; but in one general name were all Arabians. On the North side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Cælo-Syrians, with the Magogians, Tubalites, and others their adherents. And thirdly, within themselves, the Nations which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities upon the Sea-coast, as Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others; yea, Jerusalem it self was with-held from Israel, from the days of Moses, even unto the time of David, by the Jebusites.

That which now remaineth of most difficulty, is, that it doth not appear that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the stony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the Kings of Israel: and in this Desart it was, that Matt. Beroaldus lost himself in seeking out Paradise: for he was driven (to my understanding) to create two Rivers, and call them Gehon and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Havilah; for I find none such In rerum Natura, as he hath described: by which Rivers he also includeth within Paradise, even Arabia the Desart.

And as he well proved that Pison was not Ganges, nor Gehon Nilus; so where to find them elsewhere, it seemeth he knew not. Certainly, this River of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterran at Gaza, and whose Springs he findeth far East in Arabia, is but imaginary; for the Current by Gaza, is but a small stream, rising between it and the Red-Sea, whose head from Gaza it self is little more than twenty English miles, as shall appear hereafter. But questionless, hence it comes that many were mistaken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their near neighbours, and never looked back to the first seats and plantation of Chus. For after the Floud, Chus and his children never rested, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and near which himself, with his Sons, first inhabited. Havilah took the River-side of Tygris chiefly on the East, which after his own name he called Havilah, (now Susiana:) Raamah, and Sheba farther down the River, in the entrance of Arabia-fœlix. Nimrod seated himself in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himself and his brother Mizraim first kept upon Gehon, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldæa; and in process of time, and as their people increased, they drew themselves more Westerly towards the Red or Arabian Sea: from whence Mizraim past over into Egypt, in which Tract the Chusites remained for many years after. Now, because there could be no such River found in Arabia the stony, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus, Æthiopia; and Gehon, Nilus. And if we do examine this mistaking by example, we shall the better perceive it as it was. For let us suppose, that Brute, or whosoever else that first peopled this Island, had arrived upon the River of Thames, and called the Island after his name Britannia, it might be said that Thames or Tems was a River that watered Britannia: and when afterwards, in process of time, the same Brute had also discovered and conquered Scotland, which he also entituled by the same name of Britannia, after-ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the River of Tems is not found therein. Or let us suppose that Europa, the Daughter of the King of Tyre in Phœnicia, gave the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, and that the first discoverers thereof arrived in the mouth of the River in Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as he first discovered; Shall we in like sort resolve that France, Spain, and Italy, &c. are no pars of Europe, because that River is not found in them, or any of them? In like manner was it said by Moses in his description of Gehon, that it watered the whole Land of Chus; but not the whole Land which the Chusites should, or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabit; seeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) have been Masters in time, (as the Saracens, which came of them, were) of a great part of the World. For, though the Babylonian Empire which took beginning in Nimrod the Son of Chus, consisted at the first but of four Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, Acad, and Chalne; yet we find, that his Successours within a few years after, commanded all the whole World in effect: and the fame of Babel consumed the memory of Chusea. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that Land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatness of that Empire founded by Nimrod a younger Son, obscured the name and Nation of his Father Cush in those parts, until they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther ther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chuſites retained their names, which alſo they faſtned to the Soil and Territory, by themſelves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not think, that Chus, or any of his, could in haſt creep through thoſe deſart Regions, which the length of 130. years after the Floud had (as it were) fortified with Thickets, and permitted every Buſh and Bryar, Reed and Tree, to joyn themſelves (as it were) into one main body and Foreſt. For if we look with judgment and reaſon into the Worlds Plantation, we ſhall find, that every Family ſeated themſelves as near together as poſſibly they could; and though neceſſity enforced them, after they grew full of people, to ſpread themſelves, and creep out of Shinar, or Babylonia; yet did they it with this advice, as that they might at all times reſort and ſuccour one another by River, the fields being then (without all doubt) impaſſible. So Nimrod, who out of wit and ſtrength uſurped dominion over the reſt, ſate down in the very confluence of all thoſe Rivers, which watered Paradiſe: for thither it was, to which the greateſt troups of Noah's children repaired; and from the ſame place whence Mankind had his beginning, from thence had they again their increaſe. The firſt Father of men, Adam, had therein his former habitation: The ſecond Father of Mankind, Noah, began from thence his diſperſion.

Now as Nimrod the youngeſt, yet ſtrongeſt, made his choyce of Babel (as aforeſaid) which both Tygris and Euphrates cleanſed and enriched; ſo did Havilah place himſelf upon Piſo-Tygris; Ramah and his Son Sheba farther down upon the ſame River, on the Sea coaſt of Arabia: Chuſh himſelf upon Gehon, the faireſt branch of Euphrates. And when they began to ſpread themſelves farther off, yet they alwaies faſtened themſelves to the Rivers ſides: for Ninive, Charran, Reſeph, Canneh, Ur in Chaldea, and the other firſt-peopled Cities, were all founded upon theſe navigable Rivers, or their branches; by which the one might give ſuccour and aſſiſtance to the other, as is already often remembred.

§. XV.

A concluſion, by way of repetition of ſomething ſpoken of before.

BUt now to conclude this Diſpute; It appeareth to me by the teſtimonies of the Scripture, that Paradiſe was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, ſeated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Aram fluviorum, or Meſopotamia, which taketh into it alſo a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region ſtanding in the moſt excellent temper of all other (to wit) 35. degrees from the Æquinoctial, and 55. from the North-pole: in which Climate, the moſt excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyle, Grain of all ſorts, are to this day found in aboundance. And there is nothing that better proveth the excellency of this ſaid ſoil and temper, then the abundant growing of the Palm-trees, without the care and labour of man. For wherein ſoever the Earth, Nature, and the Sun can moſt vaunt that they have excelled; yet ſhall this Plant be the greateſt wonder of all their works: This Tree alone giveth unto man whatſoever his life beggeth at Nature's hand. And though it may be ſaid, that theſe Trees are found both in the Eaſt and Weſt Indies, which Countries are alſo bleſſed with a perpetual Spring and Summer; yet, lay down by thoſe pleaſures and benefits, the fearful and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous diſeaſes, the multitude of venimous Beaſts and Worms, with other inconveniences; and then there will be found no compariſon between one and the other.

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradiſe had, before God (for man's ingratitude and cruelty) curſed the Earth, we cannot judg; but I may ſafely think, that by how much Adam exceeded all living men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanſhip of God, by ſo much did that choſen and particular Garden exceed all parts of the Univerſal World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the Trees, of Life, and of Knowledg; Plants only proper and becomming the Paradiſe, and Garden of ſo grant a Lord.

The ſum of all this is; That whereas the eys of men in this Scripture have been dimſighted (ſome of them finding Paradiſe beyond our known World: ſome, above the middle region of the ayr: ſome, elevated near the Moon: others, as far South as the Line, or as far North as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the Reader will be ſufficiently ſatisfied, that theſe were but like Caſtles in the ayr, and in mens fancies vainly imagined. For it was Eaſtward in Eden (ſaith Moſes;) Eaſtward, in reſpect of Judea, that God planted this Garden; which Eden we find in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in ſome part) remaineth to this day. A River went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence divided it self into four branches; and we find that both Tygris and Euphrates swimming through Eden do joyn in one, and afterward taking waies apart, do water Chus and Havilah, according to Moses, the true seats of Chus and his Sons being then in the Vally of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Pison was Ganges, the Scripture, reason, and experience teach the contrary: for that which was never joyned, cannot be divided; Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the Rivers of Eden; That Gehon was Nilus, the same distance maketh the same impossibility; and this River is a greater stranger to Tygris and Euphrates, then Ganges is: for although there are between Tygris and Ganges above four thousand miles, yet they both rise in the same quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the Mountains of the Moon, almost as far off as the Cape of good hope, and falleth into the Mediterrane Sea: and Euphrates distilleth out of the Mountains of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulf of Persia: the one riseth in the South, and travaileth North; the other riseth in the North, and runneth South, threescore and three degrees the one from the other. In this leaf following, I have added a Chorographical description of this terrestrial Paradise, that the Reader may thereby the better conceive the preceding Discourse; and this is the reward I look for, that my labour may but receive an allowance suspended, until such time as this description of mine be reproved by a better.

Of the two chief Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.

That the Tree of Life was a material Tree; and in what sense it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden Fruit, is made subject to death.

FOr eating the forbidden fruit of the tree of Knowledg, was Adam driven out of Paradise, In exilium vitæ temporalis, Into the banishment of temporal life, saith Beda. That these Trees of Life and Knowledg were material Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Gospel) it is not doubted by the most religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are so volatile as nothing can fix them, and so slippery as nothing can fasten them, have in this also delivered to the World, an imaginary doctrine.

The Tree of Life (say the Hebrews) hath a Plural construction, and is to be understood, Lignum vitarum, The Tree of lives, because the fruit thereof had a property, to preserve both the growing, sensitive, and rational life of man; and not only (but for Adam's transgression) had prolonged his own daies, but also given a dureful continuance to all his posterity; and that, so long, as a body compounded of Elements could last.

Som. Sept. 2. l. 1. 174.

And although it is hard to think, that flesh and bloud could be immortal, but that it must once perish and rot, by the unchanged Law of God imposed on his creatures; Man (notwithstanding) should have enjoyed thereby a long, beautiful, and ungrieved life: after which (according to the opinion of most Divines) he should have been translated, as Enoch was. And, as before the Floud, the days of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred years; and soon after the Floud, of two hundred years and upwards, even to five hundred: so if Adam had not disobeyed Gods first and easie Commandment, the lives of men on earth might have continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first age, as many learned men have conceived. Chrysostom, Rupertus, Tostatus, and others were of belief, that (but for Adams fall and transgression) Adam and his Posterity had been immortal. But such is the infinite Wisdom of God, as he foresaw that the earth could not have contained Mankind; or else, that millions of Souls must have been ungenerated, and have had no being, if the first number wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for ever: And therefore that of Chrysostom must be understood of immortality of bodies, which should have been translated and glorified.

But of what kind or Species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach; in in which respect many have conceived, that the same was not material, but a meer Allegorie; taking their strength out of Solomon, where Wisdom is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life; as out of the Apocalyps, I will give to him that overcometh, to eat of the Tree of life which is in the Paradise of God. But to this place Saint Augustine's answer may suffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terrestrial Paradise, so there was a celestial. For although Agar and Sarah were Figures of the Old and New Testament; yet to think that they were not Women, and the Maid and Wife of Abraham, were meer foolishness. And so in this place, the sense of the Scripture is manifest; For God brought out of the Earth every Tree fair to the sight, and sweet to the taste; the Tree also of Life in the midst of the Garden: which sheweth, that among the Trees, which the Earth by God's commandment produced, the Tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesiod, Homer, Ovid, and others, steal the invention of the created World; so from the Garden of Paradise they took the Platform of the Orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Hesperides: and from the Tree of Life, their Nectar and Ambrosia; for Nectar, according to Suidas, signifieth making young; and Ambrosia, immortality; and therefore said to be the meat and drink of the gods.

Apocal. 2. 7.

§. II.

Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledg was Ficus Indica.

NOw, for the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil, some men have presumed farther, especially Goropius Becanus, who giveth himself the honor to have found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could ever guess at, whereat Goropius much marvelled. But as he had an inventive brain, so there never lived any man, that believed better thereof, and of himself. Surely, howsoever his opinion may be valued, yet he usurpeth the praise due to others, at least if the invention be at that price at which he setteth it. For Moses Bar-Cephas fastened on this conjecture above six hundred years before Becanus was born: and Bar-Cephas himself referreth the invention to an antiquity more remote, citing for his Authour Philoxenus Maburgensis, and others, whose very words Goropius useth, both concerning the Tree, and the reasons wherewith he would induce other men to that belief. For Moses Bar-Cephas in his Treatise of Paradise (the first Part and fol. 48) saith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica, The Indian Fig-Tree; of which the greatest plenty (saith Becanus) are found upon the banks of Acesines, one of the Rivers which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Fleet of Gallies, in or near the Kingdom of Porus.

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bigness of a great Peaze, or (as Pliny reporteth) somewhat bigger; and that it is a Tree, Se semper serens, Always planting it self; that it spreadeth it self so far abroad, as that a troup of Horse-men may hide themselves under it. Strabo saith, that it hath branches bending downwards, and leaves no less than a shield. Aristobulus affirmeth, that fifty Horse-men may shadow themselves under one of these Trees. Onesicritus raiseth this number to four hundred. This Tree (saith Theophrastus) exceeded all other in bigness, which also Pliny and Onesicritus confirm: to the trunk of which, these Authours give such a magnitude, as I shame to repeat. But it may be, they all speak by an ill-understood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not so rare a Plant as Becanus conceiveth, who, because he found it no where else, would needs draw the Garden of Paradise to the Tree, and set it by the River Acesines. But many parts of the world have them, and I my self have seen twenty thousand of them in one Valley, not far from Paria in America. They grow in moist grounds, and in this manner: After they are first shot up some twenty or thirty foot in length (some more, some less, according to the soil) they spread a very large top, having no bough nor twig in the trunk or stem: for from the utmost end of the head-branches, there issueth out a Gummy juyce which hangeth downward like a cord or sinew, and within a few moneths reacheth the ground; which it no sooner toucheth, but it taketh root, and then being filled both from the top-boughs, and from his own proper root, this cord maketh it self a Tree exceeding hastily. From the utmost boughs of these young Trees, there fall again the like cords, which in one year and less (in that World of a perpetual Spring) become also Trees of the bigness of the neather part of a Lance, and as streight as Art or Nature can make any thing, casting such a shade, and making such a kind of Grove, as no other Tree in the world can do. Now, one of these Trees considered, with all his young ones, may may (indeed) ſhroud four hundred or four thouſand Horſ-men, if they pleaſe; for they cover whole Valleys of ground where theſe Trees grow near the Sea-bank, as they do by thouſands in the inner parts of Trinidado. The cords which fall down over the banks into the Sea, ſhooting alway downward to find root under water, are, in thoſe Seas of the Indies where Oyſters breed, intangled in their beds, ſo as by pulling up one of theſe cords out of the Sea, I have ſeen five hundred Oyſters hanging in a heap thereon; whereof the report came, That Oyſters grew on Trees in India. But that they bear any ſuch huge leaves, or any ſuch delicate fruit, I could never find, and yet I have travelled a dozen miles together under them. But to return to Goropius Becanus: This Tree (ſaith he) was good for meat, and pleaſing to the ſight, as the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil is deſcribed to be.

Secondly, This Tree having ſo huge a trunk (as the former Authours report, and Becanus believeth) it was in this Tree that Adam and Eve hid themſelves from the preſence of God; for no other Tree (ſaith he) could contain them. But firſt it is certain, that this Tree hath no extraordinary magnitude, as touching the trunk or ſtem: for among ten thouſand of them, it is hard to find any one bigger than the reſt, and theſe are all but of a mean ſize. Secondly, the words of Moſes tranſlated, In medio ligni, are by all the Interpreters underſtood in the plural number (that is) In the midſt of the Trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moſes Bar-Cephas) word for word,
Gen. 3. 7. is, That when Adam and Eve found themſelves naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaves; which proveth (indeed) that either the Tree it ſelf was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew near it: becauſe Adam being poſſeſt with ſhame, did not run up and down the Garden to ſeek out leaves to cover him, but found them in the place it ſelf; and theſe
Plin. l. 12. c. 5. leaves of all other were moſt commodious, by reaſon of their largeneſs; which Pliny avoweth in theſe words; Latitudo foliorum peltæ effigiem Amazoniæ habet; The breadth of the leaves hath the ſhape of an Amazonian ſhield: which alſo Theophraſt confirmeth; the form of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

Virg. Æn. l. 1. 494. Ducit Amazonidum lunatis agmina peltis
Penthesilæa furens.

The Amazons with Creſcent-formed ſhield
Penthesilæa leads into the field.

Here Becanus deſireth to be believed, or rather threatneth us all that read him, to give credit to this his borrowed diſcovery, uſing this confident (or rather cholerick) ſpeech: Quis erit tam impudenter obſtinatus, ſi hæc à nobis, de ficu hac, ex antiquis ſcriptoribus cum Moiſis narratione comparet, ut audeat dicere, Aliam arborem inveniri poſſe, quæ cum illa magis quadret? Who will be ſo impudently obſtinate, if he compare theſe things which we have reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers delivered, with the narration of Moſes, as to dare to avow, That any other Tree can be found, which doth more properly anſwer, or agree therewith? But for my ſelf, becauſe I neither find this Tree, ſorting in body, in largeneſs of leaves, nor in fruit to this report; I rather incline to the opinion of Philo. That the Earth never brought forth any of theſe Trees, neither before nor after. But I leave every man to his own belief, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kind; onely thereby, and by the eaſie Commandment by God given to Adam, to forbear to feed thereon, it pleaſed God to make trial of his obedience: Prohibita non propter aliud quam ad commendandum puræ ac ſimplicis obedientiæ bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other reſpect, than thereby to commend the goodneſs of pure and ſimple Obedience. Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, l. 13. c. 20.

§. III.

Of Becanus his not-unwitty allegorizing of the Story of his Ficus Indica.

BUt in this I muſt do Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his ſuppoſition of the Tree it ſelf to be true. The effects whereof, becauſe his diſcourſes are exceeding ample, I have gathered in theſe few words. As this Tree (ſaith he) ſo did Man grow ſtraight and upright towards God, until ſuch time as he had tranſgreſſed and broken the Commandment of his Creatour; and then like unto the boughs of this Tree, he began to bend downward, and ſtooped toward the Earth, which all the reſt of Adam's Poſterity after him have done, rooting themſelves therein, and faſtning themſelves to this corrupt world. The exceeding umbragiouſneſs of this Tree, he compareth to the dark and ſhadowed life of man, through which the Sun of juſtice being not able to pierce, we have all remained in the ſhadow of death, till it pleaſed Chriſt to climb the Tree of the Croſs for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to find among ſo many large leaves, may be compared (ſaith he) to the little virtue, and unperceived Knowledge among

ſo large vanities, which obſcure and ſhadow it over. And as this fruit is exceeding ſweet, and delicate to the taſte and palate: ſo are the delights and pleaſures of the World moſt pleaſing, while they dure. But as all thoſe things which are moſt mellifluous, are ſooneſt changed into choler and bitterneſs: ſo are our vanities and pleaſures converted into the bittereſt ſorrows and repentances. That the leaves are ſo exceeding large, the fruit (for ſuch leaves) exceeding little; in this, by compariſon we behold (ſaith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their ſollicitude, their outward ſhews, and publick oſtentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we ſeek for the fruit, which ought to be their virtuous and pious actions, we finde it of the bigneſs of the ſmalleſt peaze; glory, to all the world apparent; goodneſs, to all the World inviſible. And furthermore, as the leaves, body and boughs of this Tree, by ſo much exceed all other Plants, as the greateſt men of power and worldly ability ſurpaſs the meaneſt: ſo is the little fruit of ſuch Men, and ſuch Trees, rather fitting and becoming the unworthieſt Shrub, and humbleſt Bryar, or the poreſt and baſeſt Man, then ſuch a flouriſhing ſtatelyneſs, and magnitude. Laſtly, whereas Adam, after he had diſobeyed God, and beheld his own nakedneſs and ſhame, ſought for leaves to cover himſelf withal: this may ſerve to put us in mind of his and our ſins, as often as we put on our garments, to cover and adorn our rotten and mortal bodies: to pamper and maintain which, we uſe ſo many uncharitable and cruel practices in this world.

§. IV.

Of the names of the tree of Knowledg of good and evil: with ſome other notes touching the ſtory of Adam's ſin.

NOw, as touching the ſenſe of this Tree of Knowledg of good and evil, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the propertie of the Tree it ſelf, Moſes Bar-Cephas, an antient Syrian-Doctor (tranſlated by Maſius) giveth this judgment: That the fruit of this Tree had no ſuch virtue or quality, as that by the taſting thereof, there was any ſuch knowledg created in Adam, as if he had been ignorant before; but as Junius alſo noteth: Arbor ſcientiæ boni & mali (id eſt) experientiæ boni & mali ab eventu. The Tree of Knowledge of good and evil (that is) the experience of good and evil by the event. For thus much we may conceive, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phraſe) by the workmanſhip of Gods own hand, in greater perfection than ever any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created Plant, out of whoſe ſeed all men living have grown up; and having received immortality from the breath or ſpirit of God; he could not (for theſe reſpects) be ignorant, that the diſobeying of Gods commandment was the fearfulleſt Evil, and the obſervation of his Precepts the happieſt Good. But as men in perfect health do (notwithſtanding) conceive, that ſickneſs is grievous, and yet in no ſuch degree of torment, as by the ſuffering and experience in themſelves they afterwards witneſs: ſo was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the puniſhnents, due to neglect and diſobedience; and yet felt by the proof thereof in himſelf another terrour than he had fore-thought, or could imagine. For looking into the glaſs of his own guilty ſoul, he beheld therein the horrour of Gods Judgments; ſo as he then knew, (he feelingly knew) and had trial of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchaſed evil, which could not be expreſs'd. He then ſaw himſelf naked both in Body and mind; that is, deprived of Gods grace and former felicity: and therefore was this Tree called the Tree of Knowledg, and not becauſe the fruit thereof had any ſuch operation by any ſelf quality or effect: for the ſame phraſe is uſed in many places of the Scriptures, and names are given to Signs and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In ſuch ſort, as this Tree was called the Tree of Knowledg, becauſe of the event, as is aforeſaid: ſo was the Well of contention therefore called Eſek, and the Well of hatred Sitnath, becauſe the Heardſmen of Iſaac and Gerar contended for them: and the heap of Stones called the heap of witneſs, between Jacob and Laban; not that the Stones bare witneſs, but for a memory of the Covenant. So Jacob called the houſe of God Bethel; and Hagar, the Well in the Deſart, Viventis, & videntis.

Num. 20. 13. Gen. 16. 20, 21. Cap. 31. 48. Cap. 28. 19. Cap. 16. 14.

But Adam being both betrayed and maſtered by his affection, ambitious of a farther knowledg then he had perceived in himſelf, and looking but ſlightly (as all his iſſue do) into the miſeries and ſorrows incident; and greatly affecting the ſuppoſed glory which he might obtain by taſting the fruit forbidden: he was tranſported and blown forward, by the gentle wind of pleaſing perſwaſions, unawares; his progreſſion being ſtrengthened by the ſubtile arguments of Sathan, who laboured to poyſon mankind in in the very root, which he moistened with the liquor of the same ambition, by which himself perished for ever.

Ben. sem. 2. l. 2. But what means did the Devil find out, or what instruments did his own subtilty present him, as fittest and aptest to work this mischief by? even the unquiet vanity of the Woman; so as by Adams hearkning to the voice of his wife, contrary to the express commandement of the living God, Mankind by that her incantation became the subject of labour, sorrow, and death: the woman being given to man for a comfort and companion, but not for a counsellor. But because thou hast obeyed the voice of thy wife, &c. (said God himself) Gen. 3. 17. Cursed is the earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all thy life. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted; even by the most ugly and unworthy of all beasts into whom the Devil entred and perswaded.

Secondly, what was the motive of her disobedience? even a desire to know what was most unfitting for her knowledg; an affection which hath ever since remained in all the posterity of her Sex. Thirdly, what was it that moved the man to yield to her perswasions? even the same cause which hath moved all men since to the like consent; namely, an unwillingness to grieve her and make her sad, lest she should pine and be overcome with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Solomon the Son of David, Gods chosen servant, and himself a man endued with the greatest wisdom, did both of them disobey their Creator, by the perswasion and for the love they bare to a woman, it is not so wonderful as lamentable, that other men in succeeding ages have been allured to so many inconvenient and wicked practices by the perswasions of their wives, or other beloved darlings, who cover over and shadow many malicious purposes with a counterfeit passion of dissimulate sorrow and unquietness.

CHAP. V.

Of divers memorable things, between the Fall of Adam, and the Floud of Noah.

§. I.

Of the cause and the revenge of Cains sin: and of his going out from God.

THe same Pride and Ambition which began in Angels, and afterward possess'd Adam, Cain also inherited: for Cain (envious of the acceptation of his Brothers Prayer and Sacrifice) slew him, making himself the first Manslayer, and his Brother the first Martyr: the revenge of which unnatural murther, although it pleased God to mitigate, when Cain cried out that his punishment was greater then he could bear. For the same offence chiefly (wherewith the Sons of Adam, as it were, urged and provoked God) he destroyed all Mankind, but Noah and his Family: for it is written, The Earth also was corrupt before God: Gen. 6. v. 11, 13. of which in the same place, Moses giveth a reason: for saith he, The Earth was filled with cruelty: and anon after, God himself made the cause known unto Noah, saying; An end of all flesh is come before me, for the Earth is filled with cruelty through them, and behold, I will destroy them with the Earth, or from the Earth. Neither was this cruelty meant to have been in taking away the lives of men onely, but in all sorts of Injustice and Oppression. After this Murther of Abel, Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the East-side of Eden: Gen. 4. 16. in which words, The going out of Cain from the presence of the Lord, is not to be understood after the literal sense, God being wholly in all parts of the World: Totus in cœlo est, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus, sed utrumque simul; God (saith S. Augustine) is wholly in Heaven, and wholly in Earth, not by enterchanged times, but all at once; And that this is true, David witnesseth: If I be in Heaven (saith David) thou art there; if in Hell, thou art there also. But what is meant thereby? Exiit à facie Dei (saith Chrysostom) Cain went out from the presence of the Lord; (that is) he was left of God, disfavoured and bereaved of his protection.

§. II.

Of Cains dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his City Enoch.

THis word Nod or Naid, S. Hierom and many others understand to signifie wanwandring, or uncertain habitation: vexation or agitation, saith Junius; but the Seventy convert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a Country, and so doth Josephus. But it seemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or Wanderer in his cogitations, than any thing else; and that his thoughts and conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the Murther committed, justly fearing (by his own words) the like violence: And whosoever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay mé. Now, that Nod or Naid was a Region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling signifieth an Abiding: and we call those people Wanderers and Vagabonds that have no dwelling place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifest, Moses teacheth in what part of the earth this his habitation was which he affirmeth towards the East-side of Eden. Secondly, it is said by Moses, that after Cain departed from the presence or favour of God, he built a City, and called it by the name of his first-born, Enoch; which sheweth that he feared to wander, and rather sought to fortify himself against revenge. Cyrillus saith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Christ, and of the Jews; and that as Cain after that he had slain Abel unjustly, had thence-forth no certain abiding in the World: so the Jews, after they had crucified the Son of God, became Runnagates: and it is true, that the Jews had never since any certain Estate, Common-weal, or Prince of their own upon the Earth. Now, this Land of Nod, Junius taketh to be in Arabia Deserta, a Region of the Nomades; but Arabia the Desart is not Eastward, or on the East part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all these, in what part of the World soever, which in old time lived by Pastorage, and fed (as we call it in Ireland) upon white meat, without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greeks Nomades, and by the Latines, Pastores vagi, as the Northern Tartarians, the Getulians, and Numidians in Africa, the ancient Britains, and the Northern Irish: yea, such were the Inhabitants of Italy it self, till such time as Italus (who gave them that name) taught them the husbandry of Tillage, used at this day. But the Region Eastward from Eden is that part of Assyria, called by Ptolemy, Calena; which also might be derived of Carena, the Country of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in those parts, it may be gathered by the first possession of his Father Adam; for thus it is written, Genes. 3. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the Garden of Eden to till the Earth whence he was taken: and in the Verse following: Thus he cast out man, &c. and at the East-side of the Garden of Eden he set the Cherubims: which sheweth that the entry into Paradise was from the East, by which entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that side of Paradise which was Eastward, according to the Text. Cain also in the same Region sought his dwelling place. Now, if the word Nod, or Naid, do signifie profugus, that is, a Fugitive, we can give no longer time to this uncertain habitation of Cain, then till he built the City of Enoch, the first of the World, which he enclosed, either for his own defence, or (as Josephus writeth) to oppress others thereby. So as, for mine own opinion, I am resolved with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word (Vagabond) which Cain useth of himself, it seemeth by the perclose of the same Verse, that (Vagabond) is therein understood for such an one as travelleth in fear of revengement: For whosoever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me; or else (Vagabond) is taken for a man without protection, and cast out from the favour of God.

And because these Henochians, so called of the City of Henoch, were the first society and civil assembly of all other, it is likely that the fame of these People (either for cruelty, strength, or other actions) lived in memory of Noah and his Sons; so that after the Floud (as there were of all sorts of natures, some vertuously, some impiously disposed, and every active mind setting before it whom to follow or imitate) those People, which delighted in cruelty and oppression, took on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henochians were not the least. Perchance the place it self, where Henoch stood before the Floud, and whereof Monuments might remain (as the pillars or foundation of Joppe did) gave occasion to the Planters of that place, to call themselves by the same name: for of those Henochians there were many Nations in the borders of Pontus, and Colchis in Iberia, Sogdiana, and Bactria; of the same name many mountains, as those which are otherwise call'd Coraxici. And seeing that it is hard to find out the truth of these things, which the most aged Time hath covered over, or defaced, we may (according to the counsel of Plato) exceedingly rejoyce, and therewith satisfie our selves, if of so great, and almost worn-out Antiquity, of the eldest Peoples names and nations, there remain any print or footsteps to Posterity.

In * Pliny, P. Mela, Strabo, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, Stephanus, we find those Henochei described, though diversly written: as in Quotidiè de liquid in hoc magno orbe mutatur: nova urbium fundamenta jaciuntur, nova Gentium nomina (extinctis nominibus prioribus) oriuntur. Senec. ad Albinum.

* Plin. l. 6. c. 9 11. & 16. Mel. l. 1. c. 8. Strab. l. 11. Val. Flacc. l. 6. Lucan. l. 3. v. 37.

Pliny, ſometimes Henochii; in Mela, Enochii; in Flaccus, Heniochi; in Lucan, Eniochi: All which inhabit upon the Sea Euxinus, but yet none of theſe are on the Eaſt ſide of Eden, or (according to Moſes words) Eaſtward from Eden. For Moſes, in all places where he deſcribeth any Region, was ſo exceeding preciſe, as ſometimes he uſeth the word Eaſt or South without borrowing or addition; at other times with a borrowing, as Eaſtward, or Southward, or towards the Eaſt or South. In the place of Geneſis the eleventh, he writeth the word (Eaſt) ſimply and directly. And as they went from the Eaſt, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinar; but in this of Cain, he addeth the word (towards) as, in the land of Nod, towards the Eaſt-ſide of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining ſome one point or two, either to the North, or to the South of the Eaſt.

Verſe 2.

But, as we may conjecture that theſe Nations took name of Henoch the City of Cain; or of the Region wherein it ſtood, when the ſame was re-peopled after the Floud: ſo it is probable that theſe Henochii of Colchis, and other parts adjoyning, were not the firſt of that name after the Sons of Noah began to fill the World again: becauſe, had this Henoch the City of Cain ſtood in any of theſe parts, it had then been ſeated North, and not Eaſt or Eaſtward from Eden. But as Pliny findeth their habitation towards Pontus, ſo afterwards he goeth on Eaſtward, till he track them or trace them out to their original. For he calleth theſe of Colchis (now, Mengrelia) Sanni Heniochi; Ptolemy, Zani; beyond which an hundred & fifty mile Eaſtward, he findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond theſe he again diſcovereth a third Nation, from whence all the reſt took beginning, which inhabited on the Weſt ſide of the mountains of Paro-paniſus; between them and the great River of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North ſide; and theſe Henochii are due Eaſt from the Region of Eden, and Eaſtward from the very Garden it ſelf.

Plin. l. 6. c. 4, 5. Ptol. tab. Aſiæ. 3.

And although we cannot be aſſured that theſe Henochii took name from the memory of the City of Enoch directly; yet becauſe they inhabited due Eaſt from Paradiſe, and afterwards ſpread themſelves Weſtward (as all Noah's Sons did that came into Shinar) the conjecture is far more probable than that of Annius the Frier, who ſets Henoch in Phœnicia, quite contrary to Moſes word: Phœnicia from all parts of Eden, being directly Weſt.

And beſides theſe ſeveral Nations of the Henochii, Stephanus findeth a Region called Henochia, and the ſame alſo in the Eaſt, with divers mountains about Bactria and Sogdiana, of the ſame name. Onely the Grecians (according to their fabulous inventions of all things elſe) out of the word (Heniochi) which ſignifieth Cart or Coach-men, make theſe Nations to have ſprung from the Waggoners of Caſtor and Pollux (to wit) Amphites and Telchius, who attended them in the interprize of Jaſon into Colchis. And though I do not deny, but that Jaſon, with other Greeks, ranged the coaſts of Aſia the leſs, in an open Boat or kind of ſmall Gally,* of whom I ſhall ſpeak in his own time: yet no man doubteth but that the tale of the golden Fleece was for the moſt part Poetical; and withall, that in ſuch an open Boat, which could hardly carry their own Rowers, being fifty four, there was no place, and leſs uſe, of Coach-horſes or Waggoners.

§. III.

Of Moſes his omitting ſundry things concerning Cain's Generation.

BUt of the remembrance and teſtimonies of the name of the City of Henoch in prophane Story, thus much may ſuffice: Now it followeth to anſwer ſome few Objections againſt certain particulars in the fourth and fifth Chapter of Geneſis: againſt which, for the firſt, it is demanded, How it was poſſible for Cain (having no other aſſiſtance than his Son Henoch) to perform ſuch a Work as the building of a City, ſeeing there is thereto required ſo many hands, and ſo great a maſs of all ſorts of materials? To which it is anſwered, that we are firſt to conſider, That of Cain (becauſe he was the Parent of an impious Race) Moſes uſeth no ample declaration; and ſo it beſt agreeth with his divine Reaſon, ſeeing that he containeth the whole Story of the firſt Race, which laſted, by the leaſt account, 1656. years, in five ſhort Chapters: Yet thus much may every man borrow of his own weakeſt reaſon, That ſeeing it pleaſed God to beſtow on the firſt generations of mens lives ſo long a meaſure as 800. and 900. years, that in ſuch a ſpace Cain had not want of leiſure and means to build many ſuch Cities as Henoch, be the capacity anſwering to what other of the World ſoever: for in what Age of Cain's life he built it, the Scriptures are ſilent: as of whoſe times, and the times of his iſſues, Moſes had the leaſt care. And as it is ſaid of Cain, that he built a City: ſo it was ſaid of Noah, that his three Sons peopled all the World; but in both, the proceſs of time required is to be underſtood: which advice, ſeeing Moſes uſeth where the ſpace leſs requireth quireth it, as knowing that he writ the Scriptures to reasonable men, we may easily understand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference between the birth of Abel, and the oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Fuit autem post dies multos, or à fine dierum (that is) in process of time, it came to pass that Cain brought an oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to be understood of Cain, that many years foregone, and when his people were increased, he built the City of Enoch or Henoch.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, so of Solomon, that he built the Temple of Jerusalem; yet it is well known of Solomon, that he imployed in that 1 King. 16. Work 150000. labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our selves to say, the King invaded, when he caused an invasion to be made: and he built, when he commanded such a building. And therefore seeing that we find that Moses had no regard to the ages, birth, or death of any of Cain's issues, it is not to be marvelled at, why he also passeth over in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for of Cain, Moses
Gen. 4. 17. writeth in this manner: Cain also knew his wife, who conceived and bare Henoch, and he built a city, and called the name of the city after the name of his Son Henoch. And to Henoch was born Irad, and Irad begat Mehujael, and Mehujael begat Methusael, and Methusael Lamech.

Now, of Seth, Moses writeth far other-
c. 5. v. 5. wise, and in this manner. And Seth lived an hundred and five years, and begat Enoch, and Seth lived after he begat Enoch 807. years, and begat Sons and Daughters: so as all the days of Seth were 912. years, and he dyed: as for the years and times of the wicked, they were not numbred in Libro viventium, saith Cyril. But in Seth was the Church of God established; from whom Christ descended, as touching his manhood: and therefore this way and work Moses walked in, and finished it with care, passing over the reprobate Generation, (as aforesaid.) Of the Line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembreth but eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one; and of the Line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth.

I. ADAM.

2 Cain.
3 Henoch.
4 Irad.
5 Mehujael.
6 Methusael.
7 Lamech, who by Adah had
8 Jubal, and Tubal; and by Silla, Tubal-Cain and Noema.

I. ADAM.

2 Seth.
3 Enosh.
4 Cainan.
7 Henoch.
8 Methusalem.
9 Lamech, and 10 Noah.

These be the Generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Josephus giveth unto Lamech threescore and seventeen Sons and daughters, by his two Wives, Ada and Sylla: and to these three Sons of Lamech, Moses ascribeth the invention of Pastorage, of Musick, and the working in Metal; for it seemeth that Jubal first gathered together, and made familiar those beasts which formerly were untamed, and brought them into Herds and Droves: Tubal Gen. 4. 20, invented Musick, and Tubal-Cain the work- 21, 22.
ing in Brass and Iron: the one being addicted to Husbandry, the other was Mechanical, the third given to idleness and pleasure. In whom began these three meaner degrees, of Shepherds, Handy-crafts-men, and Musicians. And in the issues of Seth began the Services of God, Divinity, Prophecie, and Astronomy: the Children of the one beheld the Heavens, the other the Earth.

§. IV.

Of the diversities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their Children.

A Second scruple hath been made, How it came to pass that the Patriarchs begat their children at so divers Ages, as Cainan or Cenan at seventy years, Mahalecl and Enoch at threescore and five years, whereas Jared begat not any of his untill he was 162. years old: Methusalem begat at 187. Lamech at 182. and Noah at 500. years. Now this difference hath been the more enforced, because it cannot be conjectured, that either Jared, Methusalem, or Lamech abstained from Marriage out of the Religion of Abstinence, seeing that Enoch, who was translated by God for his singular Sanctitie, begat children before he was threescore and ten years old.

The apparent difference hereof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the Generations before the Floud precisely, according to the first-begotten and eldest Sons of the Patriarchs, but he drew down the Line of Noah from Seth, and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Ancestours, were they elder or younger, as he found them: for it is likely that Henoch was not the eldest of Jared, nor Lamech the first-born of Me- thuſalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing known to the contrary, but that Noah might have had many Sons before Shem, Ham, and Japhet; though theſe three were onely named, and ſurviving, and which by God were reſerved to be the Fathers of mankind after the Floud; and therefore when we find Mahaleel to be begotten by Kenan at threeſcore and ten years, who was the firſt Son of Kenan, and then reckon that Methuſalem begat Lamech in the 187. year of his life, the difference ſeemeth ſtrange, where Lamech is taken for the eldeſt. But Moſes rejecteth all the other Sons of Methuſalem but Lamech onely, becauſe he was the Father of Noah, as aforeſaid. Of this Saint Auguſtine hath ſomewhat elſe in his twentieth, and one and twentieth Chapters, De Civitate Dei.

But as Moſes counted the Generations of the firſt Age, and ſo to Abraham, and the children of the promiſe after him; ſo doth St. Matthew recite the Genealogy of Chriſt, not by the eldeſt Sons, but from thoſe whom God had choſen and bleſſed, without reſpect of the firſt-born, who have hereby the prerogative in Eſtates, worldly and tranſitory only; and therefore the Evangeliſt
Mat. 1. 2. nameth Iſaac, and not Iſmael, though Iſmael were firſt in time: ſo doth he take Jacob the younger, and not Eſau the elder; neither is Chriſt derived from any of the three eldeſt Patriarchs, Reuben, Simeon, or Levi, but from Juda a fourth Brother, and ſo from David a younger Son of Jeſſai; and laſtly, we find, that the Kingdom it ſelf of Juda was not given to the Heir in Nature, but to 1 Kings 1. the Heir of Grace, namely Solomon.

§. V.

Of the long lives of the Patriarchs, and ſome of late memory.

THe third Objection is, that the great difference of years between thoſe of the firſt Age, whereof ſome of them had well neer ſeen a thouſand years, makes it diſputable, whether the account of times were of the ſame meaſure as in after-Ages, ſeeing that ſoon after the Floud, men lived not a third part of that time; and in ſucceeding Ages, and to this day, not the tenth.

Sol. Pol. hiſt. c. 3. Macrob. Satur. lib. 1. cap. 8. Plin. l. 7. c. 48. They that have hereon reſolved that thoſe years were but Lunary years (to wit) of a moneth or thereabouts, or Egyptian years, are eaſily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enoſh in the year of his life an hnndred and five, if thoſe years be taken but for moneths, then had Seth lived but eight years and one moneth when he begat Enoſh: and if the time of Enoſh have the ſame allowance when he begat Kenan, then could Enoſh at that time have been but ſix years and fourty eight weeks old; and ſo it may be gathered of the reſt, excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kind, as were the trees in their kind, bearing Fruit and Seed. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to give an ability of generation at ſix, ſeven, or eight years, agreeth with the ſhort lives of the Pigmies, and not with the conſtitutions of our firſt Fathers, who being deſcended from Adam, the workmanſhip of Gods hands, and begotten and born in the ſtrong youth of the World, had length of daies, and ability of body agreeable. Again, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunary years, then there would follow this extremity, that thoſe which lived longeſt, and upwards of nine hundred years, had by that account but the time of fourſcore and ten and odd years; which were not only leſs by far then the Patriarchs lived after the Floud, but ſhort of many mens lives in this decrepit Age of the World, wherein many exceed fourſcore, and ſome an hundred years. Further (if need be) to diſprove this reckoning, whereas it is written, Gen. 25. That Abraham died in a good Age, an old man, and of great years: all which (if the former accompt were of Lunary years) makes but ſeventeen and an half of our years.

And if we ſeek for a cauſe of this long life in Nature, then is it reaſonable, that the firſt man, created in higheſt perfection, ſhould alſo beget children of equal ſtrength or little differing: for of the firſt and pureſt ſeed there muſt of neceſſity ſpring up the faireſt and fruitfulleſt plants. Secondly, the Earth it ſelf was then much leſs corrupt; which yielded her increaſe, and brought forth fruit and food for man, without any ſuch mixture of harmful quality, as ſince that time the curſe of God, for the cruelty of mans heart, brought on it and mankind: Neither had the waters of the Floud infuſed ſuch an impurity, as thereby the natural and powerful operation of all Plants, Herbs, and Fruits upon the Earth received a qualification and harmful change. And as all things under the Sun have one time of ſtrength, and another of weakneſs, a youth and beauty, and then age and deformity: ſo Time it ſelf (under the deathful ſhade of whoſe wings all things decay and wither) hath waſted and worn out that lively virtue of Nature in Man, and Beaſts, and Plants; yea the Heavens themſelves, being of a moſt pure and Pſal. 102. v. 26. cleanſed matter, ſhall wax old as a garment; and and then much more the power generative in inferiour Creatures, who by the ordinance of God receive operative Virtue from the ſuperiour.

But beſides the old Age of the World, how far doth our education and ſimplicity of living differ from that old time? The tender bringing up of Children, firſt fed and nouriſhed with the Milk of a ſtrange Dugge; an unnatural curioſity having taught all Women (but the Beggar) to find out Nurſes, which neceſſity only ought to commend unto them: The haſty Marriages in tender years, wherein, Nature being but yet green and growing, we rent from her and replant her branches, while her ſelf hath not yet any root ſufficient to maintain her own top; and ſuch half-ripe ſeeds (for the moſt part) in their growing up wither in the bud, and wax old even in their Infancy. But above all things, the exceeding luxurioufneſs of this gluttonous age, wherein we preſs Nature with over-weighty burthens, and finding her ſtrength defective, we take the work out of her hands, and commit it to the artificial help of ſtrong Waters, hot Spices, and provoking Sawces; of which Lucan hath theſe elegant Verſes:

Pharſal. 4. —— O Prodiga rerum
Luxuries, nunquam parvo contenta paratu;
Et quæſitorum terra pelagoque ciborum
Ambitioſa fames, & lautæ gloria menſæ,
Diſcite quàm parvo liceat producere vitam:
Et quantum natura petat.
Non auro myrrháque bibunt: ſed gurgite puro
Vita redit: ſatis eſt populis, fluviuſque, Cereſque.

O waſtfull Riot never well content
With low-priz'd fare; hunger ambitious
Of Cates by Land and Sea far fetcht and ſent;
Vain-glory of a Table ſumptuous,
Learn with how little life may be preſerved.
In Gold and Myrrhe they need not to carouſe,
But with the Brook the peoples thirſt is ſerved;
Who fed with Bread and Water are not ſterved.

Pier. Hieroglyph. l. 2. The Egyptians affirm, that the longeſt time of man's life is an hundred years, becauſe the heart in a perfect body waxeth and groweth to ſtrength fifty years, and afterwards by the ſame degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philoſophy, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twenty years, and Beroſus to an hundred and ſeventeen years. Theſe opinions Pliny repeateth and reproveth, producing many examples to the contrary. In the laſt taxation, number, and review of the eighth Region of Italy, there were found in the Roll (ſaith Pliny) four and fifty perſons of an hundred years of age: ſeven and fifty of an hundred and ten: two of an hundred and five and twenty: four of an hundred and thirty: as many that were an hundred and five and thirty, or an hundred and ſeven and thirty years old: and laſt of all, three men of an hundred and fourty: and this ſearch was made in the times of Veſpatian the Father, and the Son. Plin. l. 7. c. 49.

The ſimple diet and temperate life of the Eſſæans, gave them long account of many years: ſo did it to the Secretaries of Egyptian Ceremonies, to the Perſian Magicians, and Indian Brachmans. The Greeks affirm out of Homer, that Neſtor lived three Ages, and Tireſias ſix, Sybilla three hundred years, Endymion of the leſs Aſia, little leſs: Alſo Maſaniſſa of Numidia lived very long, and Dando of Illyria. Among the Kings of Arcadia many lived three hundred years (ſaith Ephorus.) Hellanicus affirmeth of the Epeians, that ſome of them lived full two hundred years; and ſo doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians: and that theſe reports are not fabulous, Joſephus bringeth many witneſſes with himſelf; as Marethon, Beroſus, Mochus, Eſtius, Hieronymus, Egyptius Hecataus, Ephorus, and others. And Anthony Fume, an Hiſtorian of good reputation reporteth, that in the year 1570. there was an Indian preſented to Solyman, General of the Turks Army, who had out-lived three hundred years. I my ſelf knew the old Counteſs of Deſmond of Inchiquin in Munſter, who lived in the year 1589. and many years ſince, who was married in Edward the Fourth's time, and held her joynture from all the Earls of Deſmond ſince then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Munſter can witneſs: Strozzius Sicogna, out of Torquemada, Maffæus, and the like Authours, telleth of ſome that have not onely farr exceeded the term preſcribed by Epigenes; but been repaired from the withered eſtate of decrepit age to freſh youth. But for length of life, if we note but the difference between the ability of men in thoſe days wherein Galen the Phyſician lived, it may eaſily prove unto us, what Reeds we are in reſpect of thoſe Cedars of the firſt Age. For Galen did ordinarily let Bloud ſix pound weight, whereas we (for the moſt part) ſtop at ſix ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Conſtellations) which are the natural cauſes of a long and healthfull life; (to wit) ſtrong Joſ. ant. l. 13 c. 8. Plin. l. 7. c. 48.

Parents,

Parents, a pure and thin ayr, and temperate use of diet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldring stone, cannot stand long upright; on Ayr we feed alwaies and in every instant, and on meats but at times: and yet the heavy load of abundance, wherewith we oppress and overcharge Nature, maketh her to sink unawares in the mid-way; and therefore with a good constitution, a pure Ayr, and a temperate use of those things which Nature wanteth, are the only friends and companions of a long life.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs delivering their knowledg by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Floud.

A Fourth scruple hath been made, How the certain knowledg of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Story thereof written; and if any such had been, yet it is conceived, that all memory of Antiquity perished in the Universal Floud.

But if we consider the curiosity and policy of elder Ages, we shall find, that knowledg was the greatest treasure that men sought for, and which they also covered and hid from the vulgar sort, as Jewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreverent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoever was attained unto concerning God, and his working in Nature, the same was not left to publike dispute, but delivered over by heart and tradition from wise men to a posterity equally Zealous; Ex animo in animum sine literis, medio intercedente verbo: From mind to mind without Letters, by way of Tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Esdras, Origen, and Hilarius (as Mirandula conceiveth) that Moses did not only upon the Mount receive the Law from God, but withal, secretiorem & veram legis enarrationem; a more secret and true explanation of the Law; which (saith he, out of the same Authors,) he delivered by mouth to Joshua, and Joshua to the Elders: for, to teach these mysteries, which he called secretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quàm dare sanctum canibus, & inter porcos spargere Margaritas; then to give holy things to Dogs, and to cast Pearls before Swine. In succeeding times this understanding and wisdom began to be written in Ciphers and Characters, and Letters bearing the form of Beasts, Birds, and other creatures; and to be taught only to such as served in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Jews was an imitation: the invention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falsely.

Dion. Arcop.

Fol. 18.

This Cabala importeth a Law, received by tradition and unwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is Receptio in Latine, and a Receiving in English. And this custome was also held by the Druids and Bards of our antient Brittains, and of latter times by the Irish Chroniclers called Rimers. If then such as would seem wisest in the use of reason, will not acknowledg, that the story of the Creation or beginning of all things, was written by inspiration, the Holy-Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledg thereof might by Tradition (then used) be delivered unto him by a more certain presumption, then any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquity had preserved and left to their successors: which their wise men (as they terme them) did lay up and defend from the injury of the time and other hazards. For, leaving to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his children and successors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest, that Methusalem lived together with Adam himself two hundred fourty and three years, and Noah with Methusalem no less then five hundred years: and before Noah died, Abraham was fifty and eight years old: from whence this knowledg by an easie and ordinary way might come to Israel, and so to Moses.

Cabala est scientia Theologiæ non revelata. P. M. 83. Miran. 110. fol.

But besides this Tradition, it is questionless, that the use of Letters was found out in the very infancy of the world, proved by those Prophecies written on Pillars of Stone and Brick by Enoch: of which Josephus affirmeth, that one of them remained even in his time (meaning belike some ruin or foundation thereof) which Pillars by others are ascribed to Seth. But of these Prophecies of Enoch, St. Jude testifieth; and some part of his Books (which contained the course of the Stars, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia fœlix, in the Dominion of the Queen of Saba (saith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth, that he had seen, and read some whole Pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledg of the Creation, and story of the first Age, seeing he might receive it both by Tradition and Letter, had not the spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did: which also his many and strange Miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifest.

Now for the Books of Enoch, howsoever some men make mention of them, sure I am that Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, Beda, Procopius, Origen. Hom. 28. in Num. & comment. in Evang. Johan.

pius, Gazeus (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to prove them unwritten Traditions, alledgeth that Pope Gelasius among other the Apocryphal Scriptures (which he rejecteth) named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoever was remembred out of them, the same was delivered by Tradition from the Jews. But I rather think with Pererius, that such a Book there was, and that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, and many things added thereunto by Hereticks, who took occasion upon the antiquity thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Devil about the body of Moses, to frame and add thereunto many inventions of their own. One of the greatest arguments against these Books, is, that neither Philo nor Josephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquity) make mention thereof. But against it I will set this opinion of St. Augustine, Scripsisse quidem nonnulla divina Enoch, illum septimum ab Adam, negare non possumus: That Enoch the seventh from Adam, did write divers divine things, we cannot deny. Now his writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquity, and of fables of Giants, supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Book was found amongst those Canonical Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Judaico (saith Tertullian) who yet affirmeth, that this Book might be preserved by Noah. Surely, that Enoch wrote the Prophesies remembred by Jude, no man can deny; how they were delivered to posterity, I know not; whether by the Jews Cabala, or by what other means, the same is but mans conjecture. And (certainly) by the knowledg ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heavens, and of the natures and conjunctions of the Stars; and afterwards to some of his Sons, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had seen and might preserve this book. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledg therein (as these men had) was suddenly invented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath been said before. And therefore if Letters and Arts were known from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah lived with Methusalem, who lived with Adam, and Abraham lived with Noah; it is not strange (I say) to conceive how Moses came to the knowledg of the first Age, be it by Letters, or by Cabala and Tradition, had the undoubted Word of God need of any other proof then self-authority.

Of the men of renown before the Flood.

NOw let us consider the relation of Moses, who nameth seven descents of Cains children: and of Adam by Seth, ten; Seth being given by God in stead of Abel: And of Seth was Enosh begotten, in whose time men began to profess Religion, and to offer sacrifice in publick. For although Adam instructed his Children in the knowledg of God their Creator, as appeared by the Sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the death of Enosh, men began publickly to call on the Name of the Lord, that is, they served and praised God by Communion and in publick manner, or calling upon the Name of the Lord; and thereby were the Sons of God, or the Godly, distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enosh the Son of Seth, to the time of Henoch the Son of Jared, there is nothing remembred by Moses, but their owne births, the birth of their Sons, the length of their lives, and deaths. But of Henoch it is written: That he walked with God, and he was no more seen: for God took him away. By that, that he walked before God, was meant, that he was a just and upright man, and that he feared, loved, and obeyed God. For the same phrase Moses useth of Noah; Noah was a just and upright man in his time, and Noah walked with God. The Seventy convert it, Enoch placuit Deo; Enoch pleased God. And although Aben-Ezra, and others, understand this place, (tulit eum Deus) scilicet, mortuus est; God took him away, (that is) he dyed, which (indeed) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech to this day, to say, God took him away when he died; yet the difference which Moses maketh between the piety of Henoch, and the rest of the Patriarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which he useth to all else, makes it manifest, that Henoch was not dissolved as the rest. For to all the rest of the Patriarchs, Moses useth these words, And he dyed; but of Henoch he spake otherwise, saying only, He was missing, or, he was not seen. Et non inveniebatur (saith the Apostle to the Hebrews) quia Deus eum transtulit; And he was not found, for the Lord took him away. In the same place it is expressly added, that he saw not death.

Gen. 5. 24.

V. 1.

But whether this taking away of Henoch were not with the same kind of changing which St. Paul promiseth, when he saith, that, when the end shall come, we shall not all die, but but all shall be changed, I leave it to the learned Divines.

After Enoch, Moses passeth over to Methusalem and Lamech, remembring (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death: saving that Lamech propheſied of his Son Noah,

Gen. 5. 29. saying, This same shall comfort us concerning our work, and sorrow of our hands, as touching the earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more amply than of any of the rest of Adams children by Seth, being the last

Gen. 6. 9. of the ten generations of the first Age, whom God (with his Family) preserved, because he was an upright man in his time, and feared God.

But of the war, peace, government, and policy of those strong and mighty men, so able both in body and wit, there is no memory remaining: whose stories, if they had been preserved, and what else was then performed in that newness of the world, there could nothing of more delight have been left to Posterity. For the exceeding long lives of men (who to their strength of body and natural wits, had the experience added of 800. and 900. years) how much of necessity must the same adde of wisdom and undertakings? Likely it is, that their works excelled all whatsoever can be told of aftertimes, especially in respect of this old age of the world, when we no sooner begin to know, but we

Aphor. 1. begin to die; according to Hippocrates: Vita brevis, ars longa, tempus præceps; (which is) Life is short, art is long, time is headlong. And that those people of the first Age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of Moses; These

Gen. 6. 4. were mighty men, which in old time were men of renown. But these men of renown (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of body, and cruelty of mind) trusted so much to their own abilities, as they forgat altogether the piety of Seth, and the ways wherein Henoch walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were evil, onely evil and continually evil. And this wickedness was not onely found in the issues of Cain, but it was then universal, when the children and Sons of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and mis-led by their Idolatrous Wives, the Daughters of Cain, or of those other men, loving themselves and the world onely.

Gen. 6. 5. That these Sons of God were Angels, which being taken with the beauty of women, accompanied them, and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed; namely, Lactantius, and Eusebius, mis-led by Josephus: of whom I can not doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers have taken great advantage, and have troubled themselves with large answers, and very needless: the question being uncapable of dispute, especially since S. Chrysostom and S. Augustine have answered it largely long ago. For, that good and godly men were honoured with the title of Gods children, it doth every where appear in Scripture; and on the contrary, to think that Angels, who (as Christ witnesseth) behold the face of God, (that is) always attend his commandments, should after a separation from the rest which fell with Lucifer, forsake the glorious presence of their Creatour, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrary both to Nature and Grace, were more than madness to imagine.

§. VIII.

That the Giants, by Moses so called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as also, divers in later times.

OF these Giants which Moses calleth mighty men, Goropius Becanus an Antuerpian (who thought his own wit more Gigantical than the bodies of Nimrod, or Hercules) hath written a large Discourse, intituled, Gigantomachia; and strained his brains to prove, that there were never any such men: his reasons (whosoever desires to lose time) he may find them in the Treatises before named. It is true, that Cyrillus reproves the Grecian Poets for their monstrous fictions: who affirm shamelessly, That the Giants have in elder times, not onely cast up Mountains upon Mountains, but removed Islands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that invention of casting up Hills, and making War with the gods, no doubt but that the same was borrowed out of the Story of Nimrod, as before remembred; and even out of this Scripture. That the Sons of God saw the Daughters of Men, of whom the first Giants were begotten, was that conceit, taken from Orpheus and Hesiodus, That Giants were the Sons of the Heaven and the Earth; meaning by the Heavens the Sons of God, and by the Earth, the Daughters of Men: which verses of Orpheus are by John Cassam (who hath written a very witty Discourse of this Subject) thus changed into Latine:

Nomine cœlestes illos dixêre Gigantes,
Orti quòd terrâ fuerint & sanguine cœli.

From th' Earth, and from thy bloud, O heaven, they came,
Whom thereupon the gods did Giants name.

But

But what will not Opiniators, and ſelf-believing men diſpute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceive that there were in the firſt Age ſuch kind of men; and of which there have been in all times ſince; ſeeing the Scriptures avow the one manifeſtly, and common experience the other?

And for that ſuperlative ſtraining of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was given to Oppreſſors and Tyrants, and not to ſtrength of body, and eminent ſtature: ſuch men might with better reaſon call them Oppreſſors, becauſe they were Giants; and therefore had ability to oppreſs, than ſay, That they were called Giants onely, becauſe Oppreſſours. For firſt, Moſes himſelf calleth them mighty men; which ſheweth a ſtrength ſurpaſſing others: and afterwards men of renown (that is) of great undertaking and adventurous actions. And if the ſame ſtature of body, and ability, had not been found among divers Nations after the general Floud, then might this place of Moſes have more willingly hearkened to a diſpute, and yielded to interpretation.

But beſides all theſe famous Giants found in prophane Hiſtories (which I will reſerve to accompany the Giants of Albion, in the Story of Britany) the Scriptures do cleerly, and without all Allegorical conſtruction, avow, That beſides Nimrod, there were found of theſe Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moſes, of Joſuah, and of David; namely, the Rephaims in Aſteroth; the Zuzæi, or Zanzummims in Ham, and the Emims which dwelt anciently in the Land of Moab; whom Moſes (for ſtature) compareth with the Anakims which dwelt in Hebron; for they alſo were taken for Giants as the Anakims. Likewiſe where Moſes ſpeaketh of the Land of Ammon, he uſeth theſe words: That alſo was taken for a Land of Giants, for Giants dwelt therein afore-times: and, whom the Ammonites call Zanzummims; a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And theſe Giants called Rephaims in Aſteroth and Karnaim, and the Zuzæi or Zanzummims, Chederlaomer, King of Elam, overthrew, aſſiſted by other Kings his aſſociates. Alſo the Prophet Amos found among the Ammonites, men of Giant-like ſtature, whom he compareth to the Cedar, and whoſe ſtrength to the Oaks: and the Prophet Baruch, Theſe were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of ſo great ſtature, and ſo expert in warr. Particularly, it is written of Og King of Baſan, that his bed of Iron was nine Cubits long, and four Cubits broad: for onely Og King of Baſan remained of the remnant of the Giants who commanded the Kingdom of Baſan four hundred years after the Expedition of Chedorlaomer. Moreover, thoſe Diſcoverers and Searchers of the Land of Promiſe (ſent by Moſes from Cadesbarne in Paran) made report at their return of the great ſtature of thoſe people in general, and eſpecially of the Sons of Anak, in theſe words: All the people which we ſaw in it, are men of great ſtature: for there we ſaw Giants, the Sons of Anak, which come of the Giants, ſo that we ſeemed in our ſight, like Graſhoppers, and ſo we were in their ſight (that is) the Searchers found in their own judgments a marvellous difference between the Anakims and themſelves: inſomuch that the Iſraelites were ſo ſtricken with fear, as they rather ſought, and deſired, to return again into Egypt, and were more willing to endure their former ſlavery, than to fall by the ſtrokes of thoſe fearfull Nations. Furthermore, the Scriptures put us out of doubt, that Goliah the Philiſtine of Gath, was a Giant of ſix Cubits and a ſpan long: the Armour which he wore, weighed five thouſand ſhekels of Braſs: the ſhaft of his ſpear was like a Weavers beam, and his ſpear head weighed ſix hundred ſhekels of Iron. Alſo in Samuel there is mention of another Goliah, ſurnamed Getheus, becauſe he was of Gath: and of three other Giants; of which the firſt was ſlain by Jonathan, David's Nephew, who had twelve fingers, and as many toes: a man of great ſtature, and his fingers were by ſixes, even four and twenty.

Alſo that Sampſon was of ſurpaſſing ſtrength, no man doubteth, who tore a Lion as it had been a Kid, and after ſlew thirty of the Philiſtines, and (after that) a thouſand more of them with a Jaw-bone of an Aſs: And laſtly, he took the gates of Azzah, and the two poſts, and lifted them away with the barrs, and put them upon his ſhoulders, and carried them to the top of the Mountain before Ebron. If then it be approved by every judgment, that both Nature, and the Heavens wax old, and that the great age of Time hath (with it ſelf) infeebled and almoſt worn out the virtue of all things, then, I ſay, That as in all other kinds the Earth (before that Sin had increaſed the curſe and corruption) brought forth her young ones more ſtrong and beautifull, than it did in after ages: ſo alſo thoſe Giants, thoſe mighty men, and men of renown, as far exceeded the proportion, nature, and ſtrength of thoſe Giants, remembred by Moſes of his own time, and after him their ſucceſſors, as the ordinary proportion of men in general, ſoon after the Floud, and in times far off, exceeded the bulks and bodies of men which are now born, in the withered quarter and Winter of the World. If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth Age, much more in the first flourishing youth and newness of the World.

But the wickedness (especially in cruelty and oppression) of these men was such, as God therefore by the Floud, gave end to all flesh, but to the just Noah and his Family. And God repented him that he had made man: which Saint Augustine thus expoundeth; Neque enim sicut hominem, ita Deum facti sui pœnitet, cujus est de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa sententia, quam certa præscientia. Sed si non utatur Scriptura talibus verbis, non se quodammodo familiarius insinuabit omni generi hominum, quibus vult esse consultum: ut & perterreat superbientes, & excitet negligentes, & exerceat quærentes, & alat intelligentes; God (saith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done (as men use to do) but if the Scripture did not use those words, or the like, it should not (in a sort) insinuate it self familiarly to all sorts of men, for whom it would provide: that it might terrifie the proud, stir up the negligent, exercise the searchers of the truth, and nourish those that understand.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the World; and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient Times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

That in old Corruptions, we may find some signs of more ancient Truth.

HEre, before we proceed any further, the occasion offereth it self for us to consider how the Greeks, and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inventions, and by breaking into parts the Story of the Creation, and by delivering it over in a mystical sence, wrapping it up mixed with other their own trumpery, have sought to obscure the truth thereof; and have hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receive those inter-mixed Discourses of God and Nature, for the inventions of Poets and Philosophers, and not as any thing borrowed or stoln out of the Books of God. But, as a skilfull and learned Chymist can as well by separation of visible elements draw helpfull Medicines out of poison, as poison out of the most healthfull Herbs and Plants (all things having in themselves both life and death) so, contrary to the purposes and hopes of the Heathen, may those that seek after God and Truth, find out every where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Story of the first Age, with all the works and marvels thereof, amply and lively expresst.

§. II.

That the Corruptions themselves were very ancient, as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

BUt this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in men (the one having erred but once, the other ever) as concerning Man-kind, it took such effect, that thereby (the liberal Grace of God being withdrawn) all the posterity of our first Parents were afterwards born and bred in a world, suffring a perpetual Eclipse of spiritual light. Hence it was that it produced Plants of such imperfection and harmfull quality, as the waters of the general floud could not so wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of man-kind. Yea, even among the few Sons of Noah, there were found strong effects of the former poison. For as the children of Shem did inherit the virtues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; so the Sons of Cham did possess the vices of the Sons of Cain, and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chaldæans began, soon after the Floud, to ascribe divine power and honour to the Creature, which was onely due to the Creatour. First, they worshipped the Sun, and then the Fire. So the Egyptians and Phœnicians Phœnicians did not onely learn to leave the true God, but created twelve ſeveral Gods, and divine powers, whom they worſhipped, and unto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus ſaith, Duodecim Deorum nomina primos Ægyptios in uſu habuiſſe, atque Græcos ab illis cepiſſe mutuatos, eoſque prius Aras, & Imagines, & Templa Diis, ſibi erexiſſe; The Egyptians (ſaith he) firſt deviſed the names of the twelve gods, which the Greeks received from them, who firſt erected unto themſelves Altars, Images, and Temples, for the gods.

Herod. in Euterpe.

§. III.

That in proceſs of time, theſe leſſer errours drew on greater: as appeareth in the groſs Superſtitions of the Egyptians.

BUt as men once fallen away from undoubted truth, do then after wander for evermore in vices unknown, and daily travel towards their eternal perdition: ſo did theſe groſs and blind Idolaters, every Age after other, deſcend lower and lower, and ſhrink and ſlide downwards from the knowledg of one true and very God; and did not thereby erre in worſhipping mortal men onely, but they gave divine reverence, and had the ſame reſpect to Beaſts, Birds, Fiſhes, Fowls, Winds, Earth, Water, Ayr, Fire, to the Morning, to the Evening, to Plants, Trees, and Roots, to Paſſions and Affections of the Mind, to Paleneſs, Sickneſs, Sorrows, yea, to the moſt unworthy and baſeſt of all theſe. Which barbarous blaſphemy, Rhodius Anaxandrides derideth in this manner:

Nat. Com. l. 1. c. 7.

Bovem colis, ego Deis macto bovem.
Tu maximum Anguillam Deum putas: ego
Obſoniorum credidi ſuaviſſimum.
Carnes ſuillas tu caves, at gaudeo

Edentem ubi deprehendo fortè obſonium.

I ſacrifice to god the Beef which you adore.
I broyl th'Egyptian Eeles, which you (as god) implore:
You fear to eat the fleſh of Swine; I find it ſweet.
You worſhip Dogs; to beat them I think meet,
When they my ſtore devour.

And in this manner Juvenal.

Porrum, aut cæpe, nefas violare aut frangere morſu:
O ſanctas gentes, quibus hæc naſcuntur in hortis Numina!

The Egyptians think it ſin to root up, or to bite
Their Leeks or Onyons, which they ſerve with holy rite:
O happy Nations, which of their own ſowing
Have ſtore of gods in every Garden growing!

§. IV.

That from the relicks of Ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the firſt Idols and Fables were invented: and the firſt Jupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubal-Cain, &c.

BUt in ſo great a confuſion of vanities, where among the Heathens themſelves there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to find out from what example the beginnings of theſe inventions were borrowed, or after what ancient pattern they erected their building, were it not certain that the Egyptians had knowledge of the firſt Age, and of whatſoever was done therein, partly from ſome inſcriptions upon ſtone or metal remaining after the Floud; and partly from Mizraim the Son of Cham, who had learn'd the ſame of Cham, and Cham of his Father Noah: for, all that the Egyptians write of their ancient Kings, and date of times, cannot be fained: and though other Nations after them had by imitation their Jupiters alſo, their Saturns, Vulcans, and Mercuries, with the reſt, which S. Auguſtine out of Varro, Euſebius out of many prophane Hiſtories; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more have obſerved, to wit, the Phœnicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greeks, and other Nations; yet was Cain, the Son of Adam, (as ſome very learned men conceive) called and reputed for the firſt and ancient Jupiter; and Adam for the firſt Saturn: for Jupiter was ſaid to have invented the founding of Cities; and the firſt City of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochii, before remembred. And ſo much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which alſo Hyginus in his 275. Chapter confirmeth. For beſides that many Cities were founded by divers men; Tamen primam latiſſimam à primo & antiquiſſimo Jove ædificatam: yet the firſt and largeſt was built by the firſt and moſt ancient Jupiter, ſeated in the Eaſt parts, or in India, according to that of Moſes: And Cain dwelt towards the Eaſt ſide of Eden, &c. where alſo the Henochii were found after the Floud. And therefore was Jupiter by the Athenians called Polieus, Gen. 4. 16.

a Founder of Cities, and Herceios, an Incloſer, or ſtrengthener of Cities (ſay Phornutus and Pauſanias;) and that to Jupiter Herceios, there were in very many places Altars and Temples erected. And, that there were Cities built before the Floud, Plato alſo witneſſeth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that, ſoon after mankind began to increaſe, they built many Cities; which, as his meaning, he delivereth in plain terms, in his third Book of Laws: for he ſaith, that Cities were built an exceeding ſpace of time before the deſtruction by the great Floud.

This firſt Jupiter of the Ethnicks was then the ſame Cain, the Son of Adam, who marrying his own Siſter (as alſo Jupiter is ſaid to have done) inhabited the Eaſt, where Stephanus de Urbibus placeth the City Henochia. And beſides this City of Henoch, Philo Judæus conceiveth that Cain built ſix others, as Maich, Jared, Tche, Jeſca, Selet, and Gebat: but where Philo had this, I know not. Now, as Cain was the firſt Jupiter, and from whom alſo the Ethnicks had the invention of Sacrifice: ſo were Jubal, Tubal and Tubal-Cain (inventors of Paſtorage, Smith-craft, and Muſick) the ſame which were called by the ancient prophane Writers, Mercurius, Vulcan, and Apollo. And as there is a likelihood of name between Tubalcain and Vulcan: ſo doth Auguſtine expound the name of Noema, or Naamath, the Siſter of Tubalcain, to ſignifie Venuſta, or beautifull, Voluptas, or pleaſure; as the Wife of Vulcan is ſaid to be Venus, the Lady of pleaſure and beauty. And as Adam was the ancient and firſt Saturne; Cain, the eldeſt Jupiter; Eva, Rhea, and Nomea, or Naamath the firſt Venus: ſo did the Fable of the dividing of the World between the three Brethren, the Sons of Saturne, ariſe from the true Story of the dividing of the Earth between the three Brethren the Sons of Noah: ſo alſo was the fiction of thoſe golden Apples kept by a Dragon, taken from the Serpent which tempted Evah: ſo was Paradiſe it ſelf tranſported out of Aſia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Heſperides: the Prophecies, that Chriſt ſhould break the Serpents head, and conquer the power of Hell, occaſioned the Fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of Heſperides, and deſcending into Hell, and captivating Cerberus: ſo out of the taking up of Henoch by God, was borrowed the converſion of their Heroes (the inventors of Religion, and ſuch Arts as the life of man had profit by) into Stars, and heavenly Signes, and (withall) that leaving of the World, and aſcention of Aſtræa: of which Ovid;

For although thereby the Ethnicks would underſtand Juſtice it ſelf to have failed, as it is a vertue abſtract, and may be conſidered without a perſon; yet, as it is uſual among the ancient Poets to deſcribe Vertues and Vices by the perſons of men and women, as Deſire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, Beauty or Luſt by Venus; ſo do they alſo the perſons of men by like Vertues and Vices: and therefore by Juſtice and Aſtræa, Enoch; the juſtice and piety of Enoch, being in the ſame manner expreſt, as that of Noah was by Moſes: for Noah was ſaid to be a juſt man; And Noah walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, That he walked with God, and he was no more ſeen: for God took him away.

From this Story alſo of the firſt Age, and from that part where Moſes remembreth the Giants begotten by the Sons of good men upon the Daughters of the wicked (whom Moſes calleth mighty men, and men of renown) did they ſteal thoſe wondrous great acts of their ancient Kings, and powerfull Giants; and again, their Warr undertaken againſt the Gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the Giant Nimrod, as S. Auguſtine termeth him. Which war of their Giants, Cornelius Severus thus deſcribeth.

Tentavere (nefas) olim detrudere mundo
Sydera, captivique Jovis transferre Gigantes
Imperium, & victo leges imponere cœlo.

The Giants did advance their wicked hand
Againſt the Stars, to thruſt them headlong down;
And robbing Jove of his Imperial Crown,
On conquer'd Heavens to lay their proud command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purpoſed to raiſe the building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deep, nor by any conjunction of the Stars, ſhould bury them under the moiſture of a ſecond Floud, but that by this building (if they had been herein victorious) they would have given the Law to Heaven it ſelf. Alſo the making of leagues, peace and covenants among Heathen Nations and Kings, confirmed by Sacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eighth and twelfth of his Æneids hath a touch, was (as it ſeemeth) borrowed from Moſes, Exod. 24. who, when he read the Book of the Covenant, ſprinkled the people with bloud.

the children of Israel (as of late some learned men, mistaking his time, supposed) called his Son and Successour Setho, of Seth: and of the same Seth (as many men of good judgment have granted) were the Princes of Thrace, called Seuthes, whereof there were many very famous. But herein was the memory of Seth most manifestly preserved, that the Egyptians worshipped Seth, as their most antient Parent, and of the first Tradition: in honour of whom they called a principal Province Setheitica. We also find in Bithynia the City of Sethia, and others of the same name elsewhere. And sure, from the Egyptians did the Grecians borrow this kind of Theologie, though they scorned to acknowledg any antiquity preceding their own: and that they might not seem to learn elsewhere, they gave the same names to their own Idols, which the Egyptians did to theirs.

§. V.

Of the three chiefest Jupiters, and the strange story of the third.

BUt of all those Armies of Jupiters, remembred by the Antients, Cicero maketh but three, because those were of most fame: which other Writers have also done, who sought out, and laboured in their originals.

The first was Jupiter, the Son of Aether and Dies, so called because the one had reference to his Celestial conditions (for æther is as much as shining or pure fire:) the other discovered his natural virtues, which daies and times make more perfect, and are the witnesses of mens actions.

The second was said to be the Son of Cœlum or Heaven, for the same former respect; and this Jupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Athens.

The third, of whom all the Grecian fables were devised, was of Crete (now Candie,) the Son of Saturn and Ops. The name derived from the Latine is taken of Juvans pater, from the Greek word Zeus; it lignifieth life, but somewhat strained. Boccas in his Genealogie of the Gods, conceiveth, that his name was borrowed from Jupiter the Planet; but whether that Star had such a name before the same was given to men, I know not. Jupiter is hot and moist, temperate, modest, honest, adventurous, liberal, merciful, loving, and faithful (that is) giving these inclinations. And therefore those antient Kings beautified with these conditions, might be called thereafter Jupiter: but howsoever they were, or were not with those virtues inriched, yet by imitation, all Kings in the eldest times assumed those Titles and Sirnames: great Princes affecting as high Titles of honour and reputation in the world (howsoever deserved) as the worthiest that ever were; acquired by their well-deservings. Joves omnes Reges vocârunt antiqui, The antients called all Kings Jupiters, as Tzetzes in his varia historia confirmeth; Reges olim Joves vocârunt omnes; In old times all Nations call'd their Kings Jupiters. But where this last and most remembred Jupiter was born, it is uncertain. Some there are, that make him of Crete: others that he was but sent thither by his Mother Ops, or Opis, to be fostered and hidden from the fury of Titan his Uncle: because it was conditioned between Saturn and Titan, that Saturn being a younger Brother, and reigning (for his own life) by Titans permission, he should put to death all his male children, lest the Titans might be interrupted by any one of them in their succession; which agreement, because Saturn performed in his first born, it is feigned that Saturn devoured his own children. Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latine:

Nat. Com. l. 1. c. 7.

Haud fit pinguior,
Crudis sepulchrum quòd sit ipse filiis.

Saturne to be the father is not known,
By being the grave and burial of his own.

This composition between Titan and Saturn, Sybilla also witnesseth in these words;

Conceptis verbis, Titan jurare coëgit
Saturnum, de se natum ne nutriat ullum,
Quò possint regnare, senis post fata, Nepotes.

Things thus agreed; Titan made Saturn swear
No Son to nourish, which by reigning might Usurp the right of Titans lawful heir.

But Opis the Mother of Jupiter, being delivered at once both of Jupiter and Juno conveyed Jupiter (first called Lysanias) into Crete, as she did afterwards his two Brothers, Neptune and Pluto: where he was brought up in Gnossus, the chief City of that Island, by Cresta the King, or by the Curetes, a people and nation thereof.

Euseb. in Temp.

Others challenge him to be of Thebes and a Thebane: others call him an Arcadian: others make him of Messena. The like contention is found among the Greeks touching his education and first fostering. Some affirm that he was fed by Hony-bees: in recompence whereof he changed their black coats and and ſkins into yellow; a reward well fitting ſuch a God; others, that he was nouriſhed by Bears: others, by Goats: and of all theſe the idle Greeks have many pretty tales. But in the end, when Titan had knowledg that Saturn had broken his faith, he ſet on him, and took him and his wife priſoners, whom Jupiter again reſcued and delivered.

But laſtly, the Father and the Son equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturn being the leſs powerful, fled into Italy, and left his Kingdom in Greece to his Son. And although this Prince at the firſt purchaſed great honour, and for his many virtues, the name of Jupiter was given him: yet after he was once ſetled, and became potent, he gave himſelf over wholly to palliardize and adultery, without all reſpect of Honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by ſuch as do aſcribe the actions of many to one Jupiter, that not therewith ſatisfied, he was afterwards known to offend in the ſin of Sodom with Ganimedes and others: and did not only begin with inceſt, marrying his owne Siſter Juno, but he raviſhed, betrayed, ſtole away, and took by ſtrong hand all the beautiful women born in his time, within the limits of his own Kingdoms, or bordering them. Among whom theſe hereafter written were of greateſt fame; Niobe, Laodamia, and Alcmena, the Wife of Amphytrion, by whom he had Pelaſgus, Sarpedon, Argus, and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus, of whom the Mountain Taygetus took name; with another Son called Saon, of whom Savonas; by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus: by Læda, Caſtor and Pollux, Hellen and Clytemneſtra: by Danae, Perſeus; by Jordana, Deucalion: by Charme (the daughter of Eubulus) Britomartis: by Protogenia, he had Athlius the Father of Endymion: and by Iö (the daughter of Inachus) Epaphus, the founder of Memphis in Egypt: which Epaphus, married Libya, of whom that Country took name, for ſo the Greeks afterward called Africa. He raviſhed Aegina the Daughter of Aeſopus, and carried her into the Iſland Oenopia or Oenotria, afterward called Aegina, on whom he begat Aeacus: by Torrhebia he had Archeſilaus and Carbius: by Ora, Colaxes: he had alſo Dardanus by Electra, who built Dardanium, afterward Ilium or Troy. He begat the Brothers Talici, on Thalia; and on Garamantis, Hiarbas. He had beſides theſe (if they bely not their chief God) Phileus and Pilumnus, inventers of the Bakers craft; and I know not how many more; but I know well that he could not be father to all theſe, who were born in Ages ſo far differing. And of theſe his ſeveral raviſhments, betrayings, ſtealing away of mens Wives, Daughters, and Sons, buying of Virgins, and the like, came in all thoſe antient fables of his transformations into ſhowers of Gold, Eagles, Bulls, Birds, and Beaſts; and of him, and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Grecian forgeries. And yet did not the Greeks and Romans fear to entitle this Monſter Optimus Maximus, though Cicero in his ſecond Book, de natura Deorum, affirm, that he deſerved nothing leſs; and in his Oration, pro domo ſua, reprocheth Clodius for his inceſt, by the name of Jupiter. His burial was in Crete (ſaith Lucian.) Cretenſes non ſolùm natum apud ſe, & ſepultum Jovem teſtantur, ſed etiam ſepulchrum ejus oſtendunt; The Cretians, or Candians, do not only avow that Jupiter was born and buried among them, but they ſhew his Grave and Sepulchre: which Epiphanius alſo confirmeth; for in his time there remained the Monuments of his Tomb in the Mountain Jaſius. This, Callimachus in his Hymns alſo witneſſeth; but, as offended thereat, ſaith thus: Luc. in Sacrif.

> The Cretians ever lyars were, they care not what they ſay:
> For they a Tomb have built for thee, O King, that liv'ſt alway.

Diodorus Siculus tells by way of report from the Libyan Fables, confirmed (as he ſaith) by ſome Greek Writers, that the original of theſe Gods was from the Weſtern parts of Africa. For there among the Atlantidæ reigned one Uranus (which ſignifieth Heaven) called ſo, for his great ſkill in Aſtrology; and for his knowledg, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a God after his death. He had by many Wives fourty five Sons; but by his principal Wife Titea, he had ſeventeen Sons and two Daughters, all which were called after their Mothers name, the Titanes. Of Titea, likewiſe it is ſaid, that ſhe for her goodneſs was Canonized as a Goddeſs, being dead, and called the Earth, as her Huſband was ſtyled Heaven. But of all the children of Titea, her Daughter Baſilea (which name ſounding as Queen in Engliſh, ſhe is by the Latine tranſlatour of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the reſt as far in virtue as in years, was by general conſent of her Brethren, and of the People, appointed to rule as Queen after her Father's death, being as yet a Virgin. She took to huſband her Brother Hyperion, to whom ſhe bare a Son and a Daughter, called Sun and Moon. The beauty and towardlineſs of theſe children moved her Brethren to envie, and bred in them a fear of being excluded from the ſucceſſion: wherefore they took the Boy and drowned Diod. l. 3. c. 5.

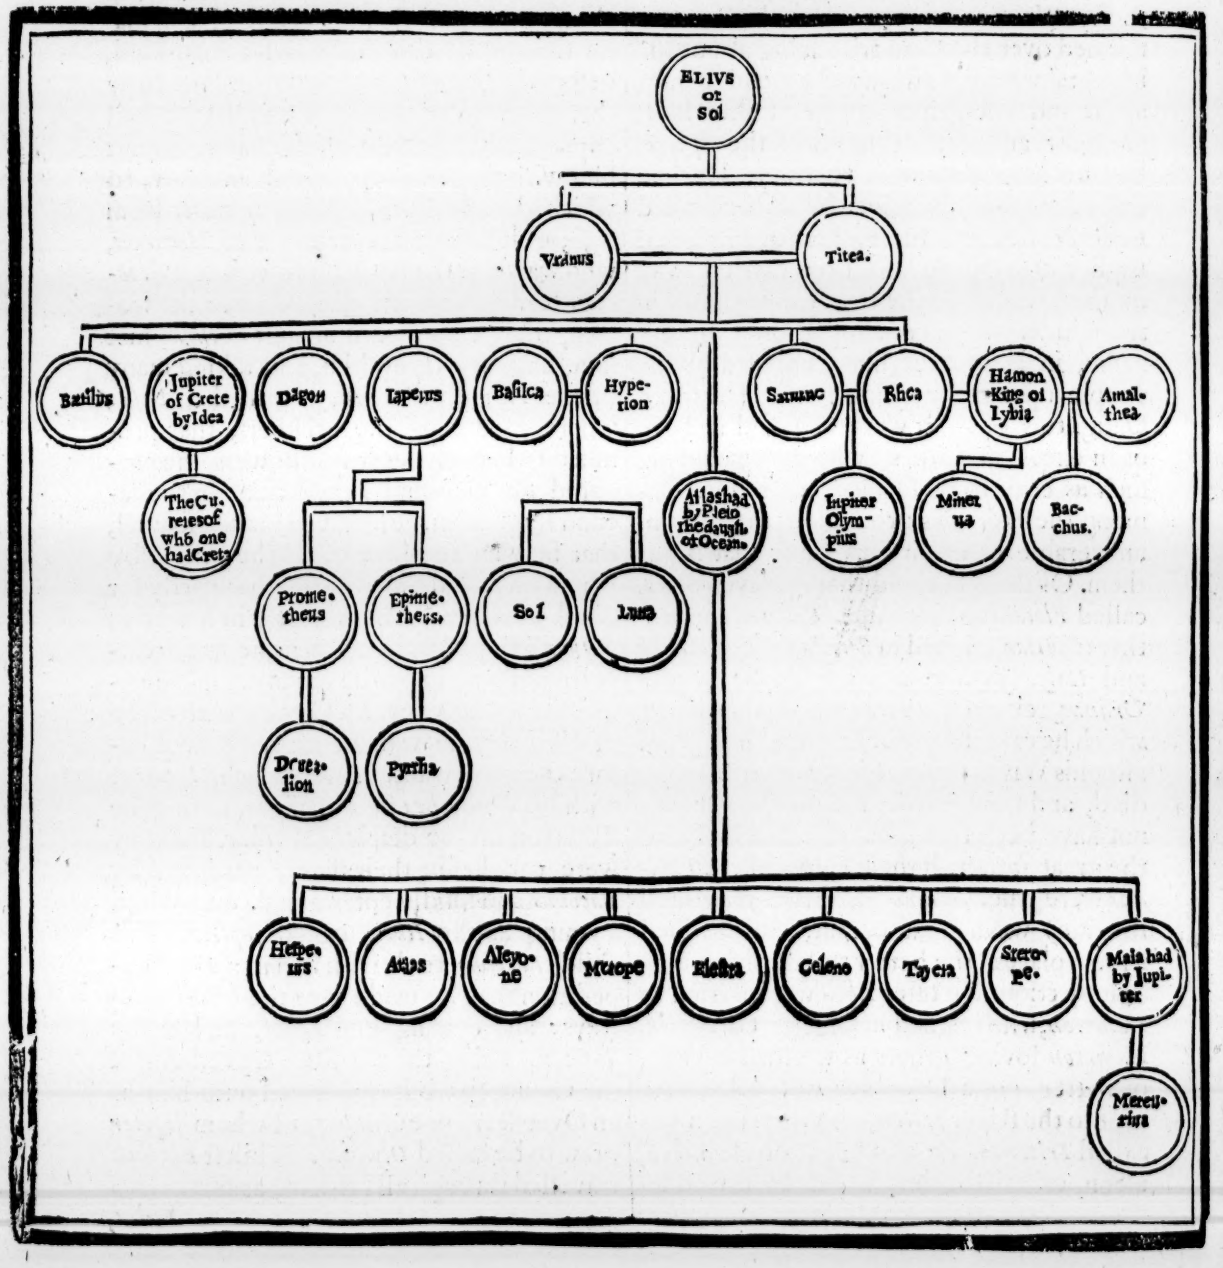
drowned him in the River Eridanus, now called Poe. The loſs of this child, cauſed his ſiſter to break her own neck; and the loſs of both her children, made the mother to play many mad prancks, dancing with Cymbals, after a wild faſhion, in ſight of all the people, before whom ſhe is ſaid to have vaniſhed away. Ere ſhe died, her Son (as the Fable hath it) ſignified unto her in a Dream, that he and his ſiſter, by the providence of God, ſhould become immortal; that alſo the Sun and Moon ſhould be called by their names, and that their death ſhould be revenged upon the Murtherers. According to which it is ſaid, that the people did ſo call thoſe two Planets, and withall held her ſelf as a goddeſs; and tearmed her the great Mother, which name they had formerly given to her, for her motherly care in cheriſhing her brethren whileſt they were young. Hyperion and his Race being extinguiſhed, the other Sons of Æranus divided the Kingdom. Of theſe, Atlas and Saturn were chief. Atlas reigned over the Countries lying about the Mountains, which afterward bare his name; a juſt and wiſe Prince, deeply ſkilfull in Aſtrologie: and, for invention of the Sphere, ſaid to have ſupported Heaven. He had many Sons; but the principal of them called Heſperus, being of his Fathers qualities and ſtudies, was ſaid to have been carried away by the Wind, from the top of an high Hill, in the middeſt of his contemplations; and his name, in honour of him, impoſed by the people upon the morning Starr. The ſeven Daughters of Atlas were alſo ſaid to have been excellent Ladies, who accompanying ſuch as came to be Deified, or regiſtred among the Worthies, brought forth children, anſwerable in quality to thoſe that begat them. Of theſe it is held, that the ſeven Stars, called Pleiades, took name. Saturn, the brother of Atlas, reigned in Sicilia, part of Africk and Italy. Jupiter, another of the Sons of Uranus, reigned in Crete; who had ten Sons, which he called Curetes: he called that Iſland after his Wives name, Idea; in which Iſle he died, and was buried. But this Jupiter muſt not have been that great one, but Uncle to the great Jupiter, if theſe Fables of the Lybians were true. Saturn (as theſe Lybians tell the tale) was a great Tyrant, and fortified ſtrong places, the better to keep his people in ſubjection. His ſiſter Rhea was married to Hammon, who reigned in ſome part of Africk. Hammon loving others as well as his Wife, or better, got a Daughter called Minerva, neer to the River Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonia. He alſo begat on Amalthea, a Son, called Bacchus, whom he cauſed ſecretly, for fear of his life, to be brought up at Nyſa, an Iſland in the River Triton, under the tuition of his Daughter Minerva, and certain Nimphs. To Amalthea he gave in reward a goodly Country, that lay on the Sea-coaſt, bending in form like a Horn, whence grew the tale of Amalthea's plentifull Horn, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard theſe news, ſhe fled from her Huſband to her brother Saturn, who, not onely entertained her as a ſiſter, but took her to Wife, and at her inſtigation, made warr upon Hammon, vanquiſhed him by the aſſiſtance of the Titans, and made him flee into Crete. The Curetes, Jupiter's children before mentioned, held the Iſland at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon, after the name of Creta the Kings Daughter, whom he took to Wife, and had with her (women, as may ſeem, being very gracious in thoſe names) the Kingdom. Bacchus was grown a proper young man, had found out the making of Wine, the art of planting of Trees, and many things elſe commodious for man-kind, before the flight of his Mother-in-law. Now therefore, hearing report of all that had hapned, and that Saturn was coming againſt him with the Titans; he levied an Army, to which the Amazons, living not farr from Nyſa, added great forces, in love of Minerva, who was entred into their profeſſion. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerva the women, they ſet forward againſt Saturn, met him, and overthrew him, and taking many of the Titans priſoners, returned to Nyſa; where pardoning the priſoners, that promiſed to become his true followers, he prepared for a ſecond Expedition. In the ſecond Expedition he behaved himſelf ſo well, that he wan the love of all the people by whom he paſſed; in ſo much, that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturn's rigorous government, he was greatly ſtrengthened, and the Enemy as much enfeebled by daily revolts. Coming to the City of Hammon, he wan a battel of Saturn before the very walls. After which, Saturn, with his Wife Rhea, fled by night, ſetting the Town on fire, to deſpight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entertained. Saturn had a young Son by Rhea, called Jupiter. This child Bacchus took with him in a great Expedition that he made into the Eaſt-Countreys: and coming into Egypt, he left this Jupiter, being then a Boy, Governour of the Countrey; but appointed unto him as an Over-ſeer, one Olympus, of whom Jupiter grew to be called Olympus. Whileſt Bacchus travelled through all Nations, as farr as into

India,

India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titans had found out his father Hammon in Crete, and began to war upon him. But Bacchus returned out of India, with whom Jupiter from Egypt, and his sister Minerva, together with the rest, that afterwards were held gods, joining all their forces, went into Crete, overthrew the Titans, chased them, took and slew them, and freed the World of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were Deified; and the great Jupiter, the Son of Saturn, succeeding them, reigned Lord alone over all the world, having none of the Titans left alive, nor any other to disturb him. Between this tale of the Lybian gods, and the Egyptian Fables of Osiris, there is a rude resemblance, that may cause them both to be taken for the crooked Images of some one true History. For the Expeditions of Osiris and of Bacchus; the warrs of the Giants in the one Story, of the Titans in the other; the Kingdom of Egypt given by Hercules Lybicus to Orus, by Bacchus to Jupiter, the rattles of Isis, and the Cymbals of Basilea, with many pretty circumstances, neerly enough resemble each other, howsoever not alike fitted to the right persons. Sanchoniato (as Eusebius cites him) would have all these to be Phœnicians, and is earnest in saying, That it is a true Story, and no Allegory. Yet he makes it seem the more allegorical, by giving to Uranus or heaven for daughters, Fate, and Beauty, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diodorus, though Diodorus have enough. To the Genealogie, he adds Elius, or the Sun, as father of Uranus, and among the children of Uranus, Japetus, Bætilus, and Dagon (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names) giving withall to Uranus, the proper name of Terrenus, or Indigena, and of Illus to Saturn, but omitting Jupiter of Crete.

Euseb l. 1. cap. 7.

The Pedigree of them is this:



§. VI.

Of Cham, and other wicked ones; whereof some gat, some affected, the name of God.

OF Jupiter Belus, the Son of Saturnus Babylonicus, otherwise Nimrod, it seemeth that Cicero had not heard, (at least by that name;) who was more ancient than any of the former three, by him remembred: for long after these times were the Greeks but Salvages, if they seek no farther off for their gods.

But the Egyptians, even after the Floud, began (somewhat before this Chaldean Jupiter) to entitle Cham, the Parent of their own Mizraim, Jupiter Chammon, or Hammon. For the Etymologie of this word (Hammon) which the Greeks deduce ab arenis, from the sands, is ridiculous (saith Pencer;) neither yet is his own much better, who brings it from Hammath, which signifieth Heat: because the Temple of Jupiter Hammon was seated in Libya, where the ayr is exceeding hot and scorching. And as for the Antiquity of the latter Jupiter (among the Greeks and Romans the most renowned) it is certain that he was born not long before the War of Troy, as by many of his Sons is made manifest; namely, Castor, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which lived in that Age of Priamus, under whom, and with whom, Troy was destroyed.

Pencer de Oraculo.

Now, seeing that mortal men, and the most wicked, were esteemed immortal among the Heathen; it was not to be wondred at, that Alexander Macedon, Tyberius Nero, Caligula, and others, sought to be numbred among them, who were as deformed Monsters as the rest: for by what reason could the same Deity be denied unto Laurentia and Flora, which was given to Venus? seeing they were as notorious and famous Harlots, as she was.

§. VII.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had far better opinions of God.

BUt that ever Pythagoras or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other ancient and excellently learned, believed in any of these fooleries, it cannot be suspected, though some of them (over-busily) have mixed their own inventions with the Scriptures: for, in punishment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Hesiod in Hell, where he fained that they were perpetually stung and pinched with Serpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read over all the Books of Moses, as by places stoln thence, almost word for word, may appear; of which Justine Martyr remembreth many in that Treatise converted by Mirandula. As for Plato, though he dissembled in some things for fear of the Inquisition of the Areopagites, yet S. Augustine hath already answered for him (as before remembred) Et mirificè iis delectatus est, quæ de uno Deo tradita fuerant; And he was greatly delighted in the doctrine of one God, saith Justine Martyr. Now, howsoever Lactantius pleased to reprehend Plato, because (saith he) Plato sought knowledge, from the Egyptians, and the Chaldeans, neglecting the Jews, and Books of Moses; * Eusebius, Cyrillus, and Origen, find reason to believe the contrary, thinking that from thence he took the grounds of all by him written of God, or savouring of Divinity: and the same opinion had S. Ambrose of Pythagoras.

But whether it were out of the same vanity, which possessed all those learned Philosophers and Poets, that Plato also published (not under the right Authours names) those things which he had read in the Scriptures; or fearing the severity of the Areopagites, and the example of his Master Socrates, by them put to death by poyson; I cannot judge. Justine Martyr (as it seemeth) ascribeth it wholly to Plato's fear, whose words among many other of the same effect, are, these; Plato, Mosis mentionem facere, ob id, quod unum solumque Deum docuerat, sibi apud Athenienses tutum non putavit, veritus Areopagum; Plato, fearing the Areopagites, thought it not safe for him among the Athenians, to make mention of Moses, that he taught there is but one God. But for that Divinity which he hath written in Timæo, Id ipsum de Deo disseruit quod & Moses; He discoursed and taught the same of God (saith Justine Martyr) which Moses did. For, where it pleased God by his Angel to answer Moses, Ego sum existens, (which is) I Am; and, Existens misit me ad vos; I am hath sent me unto you; herein did Plato (saith Justine Martyr) no otherwise differ than that Moses used the word (qui) and Plato the word quod: Moses enim, qui existit (inquit;) Plato, quod existit; for Moses saith, He who is; Plato, That which is. Now, of Gods incomprehensible nature, and of the difficulty either to conceive, or express the same, he giveth this testimony: Genitorem Universitatis tam difficile est invenire, quàm inventum impossibile digne profari; It is as hard to find out the Creator of the Universal, as it is impossible, if he were found, to speak of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable to the Majesty of Gods Nature, than this property by Plato acknowledged? Deus bonus

Areopagus or domus seu mons Martis, Mars his hill: a house wherein capital matters are tried: so called at first, because Mars therein first pleaded his cause for the murther of Halirrhothios. Pausan. in Attic. Nat. Com. l. 2. 6, 7. Just. Mart. adin. Gen. fol. 8. 14. ut sup. Exod. 3. 14.

In Timæo.

De legib. c. 10. bonus, & quidem Deus causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causa; God is absolutely good, and so (assuredly) the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is evil, he is no cause at all. And again, Charitas Dei fuit causa factionis mundi, & originis omnium rerum; The love of God was the cause of the worlds creating, and the original of all things.

Laertius. Apuleius the Platonist; Summus Deus infinitus est, non solùm loci exclusione, sed etiam naturæ dignitate: & nihil est Deo similius & gratius, quàm vir animo perfecto bonus; The most high God is also an infinite God, not onely by exclusion of place, but by the dignity of nature: neither is there any thing more like, or more acceptable to God, than a Man of a perfect heart. Thales affirmeth, that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient: Quia nunquam esse cœpit; because he never had any beginning. Zeno, that God beheld even the thoughts of men; Athenodorus, that therefore all men ought to be carefull in the actions of their life, because God was every where present, and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moses story of the Creation, than this opinion and description of the Worlds beginning in Euripides, Scholar of Anaxagoras?

Cœlum terraque unius formæ fuit:
Sed cum fuissent abjuncta amplexu mutuo,
Emersit omnis in lucem res progenita;
Arbores, aves, feræ, quasque affert mare,
Genusque mortalium.

Heaven and Earth one form did bear:
But when dis-joyned once they were
From mutual embraces,
All things to light appeared then;
Of trees, birds, beasts, fishes, and men
The still-remaining races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato; so we find the same excellent understanding in Orpheus, who every where expressed the infinite and sole power of one God; though he use the name of Jupiter, thereby to avoid the envie and danger of the time: but that he could attribute those things to the Sons of men, and mortal creature, which he doth to this Jupiter, there is no man, who hath ever heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (saith Mirandula) quos Orpheus canit, non decipientium Dæmonum, à quibus malum & non bonum provenit; sed naturalium virtutum divinarumque sunt nomina; The names of those gods whom Orpheus doth sing, are not of deceiving Devils, from whom evil comes, and not goodness; but they are the names of natural and divine Vertues. Yea, that he reacheth higher, and speaketh of God himself, this his instruction to Musæus, and the Hymn following, teach us: Respiciens verò ad divinum hunc sermonem, et diligenter animum adverte, intendens cordis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem ascende viam, & solum aspice mundi regem. Unus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt: ipse verò in illis versatur, nec quisquam eum intueri potest mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus omnes intuetur.

Then marking this my sacred speech, but truly lend
Thy heart, that's reasons sphere, and the right way ascend,
And see the worlds sole King. First, he is simply one,
Begotten of himself, from whom is born alone
All else; in which he's still: nor could it ere befall
A mortal eye to see him once, yet he sees all.

And again the same Authour,

Jupiter omnipotens, et primus, et ultimus idem;
Jupiter est caput & mediũ: Jovis omnia munus.
Jupiter est fundamen humi, & stellantis Olympi.
Jupiter & mas est, & fœmina nescia mortis.
Spiritus est cunctis, validi vis Jupiter ignis.
Et pelagi radix, Sol, Luna est Jupiter ipse.
Rex & origo simul rerum est, & terminus idem.
Nam prius occuluit; magno post numine sacrum
Cor referans, bonus in dulcẽ dedit omnia lucem.

The first of all is God, and the same last is he;
God is the head and midst, yea from him all things be,
God is the base of Earth, and of the starred skie.
He is the Male and Female too, shall never die.
The Spirit of all is God, the Sun and Moon, and what is higher.
The King th' original of all, of all the end.
For close in holy breast he did all comprehend, Whence all the blessed light, his wondrous power did send.

Now (besides these former testimonies) that all the learned men of antient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Egyptians, Grecians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will only repeat two or three other opinions, and leave the Readers to those large and learned Collections of Justine Martyr, Clemens, Lactantius, Eusebius, Eugubinus, Peucer, Plessis, Danæus, and others. For Cleanthes the Stoick, being demanded of of what nature God was, described him by these Attributes and properties: Bonus, justus, sanctus, seipsum possidens, utilis, speciosus, optimus, severus, liber, semper commodus, tutus, glorioſus, charitas, &c. Good, just, holy, possessing himself, profitable, beautiful, best, severe, free, alwaies doing good, safe without fear, glorious, and self-charity. Epicharmus affirmed, that God who beheld all things, and pierced every Nature, was only and every where powerful: agreeing with Democritus: Rex omnium ipse solus; He is the only King of kings: and with Pindarus the Poet, Deus unus, Pater, creator summus atque optimus artifex, qui progressus singulis diversos secundum merita præbet; One God, the Father, the most high Creator, and best artificer, who giveth to every thing divers proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith Antisthenes) cannot be resembled to any thing, and therefore not elsewhere known; Nisi in patria illa perenni, cujus imaginem nullam habes: Save only in that everlasting Country, whose image thou hast none at all. Hereof also Xenophanes Colophonius: Unus Deus inter deos & homines maximus, nec corpore nec mente mortalibus similis; There is one God among gods and men most powerful, neither corporally nor mentally like unto mortals: and Xenophon, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quiescere facit, magnus potensque, quod omnibus patet: qualis autem forma sit, nemini patet, nisi ipsi soli, qui luce sua omnia perlustrat; God who shaketh all things, and setteth all things at rest, is great and mighty; as is manifest to all: but of what Form he is, it is manifest to none, save only to himself, who illuminateth all things with his own light. Finally, Plato saith, Totius rerum naturæ causa, & ratio, & origo Deus, summus animi genitor, æternus animantium sospitator, assiduus mundi sui opifex, sine propagatione genitor, neque loco, neque tempore ullo comprehensus, eoque paucis cogitabilis, nemini effabilis; God is the cause, ground, and original of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the soul, the eternal preserver of living creatures, the continual framer of his world, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceive him in thought, none can express what he is. Therefore was it said by Saint Hierom, Si enim cunctos Philosophorum revolvas libros, necesse est ut in eis reperias aliquam partem vasorum Dei: ut, apud Platonem, fabricatorem mundi Deum: apud Zenonem, Stoicorum Principem, inferos & immortales animas, &c. If thou consider all the books of the Philosophers, thou canst not but find in them some part of the Vessels of God, as, in Plato, God the Creatour of the world: in Zeno, Prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortal Souls, &c. And this is certain, that if we look into the wisdom of all Ages, we shall find that there never was man of solid understanding or excellent judgment; never any man whose mind the Art of education hath not bended; whose eys a fooliſh superstition hath not afterward blinded; whose apprehensions are sober, and by a pensive inspection advised; but that he hath found by an unresistable necessity, one true God, and everlasting Being, all for ever causing, and all for ever sustaining; which no man among the Heathen hath with more reverence acknowledged, or more learnedly expres'd, then that Egyptian Hermes, howsoever it failed afterward in his posterity: all being at length by deviliſh policy of the Egyptian Priests purposely obscured; who invented new gods, and those innumerable, best sorting (as the Devil perswaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keep in aw and order their common people.

Hieron. in Com. in Dan. in princip.

§. VIII.

That Heatheniſm and Judaiſm, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under Julian miraculously confounded.

BUt these are again vaniſhed: for the inventions of mortal men are no less mortal then themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldeans worshipped for a god, is crept into every mans chimny, which the lack of Fuel starveth, Water quencheth, and want of Ayr suffocateth: Jupiter is no more vexed with Juno's Jealousies; Death hath perswaded him to chastity, and her to patience; and that time which hath devoured it self, hath also eaten up both the Bodies and Images of him and his: yea their stately Temples of Stone and dureful Marble. The houses and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found upon the Earth, nor any Monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phœnicia that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Lybia, Creta, Thessalia, or elsewhere, that can ask counsel or help from Jupiter. The great god Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apollo's Priests are become speechless; and the trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Devils telling men's fortunes therein, is taken up by counterfeit Egyptians, and couzening Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Devil gave way to these his over-throws and dishonours: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chief mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repaired, and re-edified again, till by the hand of God himself it received the last and utter subversion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and Ornaments therein by the Euboean Pyrates: Secondly, by the Phlegians utterly sack'd: Thirdly, by Pyrrhus the son of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Army of Xerxes: Fifthly, by the Captaines of the Phocenses: Sixthly, by Nero: who carried thence five hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein again set up at the common charge. But whatsoever was gathered between the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian Army made spoil of, defacing as much as the time permitted them: notwithstanding all this, it was again gloriously re-built, and so remained till such time as Julian the Apostata sent thither to know the success of his Parthian enterprise, at which time it was utterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heaven, and the Image of Apollo himself, and all the rest of the Idols therein, molten down, and lost in the Earth.

The like success had the Jews in the same Julians time, when by his permission they assembled themselves to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem: for while they were busied to lay the foundations, their buildings were overthrown by an Earthquake, and many thousands of the Jews were overwhelmed with the ruines, and others slain and scattered by Tempest and Thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more favourably for the Jews, ascribing this to the nature of that Element. For, saith he, Allypius and the Ruler of the province of Judea, being by Julian busied in the re-edifying of this Temple, flaming Balls of fire issuing neer the foundation, and oft consuming the Workmen, made the Enterprize frustrate.

Of the last refuges of the Devil to maintain his Kingdom.

NOw the Devil, because he cannot play upon the open stage of this World, (as in those daies) and being still as industrious as ever, finds it more for his advantage to creep into the minds of men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, works them to a more effectual adoration of himself then ever. For whereas he first taught them to sacrifice to Monsters, to dead Stones cut into faces of Beasts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; he now sets before them the high and shining Idol of glory, the All-commanding Image of bright Gold. He tells them that truth is the Goddess of dangers and oppressions, that chastity is the enemy of Nature, and lastly, that as all virtue (in general) is without taste; so pleasure satisfieth and delighteth every sense: for true wisdom (saith he) is exercised in nothing else, then in the obtaining of power to oppress, and of riches to maintain plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-Polititian find in his Pupils any remorse, any feeling or fear of God's future judgments, he perswades them that God hath so great need of men's Souls, that he will accept them at any time, and upon any condition: interrupting by his vigilant endeavours all offer of timeful return towards God, by laying those great blocks of rugged poverty and despised contempt in the narrow passage leading to his divine presence. But as the mind of man hath two Ports, the one alwaies frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other desolate and over-grown with grass, by which enter our charitable thoughts and divine contemplations: so hath that of Death a double and twofold opening, worldly misery passing by the one, worldly prosperity by the other: at the entrance of the one we find our sufferings and patience to attend us: (all which have gone before us to prepare our joys) at the other our cruelties, covetousness, licentiousness, injustice, and oppressions (the harbingers of most fearful and terrible sorrow) staying for us. And as the Devil our most industrious enemy was ever most diligent: so is he now more laborious then ever; the long day of Mankind drawing fast towards an evening, and the Worlds Tragedy and Time neer at an end.

CHAP. VII.

Of Noah's Floud.

§. I.

Of Gods fore-warning: and ſome humane Teſtimonies: and ſome doubting touching the truth of Noah's Floud.

OF this diſtruction it pleaſed God to give warning unto Noah: who (ſaith Joſephus) fearing to periſh among the reſt, Decedens cum ſuis in aliam regionem migravit: He departed with his children, and travailed into another region. And of theſe Giants from whom Noah withdrew himſelf, Beroſus writeth in this manner; That they exceeded in all ſorts of inhumane and unnatural wickedneſs, and that they were contemptores & religionis & deorum; contemners of religion and of the gods: among which mighty men (ſaith Beroſus) unus erat qui deorum venerantior, & prudentior cunctis, &c. huic nomen erat Noah: There was one more wiſe and reverencing the Gods then the reſt, whoſe name was Noah: who with his three Sons, Sem, Japhetus, and Cham, and with their Wives, and the wife of Noah, (namely, Titea the great, Pandora, Noela, and Noegla) preſerved themſelves in the Arke. This Arke God commanded Noah to prepare: And God ſaid unto Noah, Make thee an Arke of Pine-trees: thou ſhalt make cabins in the Arke, and ſhalt pitch it within and without with pitch. For God made Noah to know, that an end of all fleſh was at hand, and that the graves of the rebellious and cruel Generations were already faſhioned in the Clouds, which ſoon after ſhould ſwallow up and cover all living creatures which breathed in the Ayr, Noah and his family excepted.

Gen. 6. 14. v. 13.

But this univerſal grave of Waters, and general Deluge hath not been received by all: for divine teſtimonies do not perſwade all natural men to thoſe things to which their own reaſon cannot reach: Dum obvoluta in obſcuro veritas latet: Whileſt the truth lieth wrapt in obſcurity. Many there are who have diſputed againſt the univerſality of this Overflowing, and have judged that this floud of Noah fell but in ſome particular places and Kingdoms: moved ſo to think, becauſe in elder Ages there have been many other Flouds (as they ſuppoſe) of that nature.

Lact. im. præſ. de falſa relig.

Hereof Nicolas Damaſcenus writeth in this manner, as his words are cited by Joſephus. Eſt ſuper Minyadam excelſus Mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos confugientes ſermo eſt diluvii tempore liberatos, & quendam ſimul in Arca devectum in hujus vertice hæſiſſe, lignorumque reliquias multo tempore conſervatas, qui fortaſſe is fuit de quo etiam Moſes Judæorum legiſlator ſcribit: thus far this Author. There is (ſaith he) above Minyada (or the Country of Minyæ) an exceeding high Mountain in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many having fled thither, were ſaved in the time of the Deluge; and that one was carried in an Ark, and reſted upon the top of the Mountain, whereon there remained a long time after certain pieces thereof; and this might be the ſame of which Moſes the Law-giver of the Jews makes mention. And of this opinion were the Talmudiſts (ſaith Annius) that many Giants ſaved themſelves upon Mount Sion.

Joſ. ant. l. 1. c. 4. Euſeb de præp. l. 9. c. 4.

But Beroſus (who, after Moſes, was one of the moſt antient, howſoever he hath been ſince deformed and corrupted) doth in the ſubſtance of all agree with Moſes as touching the general Floud, taking from thence the beginning of his Hiſtory in theſe words: Ante aquarum cladem famoſam, qua univerſus periit Orbis, &c. Before that famous deſtruction of Waters, by which the World univerſal periſhed: witneſſing withall, that Noah with his Wife Titea, and his three Sons with their Wives (in all eight perſons) were only ſaved.

§. II.

Of the Floud in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Floud.

BUt from the vanity of the Greeks, the Corrupters of all truth (ſaith Lactantius,) who without all ground of certainty vaunt their Antiquity, came the errour firſt of all: who therein flattering themſelves alſo, ſought to perſwade the World that there was

Rho. l. 15. c. 33. was no Floud preceded the Floud of Ogyges, King of the Thebans in Bœotia, or rather of Attica; and therefore (saith Rhodiginus) Ogygium id appellant Poetæ, tanquam pervetus dixeris ab Ogyge vetustissimo: The Poets gave the name of Ogygia to things exceeding ancient, as of Ogyges the most ancient.

Euseb. de Præp. Evang l. 10. c 3. But let Ogyges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest that he lived but in Jacobs time (though Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses time) and was born 67. years after him. There is also an opinion, that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he farr later) as Rhodiginus in the ninth Book of his Antiquities remembreth: Sunt tamen qui in Ægypto regnasse autumant hunc; unde sit Cadmus, qui in Græciam profectus Thebas condidit, à Bove jugulato sic nuncupatas; quoniam Syrorum lingua Bos dicitur Thebe. There are (saith he) who think that this Ogyges did reign in Egypt, whereby he should be Cadmus, who travelling into Greece, built Thebes, so named of a Beef slain: because in the Syrian Language, a Beef is called Thebe.

But this Floud of Ogyges fell in the year of the World, 3440. according to Eusebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the Floud of Noah in the year 2242. after the same account: and so there came 1200. between these Flouds, wanting but two, though herein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now, although the very year and time of this overflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, be not precisely set down, but that there is a great difference among Writers; yet whosoever makes it most ancient, finds above 500. years difference between that and the general Floud.

Lib. 1. cap. 7. For, Paulus Orosius, affirms that this tempest fell upon the Athenians, but 1040. years before Rome was built. Bucholzerus saith, it was 1043. elder than Rome; wich was founded (according to the same Bucholzerus) in the worlds year, 3219. though after the account which I follow (and whereof I wil give my reasons in the Story of Abraham) it was built in the Worlds year, 3280. Now, the general Floud preceded the building of Rome (saith Bucholzerus) 1563. years: and the Floud of Ogyges, (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by easie calculation, that (if he place Ogyges in his true age) the difference between these two Flouds must be 520. years, to which we (allowing 60. more) find 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah, Ogyges Priscus, as some do) it appears by this, that the Floud of Ogyges then King of Attica, or Ogygia, did not extend it self any farther then the banks of Archi-pelago, or the Ægæan Sea. For, whereas Mela, Pliny, and Solinus witness, that the City of Joppe in Judæa was founded before the Floud; and that (notwithstanding the height of waters) there remained on certain Altars of Stone, the Title of the King, and of his Brother Phineus, with many of the grounds of their Religion: sure it is no where found among prophane Historians, nor in the Scriptures, that ever the Floud of Ogyges spred it self over any part of Syria, much less over all the Earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achaia in Peloponnesus, it is very probable. For it seemeth that at that time it was, when Helice and Bura were swallowed up (Cities seated on the North part of Peloponnesus): of which Ovid.

Mela. l. 3; Plin. l. 5. Sol. ca. 47. Joppe opidum antiquissimum orbe toto, utpote ante inundationem terrarum conditum. Sol. ibid.

Si quæras Helicen, & Buran, Achaidos urbes,
Invenies sub aquis.

Ovid. Met. l. 15. 303.

Bura and Helice, on Achaian ground,
Are sought in vain, but under Sea are found.

Nat. Com. l. 1. c. 6. Of this Floud of Ogyges, was invented the Fable of Apollo and Diana. For Latona, the Daughter of Cœus, the Son of Titan, being beloved, and forced by Jupiter, and by him gotten with child, Juno thereat enraged, permitted her (as they say) no part of the Earth to be delivered on; and withall, caused the monstrous Serpent Python, to follow and affright her, whersoever she travelled; till at length arriving at the Isle of Ortygia, she was there received; in which she was delivered, first of Diana, and then of Apollo, being Twins; whereof Barlaam makes this exposition: That at such time as the Deluge (which happened in Ogyges his reign) ceased, out of the abundant moisture of the Earth (heat by putrefaction being thereto mixed) there were exhaled such thick mists and fogs, that in Attica, and along the coasts of the Ægean Sea, neither the beams of the Sun by day, nor of the Moon by night, could pierce the ayr, or be perceived by the inhabitants: so as when at length (the Earth being dried, and these vapours dissipated) the ayr began to be clear, the people of Ortygia espied the light of the Moon somewhat before day, and in the same morning the Sun also appeared: fabulously (because Diana represented the Moon, and Apollo the Sun) they were reported to be born in the Isle of Ortygia, thereof afterwards called Delos; which signifieth Manifestation.

Plin. l. 4. c. 11.

Xenophon annianus.

And surely it is not improbable, that the Floud of Ogyges, being so great, as Histories have have reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the ayr, sensibly discerned in those parts, and some unusual face of Skies. Varro in his Books, de gente populi Romani (as he is cited by S. Augustine) reports out of Castor, that so great a miracle hapned in the Star of Venus, as never was seen before, nor in after-times: For the colour, the greatness, the figure, and the course of it, were changed. This fell out, as Adrastus Cyzicenus, and Dion Neapolites, famous Mathematicians affirmed, in the time of Ogyges.

Aug. de civit. Dei. l. 21. c. 8.

Now, concerning the course of that, or any other Planet, I do not remember, that I have any were read of so good Astrologers, flourishing among the Greeks, or elsewhere in those days, as were likely to make any calculation of the revolutions of the Planets, so exact, that it should need no reformation: Of the colour and magnitudes I see no reason, why the difference found in the Star of Venus, should be held miraculous; considering, that lesser mists and foggs than those which covered Greece with so long darkness, do familiarly present our senses with as great alterations in the Sun and Moon. That the figure should vary, questionless it was very strange: yet I cannot hold it any prodigie: for it stands well with good reason, that the side of Venus which the Sun beholds, being enlightned by him, the opposite half should remain shadowed; whereby that Planet would, unto our eyes, descrying onely that part whereon the light falleth, appear to be horned, as the Moon doth seem; if distance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehension of our senses.

A worthy Astrologer now living, who by the help of perspective Glasses, hath found in the Stars many things unknown to the Ancients, affirmeth so much to have been discovered in Venus, by his late observations. Whether some watry disposition of the ayr might represent as much to them that lived with Ogyges, as Galilæus hath seen through his instrument; I cannot tell: sure I am, that the discovery of a truth formerly unknown, doth rather convince Man of ignorance, than Nature of errour. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular Floud of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of S. Augustine) accompanied with such unusual (and therefore the more dreadfull, though natural) signs, testifying the concurrence of causes with effects in that inundation; whereas the Floud of Noah, which was general, and altogether miraculous, may seem to have had no other token, or foreshewing, than the long preaching of Noah himself, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the Floud came suddenly, and took them all away. Luke 17. v. 27.

§. III.

Of Deucalions Floud: and that this was not Noahs Floud: nor the Umbri in Italy, a remnant of any universal Floud.

A Second Floud of great fame, and of which the time is more certain, was that of Deucalion in Thessalia; of which S. Augustin out of Varro: His temporibus (ut Varro scribit) regnante Athenienſibus Cranao, ſucceſſore Cecropis (ut autem noſtri, Eusebius & Hieronymus) adhuc eodem Cecrope permanente, Diluvium fuit, quod appellatum eſt Deucalionis: (that is) In these times, (as Varro reporteth) Cranous the ſucceſſor of Cecrops governed the Athenians, or, (as our Eusebius and Hierome say) Cecrops yet living, that Floud (called Deucalions) happened.

And in the beginning of the 11. Chapter of the said 18. Book, he useth these words: Eduxit ergo Moses ex Ægypto populum Dei noviſſimo tempore Cecropis Athenienſium Regis, cum apud Aſſyrios regnaret Aſcatades, apud Sicyonios Marathus, apud Argivos Tripas: Moses led the people of God out of Egypt about the latter time of Cecrops, King of the Athenians, Aſcatades reigning over the Aſſyrians, over the Sicyonians Marthus, and over the Argives Triopas. So as leaving the curiosity of a few years, more or less, it appeareth, that this Floud of Deucalion was either at the egression of the children of Israel out of Egypt, or near it: and then after Noah 753. years, according to Functius, who makes Cecrops to live in the year of the World, 2409. or if we follow Mercator, then 739. years after Noah, and in the year of the World 2395. But if Deucalion were born in the age of the World 2356. according to Codoman; then giving unto Deucalion 40. years of age when this Floud happened, it falleth within one year of Mercators account. But Deucalion, by all approved Historians, is said to have been 82. years old at that time. Now, Clemens Alexandrinus dates the time of this Floud of Deucalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phaëton's time, by the Reign of Crotopus, King of the Argives; but Crotopus lived King of the Argives six years after Israel departed Egypt, which makes twenty years difference, according to Functius, who will have this Floud and Burning to have fallen 14. years before Moses left Egypt: for he gave of the Worlds years to the Floud and Burning, the year 2440. and to Moses egression, the year 2454. And yet Cedrenus thinks thinks that Moſes was more ancient, and lived with Inachus; but that cannot be true: for then had the Floud of Deucalion, and the Burning of Phaëton preceded the Floud of Ogyges, which is denied by all: for that of Theſſaly (called Deucalions) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) at leaſt 250. years, or thereabouts. Euſebius in his Chronologie, makes it 230. and ſo doth P. Oroſius: Euſebius about the 50. year of Moſes life, and Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Noahs Floud 770. years: for theſe be Clemens Alexandrinus his words: Fuit autem in Grecia tempore quidem Phornei, qui fuit poſt Inachum, inundatio quæ fuit tempore Ogygis: There happened in Greece, in the time of Phorneus, who lived after Inachus, the Floud of Ogyges. Now, if the Floud of Ogyges in Attica were 1020. or 1016. years before the firſt Olympiad, according to Euſebius and Oroſius (as before;) then it is manifeſt, that taking 763. out of this number of 1020. it falls out, that Ogyges Floud happened before the Hebrews left Egypt 250. years, or 260. years, according to the difference between the opinions of Euſebius and Oroſius. And for my ſelf (who rather follow thoſe Chronologers, which give 60. years more to Abraham after the Floud, than the reſt) I reckon the times which come between theſe Flouds in this ſort. The general Floud was in the year of the World 1656. Jacob was born in the year of the World 2169. ſo as from the beginning of the Floud to Jacobs birth, there were conſumed 513. years. Ogyges Floud happened 100. years after Jacob was born; and therefore after the general Floud 613. years. Now, Deucalion was born in the year of the World 2356. and had lived 82. years, when his kingdom of Theſſaly was overwhelmed; (which added to 2356. make 2438.) his floud was after Noahs Floud ended, 782. years. And hereto Annius his Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700. years between the general Floud and Deucalions birth; to which adde 82. years of his Age (as before) and then the floud of Theſſaly followed the general 782. years. The words of that Xenophon are theſe: Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum Deucalionis, ſecundo anno Sphæri, ſeptingenti ſupputantur anni, qui natus annos duos & octoginta Theſſaliam vidit inundatam: From the drowning of the World to the birth of Deucalion, in the ſecond year of Sphærus, are numbred 700. years; and when Deucalion was 82. years old, he ſaw Theſſaly drowned. This Floud hapned in the Winter time about Parnaſſus: witneſs Ariſtotle, in the firſt of his Meteors. And Varro (whom S. Auguſtine ſo often citeth for his excellent Learning, eſpecially in Antiquities) findeth this floud of Deucalion to have hapned in the time of Cranaus, who ſucceeded Cecrops: Oroſius thinks it ſomewhat later, Amphitryon reigning in Athens, the third from Cecrops: Onely this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not onely over Theſſaly it ſelf, and the Regions adjoyning Weſtward, but it covered the greateſt part of Italy: and either the ſame, or ſome other particular floud then hapning, oppreſt Egypt, ſaith Euſebius. And therefore did the Greeks either think it, or feign it to be univerſal; and Deucalion the King, ſaving himſelf, and ſome others on the Mountain of Theſſaly (of all other the higheſt, ſaith Solinus) was by reaſon thereof (as Strabo witneſſeth) ſaid to be the preſerver of man-kind. That this floud covered a great part of Italy, Pliny, and Solinus make it probable, who affirm, that the people then inhabiting Italy, were therefore called Ὁμβρικοὶ: quia ab imbribus diluvii ſuperfuiſſent; and therefore alſo were they eſteemed the moſt ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his firſt Book, and Trezenius in his ſecond: which Umbri theſe Authours make the Parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to be the Parents of the Samnites, Piceni, Lucani, Brucii, and all other inhabiting anciently the banks of the Mediterrane Sea. But that theſe Umbri were not the Inhabiters of Italy before the Floud of Noah, and ſo took name by ſaving themſelves upon the Appenine Mountains, the Scriptures teach us; ſhewing who, & who only then were preſerved, which is ſufficient. Report hath adventured further, telling us, that the firſt people which after the general Floud inhabited Italy, were the Cameſenes; (ſo named from Cameſe, whom Cato in Originibus, another of Annius his Authours, names for a conſort of Janus) which people lived altogether a ſavage life; till ſuch time as Saturn arriving on thoſe Coaſts, deviſed Laws to govern them by: the memory of whoſe Acts in that Region, Diodore and Thallus among the Greeks; Nepos, Caſſius, and Varro among the Latines, have preſerved; and of whom Virgil:

Primus ab æthereo venit Saturnus Olympo,
Arma Jovis fugiens, & regnis exul ademptis.
Is genus indocile, ac diſperſum montibus altis
Compoſuit, legeſque dedit; Latiumque vocari Maluit.

Saturn deſcending from the heavens high
Fearing the Arms of Jupiter his Son,
His Kingdom loſt, and baniſht thence, doth fly,
Rude people on the Mountain tops he won
To live together, & by Laws: which done,
He choſe to call it Latium.

And afterwards in the Verses following he speaketh of the Ausones; and after them, of the Sicani: Nations, which again sought to dis-plant the antient Inhabiters:

Virg. l. 8. Æn. Tum manus Ausonia, & gentes venêre Sicani.

Then came th' Ausoniam Bands, and the Sicanian Tribes.

Of these Sicani (which left Spain, and sate down in Italy) Thucydides and Pliny give testimony: who were again expelled by the Ligii, saith Thucydides. After all these Plantations and re-plantations, came the Umbri, descended of the Gauls (saith Annius) not of those Gauls of France, but of those of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italy, even all Hetruria and Campania; as Herodotus, Pliny, and Dionysius have assured us: and therefore this Flood of Deucalion, was long after that of Noah. For all those Nations were planted in Italy, and dispossess'd of Italy again, before the Umbri were ever heard of, or had being. So that Kingdom was first called Camasene, then Latium or Saturnia, then Ausonia, then Sicania; before the Umbri (in whose time Deucalions Flood happened) possess'd the same, about 306. years before the War of Troy; Lycaon then governing Arcadia: who being the Father of two and twenty Sons, the youngest called Oenotrius invaded Italy, who gave it the name of Oenotria. This name it held until Italus of the same Nation changed it into Italy, after his own name, about 250. years before the fall of Troy. After these, came the Pelasgi, of whom Pliny in his third Book and fifth Chapter, and Strabo in his fifth, Thucydides in his sixth, speak at large: and after them the Lydi, under Tyrrhenus their Captain, that gave name to the Tyrrheni; who casting thence the Umbri, took from them three hundred Castles, and built therein twelve Cities; to which (after they had possess'd and past over the Appenine Mountains) they added divers others, whereof Telsina (afterward Bononia) was one.

Now that there was not antiently such a Nation as these Umbri in those parts, I do not affirm; having respect to the testimonies before repeated. And Stephanus thinks, that the name was derived from the Greek word Ombros; but that these Umbri of Italy were descended of the Nation of Scythians (called Galli) it shall be shewed hereafter.

§. IV.

Of some other Records testifying the universal Flood: and of two antient Deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

SAint Augustine out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greeks and Latines made not any mention of the Universal Flood, because they had nothing of Antiquity foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus, before remembred) were all things among the Greeks (which antiquity had worn out of knowledg) called Ogygia, which we in English commonly call (worm-eaten, or) of defaced date. But as all the parts of the Earth were successively planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant: so did every Family, which afterward became a great people, with whom the knowledg of divine Letters was not received, find no Parent of more antiquity, then such as they had themselves, nor allow of any before their own; and as the Grecians, so did others vaunt themselves to be Indigenæ, and growing out of the Earth, or invent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldeans had certain knowledg of Noah's Flood, as Berosus witnesseth; and Nicolaus Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid) though he also affirm by hear-say, that some Giants saved themselves upon the Mountain Baris in Armenia, but speaketh not thereof as from any authority approved: using the word Sermo est; That such a speech there was. And Eusebius remembreth a place out of the antient Historian Abydenus: who writeth that Sisithrus, to preserve himself from a Flood, fore-told him by Saturnus, fled to the Hils of Armenia by ship, ad Armeniam navigio confugiebat: who the third day (after the waters were fallen) sent forth Birds, that finding no Land to rest on, returned again; which he also did a second time; but at the third return, the Birds feet were covered with mud and slime. To this effect are Eusebius's words out of Abydenus, which may seem a true description (though in other terms) of Noahs Flood.

Euf. de præp. Evang. l. 9. c. 4.

Cyrillus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this general Flood. And Plato in Timæo produceth an Egyptian Priest, who re-counted to Solon out of the holy Books of Egypt, the story of the Flood universal, which (saith he) happened long before the Grecian Inundations. Frier Annius his Xenophon remembreth a third Flood, which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, sowewhat more antient then that of Ogyges in Attica. For he named the general Floud for the first, which happened (saith he) under the old Ogyges; sub prisco Ogyge, which was Noah. He called the second, Niliaca; Hercules and Prometheus then living, 44. years before that of Attica, in the 34. year of Belochus King of the Assyrians, though I do not believe him as touching the time. But this Floud covered a great part of the nether Egypt, especially all the Region subject to Prometheus; and hereof came the fable of the Vulture on Prometheus his Liver, afterward slain by Hercules of Egypt: which fiction Diod. Siculus delivereth in these words: Fluvium propter cursus velocitatem, profunditatemque aquarum, Aquilam tunc appellatum, Herculem, tum consilii magnitudine, tum virtute, volunt è vestigio compressisse, & aquarum impetum ad priorem cursum convertisse: Unde & Græci quidam Poetæ, rem gestam in fabulam vertentes, Herculem tradunt Aquilam Promethei jecur depascentem occidisse: This Floud (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftness of his course, as also for the depth, was in those dayes called the Eagle: but Hercules by his great judgment and virtue did again compress and straighten this River, so far extended and over-spread, turning it into the old channel: Whence certain Greek Poets (converting this labour and work of Hercules into a fable) devised, that Hercules slew the Eagle which fed on Prometheus liver; meaning that he delivered Prometheus of that sorrow and torment, which for the loss of his people and Country (by the Waters destroyed and covered over) he suffered.

Nat. Com. l. 4. c. 6.

A fourth Floud chanced about Pharus in Egypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Annius conceiveth out of his Xenophon, who in this brief sort writeth of all these Inundations: Inundationes plures fuere: prima novimestris Inundatio terrarum sub prisco Ogyge: secunda Niliaca, &c. There were many Inundations (saith the same Xenophon:) the first, which was universal, of nine moneths; and this happened under the first Ogyges: the second was Niliaca, and of one moneths continuance, in the time of Hercules and Prometheus, Egyptians: a third of two moneths, under Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three moneths, in Thessalia under Deucalion: and a fifth of the like continuance, (called Pharonica) under Proteus of Egypt, about the time of Helen's rape. Diodorus, in his fifth Book and eleventh Chapter, taking the Samothraces for his Authors, remembreth a Floud in Asia the less, & else where, of no less destruction then any of the other particular Inundations, saying, that the same happened before that of Deucalion; the Sea of Pontus and Hellespont breaking in over the Land.

Xenop. de æquin. Comm. per Aunium, fol. 37.

But there have been many Flouds in divers times and Ages, not inferiour to any of these two last remembred, Niliaca and Pharonica in Egypt: as in the year of our Redemption 590. when in October of the same year, Gregory then being Bishop of Rome, there happened a marvellous Overflowing in Italy, and especially in the Venetian Territory, and in Liguria; accompanied with a most fearful storm of Thunder and Lightning: after which followed the great Plague at Rome, by reason of the many dead Serpents cast up and left upon the land after the Waters decreased and returned. And in the year 1446. there perished 10000. people, by the breaking in of the Sea at Dordroch in Holland: of which kind I take that Floud to be of Achaia or Attica. Before that, in the year 1238. Trithemius speaketh of an Earthquake, which swallowed many thousands: and after that of a Floud in Friseland, in which there perished 100000. persons. Strozius Sigog, in his Magia omnifaria, telleth of an Inundation in Italy, in the time of Pope Damasus, in which also many Cities of Sicil were swallowed: another in the Papacie of Alexander the sixth: also in the year 1515. Maximilian being Emperour. He also remembereth a perilous over-flowing in Polonia, about Cracovia, by which many people perished. Likewise Viginier, a French Historian, speaketh of a great Floud in the South part of Languedoc, which fell in Anno Domini 1557. with so dreadful a tempest, as all the people attended therein the very end of the World, and Judgment-day; saying, That by the violent descent of the Waters from the Mountain, about Nismes, there were removed divers old heaps and mountures of ground, and many other places torn up and rent: by which accident there was found both coyn of Silver and Gold, divers pieces of Plate and Vessels of other Mettal, supposed to be hidden at such time as the Goths invaded that Province, in the year 1156.

§. V.

That the Floud of Noah was supernatural; though some say it might have been foreseen by the Stars.

NOw, howsoever all these Flouds, and many other, which have covered at several times, several Regions, not only in these parts of the World, but in America also, (as I have learned of some ancient Southsayers among them) may be ascribed to natural causes and accidents; yet that universal Floud Floud (in the time of Noah) was poured over the whole face of the Earth by a power above Nature, and by the especial commandment of God himself; who at that time gave strength of influence to the Stars, and abundance to the Fountains of the deep: whereby the irruption of Waters was made more forcible than any ability of nature could effect, or any second causes by whatsoever union, could perform, without receiving from the Fountain of all power, strength and faculties supernatural. Henricus Mechlinienſis, a Scholler of Albertus Magnus, in his Commentaries upon the great conjunctions of Albu Maſar, observeth, that before the Floud of Noah, the like Conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn happened in the last degree of Cancer, against that constellation, since called the Ship of Argos; by which the Floud of Noah might be fore-told, because Cancer is both a watry Sign, and the House of the Moon, which is the Lady of the Sea, and of moisture, according to the rules of Astronomy, and common experience. And this opinion Petrus de Aliaco upon Geneſis confirmeth, affirming, that although Noah did well know this Floud by divine revelation, (yet this conjunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the second causes thereof: for those were not only signs, but also working causes, by strength receiv'd from the first cause, which is God himself: and further, that by * Catarractæ cœli, Englished the Windows of Heaven) Moſes meant this great and watry Conjunction; the word Catarractæ, signifying flowing down, or coming down. Now (saith P. de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordain by the course of the Heavens such a Constellation, by which all men might behold therin their destruction towards, and thereby forsake those wicked ways wherein they walked, and call unto God for mercy.

Also de Concordia Theologiæ & Astrolog. Gen. 7. 11.

* The word καταῤῥακτης properly signifieth any place of stoppage, against which the force of the water being naturally carried downwards, dasheth and breaketh; of ἀράσσω, allido, or frango. Hence, because Windows do not only open, but also shut, the word hath been expounded (Windows) for Bars or Floud-gates.

Of this judgment was Gul. Pariſienſis, who understood, that the words Catarractæ Cœli, or Windows of Heaven, were to be taken for the former Conjunction, or for those watry signs, Cancer, Piſces, Pleiades Hyades, and Orion; and of the Planets, Mars, Venus, and the Moon: which are the forcible causes of the greatest Inundations. His own words are these: Nondum intelligo Prophetam Hebræorum Catarractas Cœli vocâſſe, niſi partes illas cœli, quæ generativæ ſunt pluviarum & inundationum Aquarum, quales ſunt ſigna aquatica, ut Cancer, &c. as aforesaid. As yet (saith he) I perceive not what the Prophet of the Hebrews meaneth by those words (Catarractæ cœli, or Windows of Heaven) unleſs he thereby underſtandeth thoſe celeſtial powers, by whoſe influences are ingendred the rain and inundations of waters, ſuch as are the watry ſigns of cancer, &c.

But, in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his unsearchable wisdom this Conjunction should at such time be: so did he (as aforesaid) adde vigour and faculty, and gave to every operation increase of vertues, violent eruptions to Springs and Fountains, commanding them to cast out the whole treasure and heap of their waters; taking retention from the clouds, and condensing ayr into water by the ministery of his Angels, or whosoever else best pleased his All-powerfulness.

§. VI.

That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the universal Floud: And what are Catarractæ Cœli, Gen. 7. v. 11.

NOw, if it be objected, that God doth not create any thing of new; (for God rested the seventh day: (that is, he did not then after create any new ſpecies) which granted, it may seem that then all the Earth and Ayr had not waters sufficient to cover the habitable World fifteen cubits above the highest mountains. Of this proposition, whether God had so restrained himself, or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent (which is) that the World had want of water to over-cover the highest mountains, I take that conceit to be unlearned and foolish; for it is written, That the Fountains of the great deep were broken up, (that is) the waters forsook the very bowels of the Earth; and all whatsoever was dispersed therein, pierced, and brake through the face thereof. Then let us consider, that the Earth had above one and twenty thousand miles, the Diameter of the Earth, according to that circle, seven thousand mile, and then from the Superficies to the Center, some three thousand five hundred miles. Take then the highest mountain of the World, Caucaſus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the mountains of Armenia, or Scythia, or that (of all other the highest) in Tennerif, and I do not find, that he that looketh highest, stretcheth above thirty miles upright. It is not then impossible, answering reason with reason, that all those waters mixed within the Earth three thousand five hundred miles deep, should not well help to cover the space of thirty miles in height; this thirty miles upright being found in the depths of the Earth one hundred and sixteen times: for, the Fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the waters drawn out of the bowels of the Earth. Secondly, if we consider what proportion the Earth beareth to the extension of the Ayr over and above it, we shall find the difference exceeding great. If then it pleased God to condense but so much of this Ayr, as every where compasseth and imbraceth the Earth, which condensation is a conversion of Ayr into Water, a change familiar in those Elements; it will not seem strange to men of judgment, yea, but of ordinary understanding, that the Earth (God so pleasing) was covered over with Waters, without any new Creation.

Lastly; For the opinions of Gulielmus Parisiensis, and Aliacensis, to which I may adde Berosus, and others, That such a conjunction there was, fore-shewing that destruction by Waters which followed; and that by the word Catarractæ Cœli, or Windows of Heaven, was meant this conjunction; there needs no other answer than that observation of Ludovicus Vives, who affirmeth, That by the gravest Astrologian it was observed, that in the year 1524. there should happen the like conjunction as at Noah's Floud; than which (saith he) there was never a more fair, dry, and seasonable year: The like destruction was prophesied, of the year 1588. But Picus Earl of Mirandula proveth, that there could not be any such conjunction at that time.

To conclude, I find no other mysterie in the word Catarractæ Cœli, than that the clouds were meant thereby: Moses using the word Windows of Heaven (if that be the sense of the word) to expres the violence of the Rains, and pouring down of Waters. For whosoever hath seen those fallings of Water, which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spouts, (where clouds do not break into drops, but fall with a resistless violence in one body) may properly use that manner of speech which Moses did; That the Windows, or Floud-gates of Heaven opened: (which is) That Waters fell contrary to custom, and that order which we call natural. God then loosened the power retentive in the uppermost ayr, and the Waters fell in abundance: Behold (says Job) he withholdeth the Waters, and they dry up (or better in Latine, Et omnia siccantur; And all things are dried up) but when he sendeth them not, they destroy the Earth: And in the 26 Chapter: He bindeth the waters in the clouds. But these Bonds God loosed at that time of the general Floud, and called up the Waters which slept in the great Deep; and these joyning together, covered the Earth, till they performed the work of his will: which done, he then commanded them to return into their dark and vast Caves; and the rest (by a Wind) rarified again into ayr, formerly condensed into drops.

Of some remainder of the memory of Noah among the Heathen.

NOah, commanded by God, before the fall of those Waters, entred the Ark which he had built, with his own Wife, and his Sons, and his Sons Wives, taking with them of every Creature which took life by generation, seven of the clean, and of the unclean, two. Noah, according to Philo, signifieth Quietnes: after others, and according to the Prophecie of his Father Lamech, Cessation; to whom aftertimes gave many Names, answering his Antiquity, Zeal, Virtue, and other qualities: as, The first Ogyges, because in the time of the Grecian Ogyges, there was also a great Floud of Achaia: Saturn they called him, because he was the Father of Nations: Others gave him the Name of Prometheus, who was said to steal away Jupiters fire; Fire in that place being taken and understood for the knowledge of God and heavenly things. Others think, that he was so called for his excellent wisdom and foresight. He had also the Name of Janus, (id est) Vinosus, because Jain signifieth Wine in the Hebrew. And so Tertullian finds him written in libris Ritualibus, in the Books of Ceremonies, preceding both Saturn, Uranus, and Jove: which three enjoyed an elder time then all the other ancientest feigned gods. And this Name Jain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latine: for it was in use before there was any Latine Nation, or any Kingdom by that Name known. Of the antiquity of Janus, Fabius Pictor giveth this testimony: Jani ætate nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus pectoribus nondum hæserat ulla regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & Far primus populos docuit Janus ad sacrificia: primus enim Aras & Pomœria & Sacra docuit; In the time of Janus (saith he) there was no Monarchy: for the desire of rule had not then folded it self about the hearts of men. Janus first taught the people to sacrifice Wine and Meal: he first set up Altars, instituted Gardens, and solitary Groves, wherein they used to pray; with other holy Rites and Ceremonies. A greater testimony than this there cannot be found among all the Heathen, which in all agree so well with the Scriptures. For first, whilest Noah flourished, there was not any King, or Monarch; Nimrod being the first that took on him soveraign Authority. Secondly, Noah, after the Floud, was the first that planted the Vine, and became an Husband-man; and therefore offered the first-fruits of both (to wit) Wine and

Gen. 9. 20.

Gen. 8.20. and Meal. Thirdly, he was the first that raised an Altar, and offered sacrifice to God a thanksgiving for his merciful goodness towards him. Noah was also signified in the Arn. cont. Gent. l. 6. Name of Bifrons (which was given to Janus) because he beheld the times both before and after the Floud. Quia præterita noverit, & futura prospexerit, saith Arnobius: Because he knew what was past, and provided for what was to come. He was also in the person of Janus shadowed by the Name of Chaos, and Semen Orbis, The seed of the World: because, as out of that confused Heap was drawn all the kinds of Beasts and Plants; so from Noah came all Mankind. Whereof Ovid in the person of Janus:

Aspice quàm longi temporis acta cano!
The Antient call'd me Chaos: my great years
By those old times, of which I sing, appears.

He was also intituled Cœlum and Sol, Heaven and the Sun, for his excellent knowledg in Astronomy: Vertumnus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod. Siculus and Alex. Aphrodiseus so call, because he was the restorer of the Greeks to their former liberty, but in respect of the Floud. For the Greeks called Liber γῦ, and his Nurses Hyades, of Rain, because Noah entred the Ark when the Sun joyned with the Stars Hyades, a constellation in the Brow or Neck of Taurus, and ever after a Monument of Noah's Floud. He was also by others surnamed Triton, a Marine god, the Son of Neptune; because he lived in safety on the Waters. So Nat. Com. l. 5. c. 13. was he known by the name of Dionysus, quasi Διονύσων, mentem pungens, Bite-brain, or Wit-stinger; though Diodorus conceive otherwise, and derive that name à Patre & Loco; Of his Father and the place of his Birth, (to Cœlius. wit) of Jove, and Nisa, a Town of Arabia fœlix, saith Suidas, out of Orpheus. He had Gen. 9. 20. also the by-name of Taurus, or Taurophagus; because he first yoaked Oxen, and Tilled the ground: according to that of Moses; and Noah became an Husbandman. Now howsoever the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus, (otherwise Dionysus) it is certain, that the Name was borrowed, and the Invention stolen from Noah. But this name of Bacchus, more antiently Boëcus, was taken (saith Gul. Stuckius, and out of him Danæus) from Noachus, (N) being changed into (B); Stuck. in libris convivalibus, & Danæus de prima mundi ætate. and it is the more probable, because it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the first planter of the Vine after the Floud: and of Noah (the first and antient Bacchus) were all those fables devised, of which Diodorus complaineth in his fourth Book and fifth Chapter. This first Bacchus (to wit) Noah, was surnamed Nysius, of the Mountain Nysa in India; where the Grecian Bacchus never came, whatsoever themselves feign of his enterprises: and these Mountains of Nysa joyn with those of Paropanisus, and those other Eastern Mountains, on which the Ark of Noah rested after the Floud.

Furthermore, to the end that the memory of this second Parent of Mankind might the better be preserved, there were founded by his Issues many great Cities, which bear his Name, with many Rivers and Mountains; which oftentimes forgat that it was done in his regard, because the many Names given him, brought the same confusion to places as to himself. Notwithstanding all which, we find the City of Noah upon the banks of the red Sea, and elsewhere: the River of Noas in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Ptolemy, Danus; dividing Illyria from Panonia. Thus much for the Name.

§. VIII.

Of sundry particulars touching the Ark: as the place where it was made, the matter, fashion, and name.

NOw in what part of the World Noah built the Ark, it doth not appear in the Scriptures, neither do I find any approved Author that hath written thereof; only Goropius Becanus in his Indo-Scythia conceiveth, that Noah built his Ark neer the Mountains of Caucasus, because on those hills are found the goodliest Cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the war among the people, called Nysæi, inhabiting the other side of Caucasus, he found all their Burials and Sepulchres wrought over with Cedar. To this place (saith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to separate himself from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled against God and Nature, as also because he would not be interrupted in the building of the Ark; to which also he addeth the conveniency of Rivers, to transport the Timber which he used, without troubling any other Carriages.

Only this we are sure of, that the Ark was built in some part of the Eastern World; and to my understanding, not far from the place where it rested after the Floud. For Noah did not use any Mast or Sayle (as in other Ships) and therefore did the Ark no otherwise move, than the Hulk or body of a Ship doth in a calm Sea. Also, because it is not probable, that during these continual and down-right Rains, there were any Winds at all, therefore was the Ark little moved from the place where it was fashioned and set together: for it is written, God made a Wind to pass upon the Earth, and the Waters ceased. And therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the Waters, there was not any Storm or forcible wind at all, which could drive the Ark any great distance from the place where it was first by the Waters lifted us. This is also the more probable, if that antient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the Ark had fundum planum, A flat bottom, and not rayſed in form of a Ship, with a sharpness forward, to cut the Waves for the better speed.

Gen. 8. 1.

This kind of Vessel the Hebrews call Thebet, and the Greeks Larnax, for so they termed Deucalions Ship: and some say, that the Hill Parnassus, to which in eight days he arrived, was first called Larnassus, and by the chang of (L) into (P) Parnassus; but Pausanias thinks that it took name of a Son of the Nymph Cleodora, called Parnassus, the Inventor of Auguration.

Steph de Urb. fol. 227.

Peucerus finds the word (Parnassus) to have no affinitie with the Greek, but thinks it derived from the Hebrew word Nahas, which signifieth Auguration and Divination; or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles, in the Leaf before cited.

De Oracul. fol. 94.

Josephus calls the Ark, Machina, by the general name of a huge Frame; and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew, Aron: but herein lieth the difference between Aron and Thebet, That Aron signifieth properly the Ark of the Sanctuary, but Thebet such a Vessel, as swimmeth, and beareth it self upon the Waters.

Epiph. in Ancor.

Lastly, this Ark of Noah differed from the fashion of a Ship, in this, that it had a Cover and Roofe, with a Crest in the middest thereof, and the sides declining like the Roof of an House; to the end, both to cast off the Waters, and that thereunder Noah himself and his children might shelter, and separate themselves from the noysomness of the many Beasts, which filled the other rooms and parts of the Ark.

Gen. 6. 4.

Of what Wood the Ark was built, it is uncertain. The Hebrew word Gopher once, and in this place only used, is diversly understood: and though the matter be of little importance, yet this difference there is, That the Geneva Translation calls it Pine-tree; the Rabbine, Cedar; the Seventy, square Timber; the Latine, smooth Timber. Others will have it Cypress Trees, as dedicated to the dead, because Cypress is worn at Funerals. But out of doubt, if the word Gopher signifie any special kind of Timber, Noah obeyed the voice of God therein; If not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or nature of the wood, having the promise of God, and his Grace and mercy for his defence: For with Noah God promised to establish his covenant. Plinie affirmeth, that in Egypt it was the use to build Ships of Cedar, which the worms eat not; and he avoweth, that he saw in Utica, in the Temple of Apollo, Cedar beams, laid in the time of the foundation of the City, and that they were still found in his time, which was about 1188. years after: proving thereby, that this kind of wood was not subject to putrifying or mouldring in a very long time. But in that it is easie to cut, light to carry, and of a sweet savour, lasting also better then any other wood, and because neer the place where the Ark rested, there are found great store of these Cedar trees, as also in all the Mountains of the East, besides those of Libanus; it is probable enough that the Ark might be of that wood: which hath, beside the other commodities, the greatest length of Timber, and therefore fittest to build Ships withal. Percrius conceiveth, that the Ark had divers sorts of Timber, and that the bottom had of one sort, the deck and partition of another; all which may be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for Timber in general. True it is, that Cedar will serve for all parts of a Ship, as well for the Body, as for Masts and Yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction received from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the Ark; and to pitch it, and to divide it into Cabins; thereby to sever the clean Beasts from the unclean, and to preserve their several sorts of Food; and that it might be capable of all kind of living creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, he cast his confidence wholly on God; who by his Angels steered this Ship without a Rudder, and directed it without the help of a Compass or the North star. The Pitch which Noah used, is by some supposed to have been a kind of Bitumen, whereof there is great quantity about the Vally of Sodom and Gomorrah, now the dead Sea, or Asphaltes, and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India: and herein it exceedeth other Pitch, that it melts not with the Sun, but by the Fire only, after the manner of hard Wax.

That the Ark was of sufficient capacity.

THe Ark, according to Gods commandement, had of length three hundred Cubites

Cubits, fifty of breadth, and thirty deep or high: by which proportion, it had six parts of length to one of breadth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. Augustine: Proculdubio figura est peregrinantis in hoc seculo Civitatis Dei, (hoc est) Ecclesiæ quæ sit salva per lignum, in quo pependit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Jesus Christus: nam & mensura ipsa longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudinisque ejus significat corpus humanum, in cujus veritate ad homines prænunciatus est venturus, & venit, &c. Without doubt (saith he) it is a Figure of the City of God travelling in this world as a stranger, (that is) of the Church, saved by the Tree, whereupon the Mediator between God and Man, the Man Jesus Christ did hang: for even the very measure of the length, heighth and breadth, answereth the shape of Mans body, in the truth whereof the coming of Christ was fore-told and performed. De Civit. Dei, l. 15. c. 26.

By what kind of Cubit the Ark was measured, it hath been a disputed question among the Fathers, and others; and the diffences are in effect these: The first kind of Cubit (called the common) containeth one foot and a half, measured from the sharp of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The second (the Palm-Cubit) which taketh one handfull more than the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Persian Cubit, which exceedeth the common Cubit three inches. The fourth is the sacred Cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar Cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly, there is a fifth Cubit, called Geometrical, which containeth six common Cubits. But of all these sorts, which were commonly measured by the vulgar Cubit, the alteration and diminution of mens statures hath made the difference. For as there is now a less proportion of bodies, so is the common Cubit from the sharp of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of less length than it was in elder times.

Saint Augustine, considering the many sorts of Beasts and Birds which the Ark held, with their food and water, was sometime of opinion, that the Ark had proportion after the Geometrical Cubit, which containeth almost six of the common: For, measuring the Ark by the vulgar Cubit, it did not exceed the capacity of that Vessel built by Hiero of Syracuse, or the Ship of Ptolemy Philo-pater. But S. Augustine (who at the first was led by Origen) changed his judgment as touching the Geometrical Cubit; and found, upon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a Body to preserve all sorts of Creatures, by God appointed to be reserved. For it was not needfull to take any kinds of Fishes into the Ark, because they were kept living (saith S. Augustine) in their own Element. Non fuit necesse conservare in Arca quæ possent in aquis vivere, non solum mersa sicut Pisces, verum super-natantia, sicut multæ alites: It was not needfull to conserve those creature in the Ark, which could live in the Waters; and not onely Fishes which can live under water, but also those Fowls which sit and swim on them. And again, Terra, non aqua, maledicta; quia Adam non hujus, sed illius fructum vetitum comedit: It was the Earth, and not the Waters which God cursed; for of the forbidden fruit of the Earth and not of the Sea, did Adam eat. So, as S. Augustine gathereth hereupon (as aforesaid) that so huge a Frame needed not. Athen. dipnosp. l. 4. Plutarc. in vita Demetrii.

And if we look with the eyes of judgment hereunto, we shall find nothing monstrous therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the most part) have more of mischief and of ignorance, than of any reverend reason, found many impossibilities in this work of God. But it is manifest, and undoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now seem differing, and of several kinds, were not then in rerum natura. For those Beasts which are of mixt natures, either they were not in that age, or else it was not needfull to preserve them, seeing they might be generated again by others: as the Mules, the Hyæna's, and the like; the one begotten by Asses and Mares, and the other by Foxes and Wolves. And whereas by discovering of strange Lands, wherein there are found divers Beasts and Birds, differing in colour or stature from those of these Northern parts; it may be supposed by a superficial consideration, that all those which were red and pied skins, or feathers, are differing from those that are less painted, and wear plain russet or black; they are much mistaken that so think. And for mine own opinion, I find no difference, but onely in magnitude, between the Cat of Europe, and the Ounce of India; and, even those Dogs which are become wild in Hispaniola, with which the Spaniards used to devour the naked Indians, are now changed to Wolves, and begin to destroy the breed of their Cattel, and do also oftentimes tear asunder their own Children. The common Crow and Rook of India is full of red feathers in the drowned and low Islands of Caribana; and the Blackbird and Thrush hath his feathers mixt with black and carnation in the North parts of Virginia. The Dog-fish of England is the Shark of the South Ocean: For if colour or magnitude made a difference of Species, then Acost. lib. 3. India.

then were the Nigro's, which we call the Black-Moors, non animalia rationalia, not Men, but some kind of strange Beasts: and so the Giants of the South America should be of another kind, than the people of this part of the World. We also see it daily, that the natures of Fruits are changed by transplantation, some to better, some to worse, especially with the change of Climate. Crabs may be made good Fruit by often grafting; and the best Melons will change in a year or two to common Cowcumers, by being set in a barren soyl. Therefore, taking the kinds precisely of all Creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the Earth by his Ordinance produced; the Ark after the measure of the common Cubit, was sufficiently capacious to contain of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we adde but half a foot of measure to the common Cubit, which had a foot and a half of Giantly stature (and less allowance we cannot give to the difference between them and us) then did the Ark contain 600. foot in length, and 100. foot in breadth, and 60. foot in depth.

But first of all, to make it manifest that the Geometrical Cubit is not used in the Deut.3.11. Scripture, the stature of the Giants therein named may suffice. For if the Bed of Og, King of Basan, had been nine Geometrical Cubits long, it had taken 54. Cubits of the common, which make 80. foot: and Goliah, who had
1 Sam.17. 4. the length of six Cubits and an handfull, which makes nine foot and a handfull (a proportion credible) if these Cubits had been Geometrical, then had been 54. foot in height, and upwards, which were monstrous and most incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliah been nine foot long, and farr weightier and bigger then all David's body, who carried it away.

Again, if the Geometrical Cubit had been used for a Measure in the Scripture, as many Commenters have observed, then had the Altar (appointed to contain five Cubits of length, five of breadth, and three of height) reached the length of 27. foot upright, and so must their Priests have ascended by steps or Ladders to have performed their Sacrifices thereon, which was contrary to Gods Commandment, given in these words:
Exod.20. 26. Thou shalt not go up with steps unto mine Altar, that thy shame be not discovered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three common Cubits high, which make four foot, that their Priests standing thereby might execute their Office. Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometrical, but the ordinary Cubit of one foot and a half, according to the measure of Giantly stature; which measure (doubtless) might give much the more capacity to the Ark; although it be also probable, that as the Men were, so were the horses whereon they rode, and all other Creatures of a correspondent size. And yet, (as I take it) though by this means there were not any whit the more room in the Ark, it were not hard to conceive, how all the distinct Species of Animals, whose lives cannot be preserved in the Waters, might according to their present quantities be contained in a Vessel of those dimensions which the Ark had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a half of our now usual measure: whence it followeth of necessity, that those large bodies which were in the days of Noah, might have room sufficient in the Ark, which was measured by a Cubit of length proportionable.

How the appointed number of Creatures to be saved, (that is, seven of the clean, two of the unclean, with necessary food) might have place in the Ark, Butæo hath very learnedly declared: the brief summ of whose discourse to that purpose, is this. The length of the Ark was three hundred Cubits, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fifty Cubits, and the product by the height of thirty Cubits, sheweth the whole Concavity to have been 450000. Now, whereas the posts, walls, and other partitions of Lodgings may seem to have taken up a great part of the hollow: the height of the roof, which (the perpendicular being one Cubit) contained 7500. cupical Cubes was a sufficient recompence: If therefore in a Ship of such greatness we seek room for 89. distinct Species of Beasts, or (lest any should be omitted) for 100. several kinds, we shall easily find place both for them, and for the Birds, which in bigness are no way answerable to them; and for meat to sustain them all. For there are three sorts of Beasts, whose bodies are of a quantity best known; the Beef, the Sheep, and the Wolf: to which the rest may be reduced, by saying, (according to Aristotle) that one Elephant is answerable to four Beeves, one Lion to two Wolves, and so of the rest. Of Beasts, some feed on vegetables, others on flesh. There are one and thirty kinds of the greater sort, feeding on vegetables: of which number onely three are clean, according to the Law of Moses, whereof seven of a kind entred into the Ark, namely, three couples for breed, and one odde one for sacrifice: the other eight and twenty kinds were taken by two of each kind, so that in all there were in the Ark one and twenty great

Beasts

Beasts clean, and six and fifty unclean, estimable for largness as ninety one Beeves; yet for a supplement (lest perhaps any Species be omitted) let them be valued as an hundred and twenty Beeves. Of the lesser sort feeding on vegetables, were in the Ark six and twenty kinds, estimable, with good allowance for supply, as fourscore Sheep. Of those which devour flesh were two and thirty kinds, answerable to threescore and four Wolves. All these two hundred and eighty Beasts might be kept in one story or room of the Ark, in their several Cabins; their meat in a second: the Birds and their provision in a third, with place to spare for Noah and his Family, and all their necessaries.

¶. I.

A Præterition of some Questions less material: with a Note of the use of this Question to find out the Metropolis of Nations.

WHat time Noah took to build the Ark, I leave to others to dispute: but he received the Commandment from God an hundred years before the Waters fell; and had therefore choice of time, and leisure sufficient. As for the number of Decks and Partitions, which Origen divides into four, Saint Augustine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controversie: or, whether those Creatures which sometimes rest on the Land, other times in the Waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Alegartos) the Sea-Cows, or Sea-Horses, were kept in the Ark, or no, I think it a needless curiosity; and yet to this saith Pererius, and others before him, that a Fish-pool might be made as well within the Ark, as in Hiero his Ship of Syracuse. Lastly, to consider or labour to disprove the foolery of the Hebrews, who suppose that the Ark was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had Windows of Crystal to receive in Light, and keep out Water, were but to revive the buried vanities of former times. But that which I seek most to satisfie my self and others in, is, In what part of the World the Ark rested after the Floud: because the true understanding of some of these places (as the seat of the terrestrial Paradise, and the resting of the Ark) do onely and truly teach the Worlds Plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the Floud; and all Story, as well general as particular, thereby may be the better understood.

¶. II.

A Proposal of the common opinion, that the Ark rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

AND first, for the true place where the Ark rested after the Floud, and from what part of the World the Children of Noah travelled to their first settlement and plantation, I am resolved (without any presumption) that therein the most Writers were utterly mistaken. And I am not led so to think out of any Humour, or newness of opinion, or singularity; but do herein ground my self on the original and first truth, which is the word of God, and after that upon reason, and the most probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, That the Ark stayed upon one of the mountains of Ararat, which the Chaldean Paraphrast hath converted Kardu, meaning the hills Gordæi, or Gordiæi, in Armenia the greater (as the words Gordæi, and Kardu, seem to be one and the same) of which opinion also the most of our Interpreters are: I find neither Scripture nor Reason which teacheth any such thing (to wit) that it rested on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolaus Damascenus calls this Mountain of Ararat, Baris; being the same which the Chaldean nameth Kardu, to which Mountain the Frier Annius (citing this place out of Josephus) makes him find another adjoyning, called Ocila, and to say that the Ark (of which Moses the Law-giver of the Hebrews wrote) did first take ground on this Ocila. But I do not find any such Mountain in being, as this Ocila, neither is there any mention of it in the place of Josephus. Strabo remembreth a Promontory in Arabia fœlix of that name; and Pliny finds a Mart-town so called in the same, which Ptolemy calls Ocilis, Pinetus Acyla, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocila of Damascenus, or rather of Annius, seemeth to be one and a part of the Armenian Mountains. Berosus calleth those Mountains of Armenia Gordiæi, and Curtius Cordæi: Ptolemy Gordæi and Gordiæi: of which the Countrey next adjoyning is, by this Nicolaus Damascenus, called Nyniada, perhaps (as Becanus conjectures) for Milyada, or rather Minni: which word is used for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia seems to be compounded of this word Minni, and Aram: as if we should say Minni

Gen. 8. 4.

Hiero. 51. 27.

Nat. Hist. l. 5. c. 12. of Syria; for that Armenia also was a part of Syria, Pliny witnesseth. Epiphanius placeth the Cardyes about these Mountains, whom others call Gordieni or Gordeni. The Mountains are seated apart from all other to the North of that Ledge of the Mountains called Taurus, or Niphates, in the Plains of Armenia the great, near the Lake Thospitis: whence the River of Tygris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, and 41. & 52. degrees of latitude. One of the Mountains, Gordiæi (that which surmounteth the rest) Epiphanius calls Lubar, which in the Armenian signifieth a place of descent: but this out of Josephus. Which name (saith Junius) was of the event, because of Noahs coming down with his children. But this also I take to be a supposed event; seeing any Hill from whence on every side we must descend, may thus be called: as Junius corrects the place in Josephus Joseph. de Antiq. l. 1. cap. 4. Λουβαρις (Kubaris.) That the place is thus to be read, he conjectureth, because Joseph. l. 1. c. 4. says, the place is called Ἀναβατήριον (as it were the descent or coming down) and Epiphanius lib. 1. contr. Hæres. calls it Λίφας, which word in the Armenian and Egyptian Tongue signifieth Descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubra is a Synagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whereof also the Latine Delubrum may seem to be derived; and Acts 6. 9. they that belonged to the Synagogue of the Egyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra tenu. Yet this opinion hath been embraced from Age to Age, receiving a habit of strength by time, and allowance without any further examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly be given, especially to that Mountain, by reason that the passage was more fair, up and down unto it, than to any of the rest adjoyning.

¶. III.

The first Argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so near a place as Armenia.

BUt there are many Arguments to perswade me, that the Ark of Noah did not rest it self in any part of Armenia, and that the Mountain Ararat was not Baris, nor any one of the Gordiæan Mountains.

For the first: It is agreed by all who follow Berosus, Beros. l. 1. that it was in the year 130. or in the year 131. after the Floud, when Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinar, which Valley was afterward call'd Babylonia, Chush, and Chaldea. If then the Ark had first found Land in Armenia, it is very unprobable, that the children of Noah, which came into that Valley, could have spent so many years in so short a passage: seeing the Region of Mesopotamia was onely interjacent, which might by easie journeys have been past over in twenty days; and to hasten and help which passage, the navigable River of Tygris offered it self, which is every where transpassable by Boats of great burthen: so as where the Desart on the one side resisted their expedition, the River on the contrary side served to advance it; the River rising out of the same Ledge of Mountains, or at the foot of them, where the Ark of Noah was first supposed to settle it self; Then, if the Nations which followed Nimrod still doubted the surprise of a second Floud (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrews) it soundeth ill to the ear of reason, that they would have spent many years in that low and overflown Valley of Mesopotamia, so called, of the many Rivers which imbroider or compass it: for the effects witnessed their affections, and the works which they undertook, their unbelief; being no sooner arrived in Shinar, but they began to provide themselves of a defence (by erecting Babel) against any future or feared Inundation. Now, at Babel it was, that Nimrod began his Kingdom, the first known City of the World, founded after the Floud, about 131. years, or (as others suppose) ten years later: though (for my self) I rather think that they undertook that work in two respects; first, to make themselves famous, To get us a name (saith the Text:) Secondly, thereby to usurp dominion over the rest. Gen. 10. 10. Beros. l. 1.

¶. IV.

The second Argument; That the Eastern People were most ancient in populosity, and in all humane glory.

FOr a second Argument: The civility, magnificence, and multitude of people (wherein the East parts of the World first abounded) hath more weight than any thing which hath been, or can be said for Armenia, and for Noah's taking Land there. And that this is true, the use of Printing and Artillery (among many other things which the East had) may easily perswade us, that those Sunrising Nations were the most ancient. The certainty of this report, that the East-Indians (time out of mind) have had Guns and Ordnance of battery, confirmed by the Portugals and others, make us now to understand, That the place of Philostratus in vita Apollonii lonii Tianæi, l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, though expreſſed in fabulous words: when he ſaith, that the wiſe men, which dwell between Hyphaſis and Ganges, uſe not themſelves to go forth into Battel: but that they drive away their Enemies with Thunder and Lightning ſent from Jupiter. By which means there it is ſaid, that Hercules Ægyptius and Bacchus, joyning their forces, were defeated there; and that this Hercules there caſt away his golden Shield. For the invention of Letters was ignorantly aſcribed to Cadmus, becauſe he brought them firſt into Greece: of which the people (then rude and ſavage) had reaſon to give him the honour, from whom they received the benefit. But it is true, that Letters are no leſs antient then Seth or Henoch were: for they are ſaid to have written on Pillars of Stone (as before remembred) long before the Floud. But from the Eaſtern world it was that John Guthenberg a Germane, brought the device of Printing: by whom Conradus being inſtructed, brought the practice thereof to Rome: and after that Nicolaus Gerſon a Frenchman, bettered both the Letters and Invention. And notwithſtanding that this Myſtery was then ſuppoſed to be but newly born, the Chinois had Letters long before either the Egyptians or Phœnicians; and alſo the Art of Printing, when as the Greeks had neither any civil knowledg, or any Letters among them.

And, that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards have witneſſed, who about an hundred years ſince diſcovered thoſe Kingdoms, and do now enjoy their rich trades therein: for the Chinois account all other nations but ſalvages in reſpect of themſelves.

And to add ſtrength to this argument, the conqueſt and ſtory of Alex. Macedon may juſtly be called to witneſs, who found more Cities and ſumptuoſity in that little Kingdom of Porus, which lay ſide by ſide to the Eaſt India, then in all his other travails and undertakings. For in Alexander's time, learning and greatneſs had not travailed ſo far to the Weſt as Rome. Alexander eſteeming of Italy but as a barbarous Country, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that ſtood in his eye, and the fame of the Eaſt pierced his ears. And if we look as far as the Sun-riſing, and hear Paulus Venetus what he reporteth of the uttermoſt Angle and Iſland thereof, we ſhall find that thoſe Nations have ſent out, and not received; lent knowledg, and not borrowed it from the Weſt. For the farther Eaſt (to this day) the more civil; the farther Weſt, the more Salvage. And of the Iſle of Japan (now Zipingari) Venetus maketh this report: Incolæ religioni, literis, & ſapientiæ ſunt addictiſſimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more noſtro) ſacris in delubris exercent: unum cognoſcunt Principem, unum Deum adorant: The Iſlanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters, and philoſophy, and moſt diligent ſearchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent then prayer, which they uſe in their Churches, after the manner of Chriſtians: They acknowledg one King, and worſhip one God. The antiquity, magnificence, civility, riches, ſumptuous buildings, and policie in government, is reported to be ſuch by thoſe who have been imployed in thoſe parts, as it ſeemeth to exceed (in thoſe formerly named, and divers other particulars) all other Kingdoms of the World.

§. V.

The third Argument, from the wonderful reſiſtance which Semiramis found in the Eaſt Indies.

BUt for a third argument, and alſo of a treble ſtrength to the reſt, I lay the invaſion of Semiramis before the indifferent and adviſed Reader: who may conſider in what Age ſhe lived, and how ſoon after the Worlds new birth ſhe gathered her Army (as Diodorus Siculus out of Cteſias reporteth) of more then three millions to invade India, to which he adjoyned alſo 500000. Horſe; and 100000. Waggons: whereof if we believe but a third part, it ſhall ſuffice to prove that India was the firſt planted and peopled Country after the Floud. Now as touching the time wherein ſhe lived: All Hiſtorians conſent that ſhe was the Wife of Ninus, and the moſt approved Writers agree, that Ninus was the Son of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Son of Chuſh, Cuſh of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at ſuch time as Nimrod came to Shinaar, he was then a great Nation, as by the building of the City and Tower of Babel may appear; and being then ſo multiplied and increaſed, the two deſcents caſt between Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time thoſe multitudes, whereof her Army was compoſed. Let us then ſee with whom ſhe encountred in that War with this her powerful Army: even with a multitude, rather exceeding, then equalling her own, conducted by Staurobates King of India beyond Indus; of whoſe multitudes this is the witneſs of Diod. Siculus; Staurobates coactis majoribus, quàm quæ erant Semiramidis, copiis: Staurobates gathering together greater Troops then those of Semiramis. If then these numbers of Indians had been increased but by a Colonie sent out from Shinaar (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt took some time in the performance) this increase in the East, and this Army of Staurobates must have been made of stone, or somewhat else by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might easily grow up in that time, from so great a Troop as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as shall be demonstrated hereafter in the Story of Israel) so could not any such time, by any multiplication natural, produce so many bodies of men as were in the Indian Army victorious over Semiramis, if the Colonies sent thither had been so late as Babel overturned, and the confusion of Languages. For if we allow 65. years time after the Floud, before Nimrod was born: of which, thirty years to Cush ere he begat Seba, after whom he had Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtecha: and then thirty years to Raamah, ere he begat

Gen. 10. 7. Sheba and Dedan, both which were born before Nimrod: and five years to his five elder Brothers, which make sixty five, and then twice thirty years for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba, and Dedan with others, to beget their Sons; and that a third Generation might grow up, which makes in all an hundred twenty five years; there will then remain six years to have been spent in travailing from the East, ere they arrived in Shinaar, in the year after the Floud 131. And so the followers of Nimrod might be of sufficient multitude. But as for those which make him to have arrived at Shinaar in the year 101. and the Confusion to have been at Pelegs birth, these men do all by miracle: they beget whole Nations without the help of time; and build Nimrods Tower in the Ayr; and not on those low and marish grounds (which require sound foundations) in the Plains of Shinaar. For except that huge Tower were built in a day, there could be no confusion in that year 101. or at Pelegs birth. And therefore it is far more probable, that Nimrod usurped Regal authority in the 131. year after the Floud (according to Berosus) and that the Work of Babel lasted fourty years (according to Glycas) Hominibus in ea perficienda totis 40. annis incassum laborantibus; Men labouring in vain 40. years to finish it. By which account it falls out that it was 170. years after the Floud, ere a Colonie was sent into East India; which granted, (the one being the main Body, and the other but a Troop taken thence) it can hardly be believed that Staurobates could have exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then Empress of all that part of the world gathered the most of Nations into one body.

||. VI.

The fourth Argument from divers considerations in the person of Noah.

FOurthly, it is no way probable, that Noah, who knew the world before the Floud, and had lived therein the long time of 600. years, was all that space 130. years after the Floud without any certain habitation: No, it will fall out, and better agree with reason, that Nimrod was but the conductor of those people, by Noah destined and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the Western World; (which Travails Noah put over to young and able bodies) and that Noah himself, then covered with many years, planted himself in the same place which God had assigned him; which was, where he first came down out of the Ark from the waters: for it is written, that after Noah came down out of the Ark, he planted a Vineyard, and became a Husbandman, whose business was to dress and manure the Earth; and not to range over so many parts of the world, as from Armenia into Arabia fœlix, where he should (if the Tradition be sound) have left certain Colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton: then into Spain where they say he setled other companies, and built Cities after the names of Noela and Noegla his Sons Wives: from thence into Italy, where they say he found his Son Cham the Saturn of Egypt, who had corrupted the people and subjects of Gomer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the story) had patience for three years; but then finding no amendment, they say he banish'd him out of Italy. These be but the fancies of Berosus Annianus, a plain imitation of the Grecian fables. For let every reasonable man conceive, what it was to travail far in such a Forrest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the Earth by the Floud, the same lay wast and over-grown for 130. or 140. years, and wherein there could hardly be found either part or passage through which men were able to creep for Woods, Bushes, and Bryers, that in those years were grown up.

And there are so many reasons, proving that Noah never came into the Valley of Shinaar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italy or Spain: For Noah who was Father of all those Nations, a man reverenced both for for his Authority, Knowledg, Experience and Piety, would never have permitted his children and iſſues to have undertaken that unbelieving preſumptuos work of Babel. Rather by his preſence and prevalent perſwaſions he would have bound their hands from ſo vain labours, and by the authority which he received even from God himſelf, he would have held them in that awfull ſubjection, as, whatſoever they had vainly conceived or feared, yet they durſt not have diſobeyed the perſonal commandment of him, who in the beginning had a kind of Regal authority over his children and people. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former deſtruction of man-kind was by themſelves purchaſed through cruelty and diſobedience; and that to diſtruſt God, and to raiſe up building againſt his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a provocation of God to lay upon them the ſame, if not a more ſharp affliction. Wherefore, there is no probability, that ever he came ſo far Weſt as Babylonia; but rather, that he ſent thoſe numbers which came into Shinaar (being the greateſt troop, becauſe they had the greateſt part of the World to plant) under Nimrod, or thoſe upon whom he uſurped. Nauclerus, and Cœleſtinus, take the teſtimony of Methodius Biſhop of Tyre for currant, that there were three Leaders of the people after their increaſe (to wit) Nimrod, Suphene, and Joctan, of which Nimrod commanded the iſſues of Cham, Joctan of Sem, and Suphene of Japhet. This opinion I cannot judge of, although I will not doubt, but that ſo great a work as the Worlds Plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the Sons of Sem: Joctan, Havilah, and Ophir, are eſpecially noted to have dwelt in the Eaſt-India. The reſt of Sem's iſſues had alſo the Regions of Perſia, and the other adjoyning to Indus, and held alſo a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited Ur, till he was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sons of Joctan, or of all the reſt a certain number (Cham and his iſſue onely excepted) that Noah kept with himſelf, it cannot be known. Of which Plantation I ſhall ſpeak at large in the Chapter following.

Now, another reaſon which moves me to believe that Noah ſtayed in the Eaſt far away from all thoſe that came into Shinaar, is, that Moſes doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the Story of the Hebrews, or among any of thoſe Nations which contended with them. And Noah being the Father of all man-kind, and the choſen ſervant of God, was too principal a Perſon, to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in reſpect of his age and wearieſome experience of the World) withdrawn himſelf, and reſted a-part with his beſt Beloved, giving himſelf to the ſervice and contemplation of God and heavenly things, after he had directed his children to their deſtined portions. For he landed in a warm and fertile ſoil, where he planted his Vineyard, and dreſt the Earth; after which, and his thankſgiving to God by ſacrifice, he is not remembred in the Scriptures, becauſe he was ſo farr away from thoſe Nations of which Moſes wrote: which were the Hebrews chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

Of the ſenſleſs opinion of Annius the Commentor upon Beroſus: who finds divers places where the Ark reſted; as the Caſpian and Gordiæan Hills, which are three hundred miles aſunder; and alſo ſome places of Scythia.

IT remaineth now that we examine the Arguments and Authorities of Frier Annius, who in his Commentaries upon Beroſus and others, laboureth marvellouſly to prove that the Ark of Noah reſted upon the Armenian Mountains called Caſpii; which Mountains ſeparate Armenia from the upper Media, and do equally belong to both. And becauſe all his Authors ſpeak of the Mountains of Gordiæi, he hath no other ſhift to unite theſe opinions, but by uniting thoſe far-diſtant Mountains together. To effect which, he hath found no other invention, than to charge thoſe men with errour, which have carefully over-ſeen, Printed, and Publiſhed Ptolemies Geography, in which they are altogether diſlevered. For that laſt Edition of Mercators ſets theſe Hills five degrees (which makes three hundred Engliſh miles) aſunder. And certainly, if we look into thoſe more ancient Copies of Villanovanus, and others, we ſhall find nothing in them to help Annius withall: for in thoſe the Mountains Caſpii ſtand ſeven degrees to the Eaſt of the Gordiæi, which makes 420. miles. And for thoſe Authors by whoſe authority Annius ſtrengthneth himſelf, Diodorus whom he ſo much followeth, giveth this judgment upon them in the like diſpute. Aberrârunt verò omnes, non negligentiâ, ſed regnorum ſitûs ignorantiâ; They have all erred (ſaith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the ſituation of Kingdoms. But for an induction, to prove that the Ark of Noah ſtood on the Mountains of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquity of

Diod. l. c. 3.

of the Scythians: and to prove the same he citeth Marcus Portius Cato, who avoweth that 250. years before Ninus, the Earth was overflown with Waters, Et in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus; And that in Scythia the stock of mortal men was renewed. The same Author also teacheth, that the Umbri before remembred (who were so called, because saved from Deucalions Floud) were the Sons of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his venisse Janum cum Dyrim, & Gallis progenitoribus Umbrorum; From these Scythians, he saith, that Janus came with Dyrim, and with the Galli the progenitours of the Umbri: And again, Equidem principatus originis semper Scythis tribuitur; Certainly, the prime Antiquity of Off-spring is alway given to the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annius, that those Regions called Scythia, and now Tartaria, and by some Writers Sarmatia Asiatica, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia under Tribute till Ninus Time. Also Pliny called the Umbri which long since inhabited Italy, Gens antiquissima, a most ancient Nation, who descended of these Scythians. Now, that which Annius laboureth, is to prove that these ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephews of Noah) did first inhabit that Region of the Mountains, on which the Ark rested; and confessing that this great Ship was grounded in Armenia, he feigneth a Nation of Scythians called Araxea, taking name of the Mountain Ararat, near the River of Araxes. And because his Author Cato helpeth him in part (to wit, That in Scythia mankind was restored after the great Floud 250. years before Ninus) and in part utterly destroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga; as, In Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus; In Scythia Saga, mankind was restored: he therefore in the Proœme of his Commentary upon Berosus, leaveth out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato his words, and writes, homines in Scythia salvatos. For Scythia Saga, or Sacæ, is undoubtedly under the Mountains of Parapinisus; on which, or near which it is most probable that the Ark first took ground: and from those East parts (according to Moses) came all those companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinaar or Babylonia.

Gen. 11. 2.

But now, the best authority which Annius hath, is out of Diodorus: where he hath read that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name à Scytha Rege eorum, from Scytha their King. But (in a word) we may see his vanity, or rather (indeed) his falshood in citing this place. For Diodorus, a most approved and diligent Authour, beginneth in that place with these words: Fabulantur Scythæ, The Scythians Fable: and his Interpreter in the table of that work, giveth this Title to that very Chapter; Scytharum origo & successus, fabula; The original and success of the Scythians, a Fable. And (indeed) there needs no great disproof hereof, since Ptolemy doth directly delineate Scythia Saga, or Sacæ, and sets them in 130. degrees of longitude: and the Persians (saith Herodotus) call all the Scythians, Sacæ; which Pliny confirms: for in respect that these Sacæ (saith Pliny) are the Scythians next to the Persians, therefore they gave all the rest that name. L. 6. c. 67. Now, that any Nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man believeth. But this supposed Scythia Araxea in Armenia lieth in 78. degrees of longitude (that is) 42. degrees distant from the Sacæ; and the Countrey about Araxes Ptolemy calleth Colthene, and Soducene, and Sacapene, without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all those which are, or were reputed Scythians either within Imaus, or without, to the number of 100. several Nations, are by Ptolemy precisely set down. Tab. Asiæ 7. & 8.

But, to come to those latter Authours, whereof some have written, others have seen a great part of those North-East Regions, and searched their Antiquities with great diligence: First, Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scythia without these Mountains, is also beyond our purpose) Scythia inter Imaum montem ea est, quæ proprio vocabulo Gassaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab Occasu Sarmatia Asiatica: ab Oriente Imao Monte: à Septentrione terra cognita: à Meridie Saccis, Sogdianis, Margianis, usque ostia Oxæ amnis in Hyrcanum mare exeuntis; & parte ipsius maris hinc usq; ad Rha fluminis ostia terminatur: Scythia within the Mountain Imaus, is that part of the World which in their own speech is at this time called Gassaria; and the same is bounded on the West-side by Sarmatia Asiatica, (or of Asia:) on the East, by the Imaan Mountains: on the North, by unknown Lands: on the South, by the Saccæ (which are the Sacæ) the Sogdiani, and the Margiani, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea as farr as the mouth of Rha. Rha, Now Wolga.

Now, if Niger sets all Sarmatia Asiatica to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (quæ magna sanè Regio est, & quæ innumeras nationes complectitur, Which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable nations, saith Niger) much of it being between Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant us, that Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make Com. 2. Asiæ fol. 472.

make it more plain, he disseverеth Sarmatia it self from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, which he leaveth on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia.

Ad meridiem flexo Bosphoro pars septentrionalis ponte Euxini usque in ostium Coraris fluvii: unde relictis à parte dextra Colchis, Iberis, Albanisq; in litus Hyrcani maris provenit. Spoc. hist. lib. 30.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian or Scythian Nation; neither doth his fellow Frier John Plancarpio (cited by Vincentius in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neither doth Haytonus, an Armenian born of the bloud of those Kings (though afterwards a Monk) ever acknowledg himself for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian Races descended: though he writ that story at large, gathered by Nicolaus Salcuni, and (by the commandement of Pope Clement the fifth) in the year 1307. published.

Neither doth Matthias a Michon (a Canon of Cracovia in Polonia) a Sarmatian born, and that travailed a great part of Sarmatia Asiatica, find Armenia any way within the compass of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whose Travails are extant) hath observed so much of those Regions as he hath don: proving and disproving many things, heretofore subject to dispute. And among others he burieth that antient and received opinion, That out of the Mountains, Riphæi, and Hyperborei in Scythia, spring the Rivers of Tanais or Don, Volga or Edel; proving by unanswerable experience, that there are no such Mountains in rerum natura; and (indeed) the Heads and Fountains of those famous Rivers are now by the Trade of Muscovia known to every Merchant, and that they arise out of Lakes, low, wooddy, and marish grounds. The River of Tanais or Don, ariseth to the South of the City Tulla, some twenty English miles, out of a Lake called Iwanowesero, in the great Wood Okenitzkilies or Jepiphanolies. Volga, which Ptolemy calls Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, riseth out of a Lake called Fronow, in the great Wood Vodkonzki: from which Lake the two other famous Rivers flow of Borysthenes (now Neyper) and Dsuina or Dividna.

Sig. Herbestem.

And this learned Polonian doth in this sort bound the Europæan Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Russians, Lithuanians, Muscovians, and those adjoyning, bounded on the West by the River of Vissa, the Name perchance mis-printed Vissa for Vistula, a River which parts Germania and Sarmatia: and for the East-border he nameth Tanais, or Don. Sarmatia Asiatica he cutteth from Europe by the same River of Tanais, and the Caspian Sea, to with-hold it from stretching farther East: this Asian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolemy calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem: Scythia within the Mountain Imaus. And the same Matthias Michon further affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Frier Annius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Asiatica it self above three hundred and a few odd years before his own time: these be his words: Constat eam esse gentem novam, & adventitiam à partibus Orientis (mutatis sedibus) paulo plus abhinc trecentis annis Asiæ Sarmatiam ingressam: It is manifest (saith he, speaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the coasts of the East: from whence they entred into Asia, & gat new seats a little more then 300. years since: For (indeed) before that time the Goths or Pouloci inhabited Sarmatia Asiatica. And this Matthias lived in the year 1511. and this his Discourse of Sarmatia was Printed at Augusta in the yeer 1506. as Bucholzerus in his Chronologie witnesseth. Now these Scythians (saith he) came from the East; for in the East it was, that the Ark of Noah rested, and the Scythæ Sacræ were those people which lived at the North foot of those Mountains, of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or begin to mix themselves with the great Imaus. And were there no other testimony then the general description of the Earth now extant, and the witness of Ptolemy, it is plain, that between all parts of Armenia, and Scythia, there are not only those three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian Sea: on the East shore of which Sea, but not on the West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Scythians (called Ariacæ) between Jaxartus and Jactus; but what are these Scythians to any Ariacæ, or Scythia Araxea, which Annius placeth in Armenia, more then the Scythians of Europe?

Cranzius calleth this River Wistaus, Niger Dravamanza, Pom. Mela. Visala & Plin. Visullus.

§. VIII.

The fifth Argument; The Vine must grow naturally neer the place where the Arke rested.

TO this if we add the consideration of this part of the Text, That Noah planted a Vineyard, we shall find that the fruit of the Vine or Raysin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Arke was supposed: for if the Vine was a stranger in Italy and France, and brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a far colder Country. For Tyrrhenus first brought Vines into France, and Saturnus Gen. 9. 20.

Saturnus into Latium: yea at such times as Brennus and the Gauls invaded Italy, there were few or no Vines in France. For (saith Plutarch in the life of Camillus) the Gaules remained between the Pyrenæi and the Alpes, neer unto the Senones, where they continued a long time, until they drunk Wine, which was first brought them out of Italy; and after they tasted thereof, they hasted to inhabite that Country, which brought forth such pleasant Fruit: so as it appeareth, that the Plant of the Vine was not natural in France, but from Italy brought thither; as by Saturn from else-where into Italy.

Servius Aeneid Eutropius.

Now it is manifest, that Noah travailed not far to seek out the Vine. For the Plantation thereof is remembred, before there was any counsel how to dispose of the World among his children: and the first thing he did, was, to till the ground, and to plant a Vine-yard, after the Sacrifice and Thanksgiving to God; and whersoever the Arke rested, there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appear, that he travailed far: for the Scriptures teach us, that he was a Husband-man, and not a wanderer.

An answer to an objection out of the words of the Text: The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole earth.

AND that all the children of Noah came together into Shinaar, it doth not appear, saving that it may be inferred out of these words (from thence) because it is written: So that the Lord scattered them [from thence] upon all the Earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Tower: for those were from thence dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these words of Sybilla (as they be converted) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinaar; for they have this limitation: Quidam eorum turrem ædificarunt altissimam, quasi per eam Cœlum essent ascensuri: Certain of them built a most high Tower, as if they meant thereby to have scaled the Heavens.

‖. X.

An answer to the objection of the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the heighth of the Hills there.

BUt before I conclude this part, it is necessary to see and consider what part of Scripture, and what reason may be found out, to make it true or probable, that the Ark of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the Mountains of Armenia. For the Text hath only these words: The Ark rested on (or upon) the Mountains of Ararat, or Armenia, saith the Marginal Note of the Geneva: the Chaldean Paraphrast calls it Kardu; of which, the highest hath the name of Lubar, saith Epiphanius. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint do not convert at all, but keep the same word) is taken to be a Mountain of Armenia; because Armenia it self had antiently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the heighth (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, That the Ark first sate thereon.

Gen. 8. 14. Epiph. l. 1. contr. Hæres.

But these suppositions have no foundation: for neither is Ararat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of those Mountains of equal stature to many other Mountains of the World; and yet it doth not follow, that the Ark found the highest Mountain of all other to rest on: for the Plains were also uncovered before Noah came out of the Ark. Now, if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, we might give more credit to the conceit. For in the Books of the Sybils it is written, that the Mountains of Ararat are in Phrygia, upon which it was supposed that the Ark stayed after the Floud. And the better to particularize the place and seat of these Mountains, and to prove them in Phrygia and not Armenia; they are placed where the City of Cælenes was afterward built. Likewise in the same description she maketh mention of Marsyas, a River which runneth through part of Phrygia and afterward joyneth it self with the River Mæander, which is far from the Gordiæan Mountain in Armenia. We may also find a great mistaking in Josephus (though out of Berosus, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that Josephus sets Ararat between Armenia and Parthia, toward Adiabene, and affirmeth withall, that in the Province of Cæron (by others Kairos and Arnos, so called by reason that the waters have from thence no descent, nor issue out) the people vaunt that they had in those days reserved some pieces of Noahs Ark. But Parthia toucheth no where upon Armenia; for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Province of Assyria: so that all Media and a part of Assyria is between Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the discovery of the Mountains Cordiæi was first borrowed out of Berosus by Josephus; yet the Text which Josephus citeth out of Berosus differs far from the words of that Beroſus, which wandereth up and down in theſe days, ſet out by Annius. For Beroſus, cited by Joſephus, hath theſe words: Fertur & navigii hujus pars in Armenia apud montem Cordiæorum ſupereſſe, & quoſdam Bitumen inde abraſum ſecum reportare, quo vice amuleti loci hujus homines uti ſolent: (which is) It is reported alſo that a part of this ſhip is yet remaining in Armenia upon the Cordiæan Mountains; and that divers do ſcrape from it the Bitumen or Pitch, and carrying it with them, they uſe it in ſtead of an amulet. But Annius his Edition of the Fragment of Beroſus uſeth theſe words: Nam elevata ab aquis in Gordiæ montis vertice quievit, cujus adhuc dicitur aliqua pars eſſe, & homines ex illa Bitumen tollere quo maximè utuntur ad expiationem: For the whole Arke being lifted up by the waters, reſted on the top of the Gordiæan Mountaines, of which it is reported that ſome parts remain, and that men do carry thence of the Bitumen to purge by Sacrifice therewith: ſo as in theſe two Texts (beſides the difference of words) the name is diverſly written. The antient Beroſus writes Cordiæi with a (C); and the Fragment Gordiæi with a (G): the one that the Bitumen is uſed for apreſervative againſt Poyſon or Inchantment; the other, in Sacrifice. And if it be ſaid that they agree in the general, yet it is reported by neither from any certain knowledg, nor from any approved Author: for one of them, uſeth the word (fertur) the other (dicitur); the one, that ſo it is reported, the other, that ſo it is ſaid; and both but by hear-ſay, and therefore of no authority nor credit. For common bruit is ſo infamous an Hiſtorian, as wiſe men neither report after it, nor give credit to any thing they receive from it.

Furthermore, theſe Mountains which Ptolemy cals Gordiæi, are not thoſe Mountaines which himſelf giveth to Armenia, but he calleth the Mountains of Armenia, Moſchici. Theſe be his own words: Montes Armeniæ nominantur ii, qui Moſchici appellantur, qui protenduntur uſque ad ſuperjacentem partem Ponti Cappadocum; & Mons qui Paryardes dicitur: The Mountains of Armenia are they which are called Moſchici, ſtretched along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians: alſo the Hill which is called Paryardes: which Mountains Pliny calleth Pariedri, and both which ly to the North of Gordiæi or Baris, in 43. and 44. and a half; and the Gordiæan Mountains in 39. and a halfe: from the Northermoſt of which did the Georgians take their names, who were firſt Gordians, and then Georgians, who amidſt all the ſtrength of the greateſt Infidels of Perſia and Turkie, do ſtill remain Chriſtians. Concerning the other ſuppoſitions, that the Mountains of Gordiæi, otherwiſe Baris, Kardu or Lubar (which Ptolemy calleth Torgodiaion) are the higheſt of the World, the ſame is abſolutely falſe.

Of Caucaſus, and divers far higher hills than the Armenian.

FOr the beſt Coſmographers, with other, that have ſeen the Mountains of Armenia find them far inferiour, and under-ſet to divers other Mountains even in that part of the World, and elſe where: as the Mountain Athos between Macedon and Thrace, which Ptolemy calls Olympus, now called Lacas, (ſaith Caſtaldus) is far ſurmounting any Mountain that ever hath been ſeen in Armenia: for it caſteth ſhade three hundred furlongs, which is ſeven and thirty miles and upwards: of which Plutarch; Athos adumbrat latera Lemniæ bovis: Athos ſhadoweth the Cow of Lemnos. Alſo the Mount of Olympus in Theſſalie, is ſaid to be of that height, as neither the Winds, Clouds, or Rain overtop it. Again, the Mountain of Antandrus in Myſia, not far from Ida, whence the River Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is alſo of a far more admiration than any in Armenia, and may be ſeen from Conſtantinople. There are alſo in Mauritania neer the Sea, the famous Mountains of Atlas, of which Herodotus: Extat in hac mari Mons cui nomen Atlas, ita ſublimis eſſe dicitur, ut ad illius verticem oculi mortalium pervenire non poſſint: Upon this Coaſt there is a Mountain called Atlas, whoſe heighth is ſaid to be ſuch, as the eye of no mortal man can diſcern the top thereof. And if we may believe Ariſtotle, then are all theſe inferiour to Caucaſus, which he maketh the moſt notorious both for breadth and height: Caucaſus Mons omnium maximus, qui æſtivum ad ortum ſunt, acumine atq; latitudine, cujus juga à Sole radiantur uſq; ad conticinium ab ortu: & iterum ab occaſu: Caucaſus (ſaith Ariſtotle) is the greateſt Mountain both for breadth and height of all thoſe in the North-eaſt, whoſe tops are lightned by the Sun-beams (uſq; ad conticinium) which is, ſaith Macrobius, between the firſt crowing after mid-night and the break of day: Others affirm, that the top of this Mountain holds the Sun-beams when it is dark in the Valley; but I cannot believe either, for the higheſt Mountain of the World known, is that of Tenerife in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Weſtward of it for 1000. Leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enjoy the Sun's company at any such late hours. Besides these Mountains which Aristotle calleth Caucasi, are those which separate Colchis from Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth divide both Colchis, Iberia, and Albania from Sarmatia: for he acknowledgeth that the River of Phasis riseth in the same Mountain, which himself calleth Caucasus, and that Phasis springeth from those Hills which sunder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterward into Euxinus: which River (it is manifest) yieldeth it self to the Sea, two degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trabesunda) howsoever Mercator bring it from Paryardes.

‖. XII.

Of divers incongruities if in this Story we should take Ararat for Armenia.

SO as it doth first appear, that there is no certainty what Mountain Ararat was: for the Books of the Sybils set it in Phrygia, and Berosus in Armenia: and as for Berosus authority, those men have great want of proofs that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Baris was the highest Hill, and therefore most likely that the Arke grounded thereon, the assertion and supposition have equal credit: for there are many Hills which exceed all those of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Ark should sit on the highest.

Thirdly, it cannot be proved that there is any such Hill in Armenia, or in rerum natura, as Baris: for Baris (saith Hierom) signifieth high Towers; and so may all high Hills be called indifferently: and therefore we may better give the name of Baris to the Hills of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) then to any Hills of Armenia. For those of Caucasus in the East, are undoubtedly the highest of Asia.

Fourthly, the Authors themselves do not agree in what Region the Mountains Gordiæi stand: for Ptolemy distinguisheth the Mountains of Armenia from the Gordiæan, and calleth those of Armenia, Moschici and Paryardes, as aforesaid. Now Paryardes is seated near the middle of Armenia, out of which on the West-side riseth Euphrates, and out of the East-side, Araxis: and the Mountains Moschici are those Hills which disjoyn Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

‖. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia, to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marvail that the same Ledg of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all along: and even in India be called Ararat.

LAstly, we must blow up this Mountain Ararat it self, or else we must dig it down, and carry it out of Armenia, or find it elsewhere, and in a warmer Country, and (withal) set it East from Shinaar; or else we shall wound the Truth it self with the weapons of our own vain imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to every eye, we must understand, that Ararat (named by Moses) is not any one Hill, so called, no more then any one Hill among those Mountains which divide Italy from France, is called the Alps: or any one among those which part France from Spain is the Pyrenian: But as these, being continuations of many Hills, keep one name in divers Countries, so all that long Ledg of Mountains, which Pliny calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolemy both Taurus, Niphates, Coatras, Coronus, Sariphi, until they encounter and cross the Mountains of the great Imaus, are of one general name, and are called the Mountains of Ararat or Armenia, because from thence or thereabout they seem to arise. So all these Mountains of Hyrcania, Armenia, Coraxis, Caspii, Moschici, Amazonici, Heniochi, Scythici, (thus diversly called by Pliny and others) Ptolemy calls by one name Caucasus, lying between the Seas Caspium and Euxinus: as all those Mountains which cut asunder America, even from the new Kingdom of Granado, to the streight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these Mountains of Ararat run East and West, so do those marvailous Mountains of Imaus stretch themselves North and South; and being of like extent well-neer, are called by the name of Imaus, even as Pliny called these former Hills Taurus, and Moses the Hills of Ararat. The reason of several names given by Ptolemie, was, thereby the better to distinguish the great Regions and Kingdoms, which these great Mountains bound and dissever; as Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Media, Susiana, Persia, Parthia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Paropanisus: having all these Kingdoms, either on the North or South side of them. For all the Mountains of Asia (both the less and the greater) have three general names, (to wit) Taurus, Imaus, and Caucasus: and they receive other titles, as they sever and divide particular Places and Regions. For these Mountains which sunder Cilicia from the rest of Asia the less, on the North-side, are called Taurus; and those Moun-

Mountains which part it from Comagena (a Province of Syria) are called Amanus: the Mountains called Taurus, running East and West, as Imaus doth North and South. Through Taurus, the River of Euphrates forceth her passage, leaving the name of Amanus to the Mountains on her West-bank, and on her East-side the Mountains are sometimes known by the name of Taurus, (as in Ptolemie's three Tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates (as in the fourth) retaining that uncertain appellation so long as they bound Armenia from Mesopotamia: and after the River of Tygris cutteth them asunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, untill they separate Assyria and Media; but then they call themselves Coatras, though between the upper and nether Media, they do not appear, but altogether discontinue. For at Mazada in Media they are not found, but run through the Eastern Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themselves Orontes, and towards the East part Coronus; out of the Southern part whereof the River of Bagradus riseth, which divideth the ancient Persian from Caramania: and then continuing their course Eastward by the name of Coronus, they give to the Parthians and Hyrcanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themselves into the Mountains of Sariphi, out of which riseth the River Margus, afterward yielding her self to Oxus (now Abia:) and drawing now near their ways end, they first make themselves the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Paropanisus; and lastly, of Caucasia, even where the famous River of Indus, with his principal companions, Hydaspis and Zarædrus, spring forth and take beginning. And here do these Mountains build themselves exceeding high, to equal the strong Hills called Imaus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35, 36, and 37. degrees of Latitude, and in 140. of Longitude: of the which the West parts are now called Delanguer, and the rest Nagracot; and these Mountains in this place onely are properly called Caucasi (saith Ptolemie) that is, between Paropanisus and Imaus: and improperly, between the two Seas of Caspium and Pontus.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountain Caucasi, and toward the East-Indies: and of other excellencies of the soil.

NOw, in this part of the World it is, where the Mountain and River Janus, and the Mountain Nyseus, (so called of Bacchus Nyseus, or Noah) are found: and on these highest Mountains of that part of the World did Goropius Becanus conceive that the Ark of Noah grounded after the Floud; of all his conjectures the most probable, and by best reason approved. In his Indo-scythia he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantastical opinions of this subject. And as the same Becanus also noteth, that as in this part of the World are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same Line, and in 34, 35, and 36. degrees of Septentrional Latitude, are the most delicate Wines of the World, namely, in Judæa, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this Region of Margiana: and under these Mountains Strabo affirmeth, that the most excellent Vines of the World are found; the clusters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: and it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Palestina, where the searchers of the Land, by Moses direction, found bunches of equal bigness at Escol. Numb. 13. 24.

The fruitfulness of this place (to wit) on the South bottom of these Hills, Curtius witnesseth. For in Margiana, near the Mountains of Meros, did Alexander feast himself and his Army ten days together, finding the most delicate Wine of all other.

||. XV.

The Conclusion, with a brief repeating of divers chief points.

AND therefore to conclude this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those Mountains do also traverse Armenia: yea, and Armenia it self sometime is known by the name of Ararat. But as Pliny giveth to this Ledge of high Hills, even from Cilicia to Paraponisus and Caucasus, the name of Taurus: and as the Hills of France and Germany are called the Alps: and all between France and Spain the Pyrenes: and in America the continuation of Hills for 3000 miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the general name which Moses gave them; the diversity of appellations no otherwise growing, than by their dividing and bordering divers Regions, and divers Countreys. For in the like case do we call the Sea, which entreth by Gibraltar, the Mediterrane and in-land Sea; and yet where it washeth the Coasts of Carthage, and over against it, it is called Tyrrhenum: between Italy and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Durazzo, Adriaticum: between Athens and Asia, Ægeum: between Sestus and Abydus, dus, Helleſpont: and afterward Pontus, Propontis, and Boſphorus. And as in theſe, ſo is the Ocean to the North-eaſt part of Scotland called Deucaledonycum: and on this ſide, the Brittain Sea: to the Eaſt, the Germane and Baltick, and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this Queſtion, we muſt appeal to that Judge which cannot erre, even to the Word of Truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plain ſence: ſeeing it can admit neither diſtinction, nor other conſtruction than the words bear literally, becauſe they are uſed to the very ſame plain purpoſe of a deſcription, and the making of a true and preciſe difference of places. Surely, where the ſence is plain (and being ſo underſtood, it bringeth with it no ſubſequent inconvenience or contrariety) we ought to be wary, how we fancie to our ſelves any new or ſtrange expoſition; And (withall) to reſolve our ſelves, that every word (as aforeſaid) hath his weight in Gods Book. And therefore we muſt reſpect and reverence the teſtimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in ſuch ſort as Saint Auguſtine hath taught us, touching the Goſpel of Chriſt Jeſus (which is) Nequis aliter accipiat (quod narrantibus Diſcipulis Chriſti) in Evangelio legerit, quàm ſi ipſam manum Dei, quam in proprio corpore geſtabat, conſpexerit; That no man otherwiſe take or underſtand that which he readeth in the Goſpel (the Diſciples of Chriſt having written it) than if he had ſeen the very hand of the Lord, which he bare in his own body, ſetting it down.

Gen. 11. 2. The words then of Moſes, which end this Diſpute, are theſe: And as they went from the Eaſt, they found a Playn in the Land of Shinaar, and there they abode: which proveth without controverſie, that Nimrod, and all with him, came from the Eaſt into Shinaar; and therefore the Ark of Noah reſted and took land to the Eaſt-ward thereof. For we muſt remember, that in all places whereſoever Moſes maketh a difference of Countreys, he always preciſely nameth toward what quarter of the World the ſame were ſeated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Joctan, he nameth Sephar, a Mountain in the Eaſt: where he remembreth Cains departure from
Gen. 10. 30. the preſence of God, he addeth; And Cain dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the Eaſt-ſide of Eden: And when he deſcribeth the Tents and Habitations of Abraham, after he departed from Sechem, he uſeth theſe words;
Gen. 4. 16. Afterwards removing thence unto a Mountain Eaſt-ward from Bethel, he pitched his Tents:
Gen. 12. 8. having Bethel on the Weſt-ſide, and Hai on the Eaſt: and afterward in the ninth Verſe of the ſame Chapter, it is written; And Abraham went forth journeying towards the South: alſo when Ezekiel prophecieth of Gog and Magog, he ſheweth that theſe Nations of Togorma were of the North-quarters: and of the Queen of Saba it is written, that ſhe came from the South to viſit Solomon: And the Magi, (or Wiſemen) came out of the Eaſt to offer preſents unto Chriſt. And that all Regions, and theſe travels were preciſely ſet down upon the points of the Compaſs and Quarters of the World, it is moſt manifeſt: for Eden was due Eaſt from Judæa; Saba South from Hieruſalem: the way from Bethel to Egypt directly South; and the Cœlocyrians, the Tubalines, and Magogians inhabited the Regions directly North from Paleſtina, and ſo of the reſt. But Armenia anſwereth not to this deſcription of Shinaar by Moſes. For to come out of Armenia, and to arrive in that Valley of Babylonia, is not a journeying from the Eaſt, nor ſo near unto the Eaſt as the North: for Armenia is to the Weſt of the North it it ſelf; and we muſt not ſay of Moſes (whoſe hands the holy Ghoſt directed) that he erred toto cœlo, and that he knew not Eaſt from Weſt. For the body of Armenia ſtandeth in fourty three degrees Septentrional, and the North part thereof in fourty five; and thoſe Gordiæan Mountains, whereon it was ſuppoſed that the Ark reſted, ſtand in fourty one. But Babylonia, and the Valley of Shinaar are ſituated in thirty five; and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference between Eaſt and Weſt) the Gordiæan Mountains ſtand in 75. degrees, and the Valley of Shinaar in 79. and 80. And therefore Armenia lieth from Shinaar North-weſt, 95. degrees from the Eaſt; and if Armenia had been but North, yet it had differed from the Eaſt one whole quarter of the Compaſs. But Gregory, and Hierome warn us, In Scripturis ne minima differentia omitti debet: nam ſinguli ſermones, ſyllabæ, apices, & puncta in divina Scriptura plena ſunt ſenſibus; In the Scriptures the leaſt difference may not be omitted: for every ſpeech, ſyllable, note, or accent, and point in divine Scriptures are repleniſhed with their meanings. And therefore ſeeing Moſes teacheth us that the children of Noah came from the Eaſt, we may not believe Writers (of little authority) who alſo ſpeak by hear-ſay, and by report, Ut fertur, & ut dicitur, as Beroſus and Nicolaus Damaſcenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all adventure. But this is infallibly true, that Shinaar lyeth Weſt from the place where the Ark of Noah reſted after the Floud; and therefore it firſt found ground in the Eaſt, from whence came the firſt knowledg of all things. The Eaſt parts were firſt civil, which which had Noah himſelf for an inſtructor: and directly Eaſt from Shinaar in the ſame degree of 35. are the greateſt Grapes, and the beſt Wine. The great Armies alſo which overtopped in number thoſe Millions of Semiramis, prove, that thoſe parts were firſt Planted. And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reaſon ſufficient: for my ſelf I build on his words, who in plain terms hath told us, That the Sons of Noah came out of the Eaſt into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Ark reſt on thoſe Eaſtern Mountains, called by one general name Taurus, and by Moſes the Mountains of Ararat, and not on thoſe Mountains of the North-weſt, as Beroſus firſt feigned, whom moſt part of the Writers have followed therein. It was, I ſay, in the plentiful warm Eaſt where Noah reſted, where he planted the Vine, where he tilled the ground and lived thereon. Placuit vero Noacho agriculturæ ſtudium, in qua tractanda ipſe omnium peritiſſimus eſſe dicitur: ob eamque rem ſua ipſius lingua Iſh-Adamath (hoc eſt) telluris vir appellatur celebratuſque eſt, The ſtudy of Husbandry pleaſed Noah (ſaith the excellent learned man Arias Montanus) in the knowledg and order of which it is ſaid that Noah excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his own language, a man exerciſed in the earth. Which alſo ſheweth, that he was no wanderer; and that he troubled not himſelf with the contentions beginning again in the World, and among men, but ſtayed in his deſtined places, and in that part of the World where he was firſt delivered out of the Priſon of the Ark, whereinto God had committed him, to preſerve him and mankind.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the firſt planting of Nations after the Floud; and of the Sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japhet, by whom the Earth was re-peopled.

§. I.

Whether Shem and Ham were elder then Japhet.

Aug. de Civit. Dei, l. 16. c. 3.

OF theſe Sons of Noah, Which was the eldeſt, there is a queſtion made. St. Auguſtine eſteemed Shem for the eldeſt, Ham for the ſecond, and Japhet for the youngeſt: and herein the opinions of Writers are divers. But this we find every where in the Scriptures, and eſpecially in Moſes, that there was never any reſpect given to the eldeſt in years, but in virtue; as by the examples of Henoch, Abraham, Jacob, and David, is made manifeſt. In a few words, this is the ground of the controverſie; The Latine Tranſlation, and ſo the Geneva, hath converted this Scripture of Geneſis the 10. v. 21. in theſe words: Unto Shem alſo the Father of all the Sons of Heber, and elder brother of Japhet, were children born. But Junius, agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the ſame words in this manner: To Shem alſo the Father of all the Sons of Heber, and brother of Japhet the eldeſt Son, were children born: So the tranſpoſition of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Japhet, as it is in the vulgar Traſlation placed before it, then had it been as plain for Japhet, as it is by theſe Tranſlations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwiſe indifferent) ſeeing Gods bleſſings are not tyed to firſt and laſt in bloud, but to the eldeſt in piety, yet the arguments are ſtronger for Japhet then for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainly underſtood without any danger or inconvenience, it ſeemeth ſtrange why any man of judgment ſhould make valuation of conjectural arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the five hundreth year of his life, begat the firſt of his three Sons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet; and in the ſix hundreth year (to wit) the hundreth year following, came the general Floud; two years after which, Shem begat Arphaxad, which was in the year 602. of Noah's life, and in the year of Shem's life one hundred: ſo as Shem was but an hundred years old, two years after the Floud: and Noah begat his firſt born being 500. years old; and therefore were Shem the elder, he had then been an hundred years old at the Floud, and in the ſix hundreth year of Noah's life, and not two years after. Which ſeeing the Scriptures before remembred hath denied him, and that it is alſo written: Then Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger ſon had done unto him (to wit) Ham; of neceſſity the firſt place doth belong to Japhet. This younger ſon, ſo converted by the Vulgar and Geneva, Juni-

us turns it filius minimus, His youngest son; but St. Chrysostom takes it otherwise, and finds Cham to be the middle or second brother, and Japhet the youngest son of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father (whose nakedness he derided) was dis-inherited, and lost the pre-eminency of his birth, as Esau and Ruben did.

In Gen. Pererius conceiveth that Ham was called the younger in respect of Shem the eldest, but avoweth withal, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of younger and youngest, because it wanteth the comparative degree. It is true that Shem himself was always named in the first place; yet whereas in the first Verse of the tenth Chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Japhet, in the second Verse Moses leaveth to begin with the issue by Shem, and reciteth the children of Japhet first. So the first place was given to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this weighty respect, that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, David, and Christ our Saviour were descended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the Vulgar Pagninus, and the Geneva, who agree in this conversion, Shem Frater Japhet major; or with the Septuagint, Junius and Tremelius, Shem Fratris Japhet majoris; or with Pererius, Shem Frater Japhet ille magnus: inferring that Shem was the great and famous brother of Japhet, let the Reader judg. But for ought that I have seen to the contrary, it appeareth to me that Japhet was the eldest. For where Pererius qualifieth the strength of the former argument, That Shem's age at the time of the Floud did not agree with the eldership (with a supposition that the Scriptures took no account of smaller numbers) I do not find in the Scriptures any such neglect at all: for it is written, that

Gen. 11. v. 10. Shem was an hundred years old, and begat Arphaxad two years after the floud; and again in the 12. Verse: So Shela lived after he begat Ebar, four hundred and three years, &c. so as the number of two years, of three years, of five years, and afterward of two years, were always precisely accounted.

§. II.

Of divers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World; as that all Histories must yield to Moses: that the World was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that known great Lords of the first Ages were of the issue of Ham.

BUt let us go unto the Worlds plantation after the floud, which being rightly understood, we shall find that many Nations have supposed or feigned themselves those Ancestors and Fathers, which never saw or approched the bounds of their Countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plain in the Scriptures how the sons and issues of Noah were distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the world was also peopled. And if any prophane Author may receive allowance herein, the same must be with this caution, that they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For so far as the story of Nations is therein handled, we must know, that both the truth and antiquity of the Books of God find no companions equal, either in age or authority. All record, memory, and testimony of antiquity whatsoever, which hath come to the knowledg of men, the same hath been borrowed thence, and therefore later than it, as all careful observers of time have noted: among which, thus writeth Eusebius in the Proœme of his Chronology: Moses is found more antient than all those whom the Grecians make most antient, as Homer, Hesiod, and the Trojan War; and far before Hercules, Musæus, Linus, Chiron, Orpheus, Castor, Pollux, Æsculapius, Bacchus, Mercurius, and Apollo, and the rest of the Gods of the Nations, their Ceremonies, or holy Rites, or Prophets: and before all the deeds of Jupiter, whom the Greeks have seated in the top and highest Turret of their Divinity.

For of the three Jupiters remembred by Cicero, the antientest was the son of Æther whose three sons begotten on Proserpina, were born at Athens, of which Cecrops was the first King: and in the end of Cecrops time did Moses bring the children of Israel out of Egypt: Eduxit Moses populum Dei ex Egypto novissimo tempore Cecropis Athenienſis Regis; Moses brought the children of Israel out of Egypt in the last days of Cecrops King of the Athenians, saith S. Augustine: and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of that City it self, but Theseus long after him. But because the truth hereof is diversly proved, and by many learned Authors, I will not cut asunder the purpose in hand, by alledging many authorities in a needless question, but leave it to the proper place.

First,

Firſt, we are to conſider, that the World after the Floud was not planted by imagination, neither had the Children of Noah wings to fly from Shinaar to the uttermoſt border of Europe, Africa, and Aſia, in haſte, but that theſe Children were directed by a wiſe Father, who knew thoſe parts of the World before the Floud, to which he diſpoſed his children after it, and ſent them not as diſcoverers, or at all-adventure, but aſſigned and allotted to every Son and their iſſues, their proper parts. And not to hearken to fabulous Authours, who have no other end than to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Auguſtus in the fiction of Æneas) or elſe to glorifie their own nations; Let us build herein upon the Scriptures themſelves, and after them, upon Reaſon and Nature. Firſt therefore we muſt call to mind, and conſider, what manner of face the Earth every where had in the 130. year after the great Inundation, and by comparing thoſe fruitfulleſt Valleys with our own barren and cold ground, inform our ſelves thereby, what wonderful Deſarts, what impaſſable faſtneſs of woods, reeds, briers, and rotten graſs; what lakes and ſtanding pools, and what mariſhes, fens, & bogs, all the face of the Earth (excepting the Mountains) was peſtered withall. For, if in this our Climate (where the dead and deſtroying Winter depreſſeth all vegetative and growing Nature, for one half of the year in effect) yet in twenty or thirty years, theſe our grounds would all over-grow and be covered (according to the nature thereof) either with woods, or with other offenſive thickets and buſhments: much more did all ſorts of plants, reeds, and trees, proſper in the moſt fruitfull Valleys, and in the Climate of a long and warm Summer, and having withall, the ſtart of 130. years to raiſe themſelves without controlement.

This being conſidered, it will appear, that all theſe people which came into Shinaar, and over whom Nimrod, either by order or ſtrength, took the Dominion, did, after the confuſion of Languages, and at ſuch time as they grew to be a mighty People, diſperſe themſelves into the Regions adjoyning to the ſaid Valley of Shinaar, which contained the beſt part of Meſopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldea; and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated, ſome of them towards the South, others towards the Weſt and North. And although there were allotted to Shem many Regions, both Eaſt and Weſt from Shinaar, with the Dominion of Palæſtina, which the Canaanites firſt poſſeſt; yet could he not enjoy the Lot of his Inheritance on the ſudden, but by time and degrees. For we find that Abraham, the true ſucceſſour of Shem, dwelt in Chaldæa, at Ur; and from thence (called by God) he reſted at Charran in Meſopotamia: from whence after the death of Thare he travelled to Sichem in Paleſtina: and yet there had paſſed between Shem and Abraham (reckoning neither of themſelves) ſeven Deſcents, before Abraham moved out of Chaldæa; where, and in Babylonia, all thoſe people, by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many years, and whence Nimrod went out into Aſſyria, and founded Nineveh. Indeed, the great Maſters of Nations (as far as we can know) were in that Age in the iſſues of Ham; the bleſſing of God given by Noah to Shem and Japhet taking leſs effect, untill divers years were conſumed; and untill the time arrived, which by the wiſdom of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan, came the People and Princes, which held the great Kingdoms of Babylonia, Syria, and Egypt for many Deſcents together.

§. III.

Of the Iſles of the Gentiles in Japhets Portion: of Berosus his too ſpeedy ſeating Gomer the Son of Japhet in Italy; and another of Japhets Sons, Tubal in Spain: and of the Antiquity of Longinque Navigation.

TO begin therefore (where Moſes beginneth) with the Sons of Japheth, among whom the Iſles of the Gentiles were divided: which diviſion, as well to Japhets Sons, as to the reſt which came into Shinaar, was (if the diviſion were made at Phalegs birth) in the year of the World 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the years after the Floud one hundred and one; of which queſtion elſe-where.

The habitations proper to the Sons of Japhet were the Iſles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe, with all the Iſles adjoyning, and compaſſing it about: Europe being alſo taken for an Iſland, both in reſpect that the Sea Helleſpont and Ægeum, Boſphorus, and Euxinus cut it off from the great Continent of Aſia, as alſo becauſe Europe it ſelf is (in effect) ſurrounded with water, ſaving that it is faſtned to Aſia by the North; for it hath thoſe Seas before named to the Eaſt, the Mediterrane to the South and South-weſt, the Ocean to the Weſt, and Brittiſh, Germane, and Baltick Sea, with that of Glaciale, to the North, North-eaſt, and North-weſt. Beſides, it hath about it all the Cyclades, or Iſles lying between Greece and the leſſer Aſia; and the Iſles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Crete, or Candia, Sicilia, cilia, Corsica, Sardinia, Malta, the Isles of Brittanie, and Zeland, with their young ones adjacent.

This partition and portion of Japheth, with the part which he held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great, answereth to
Gen. 9. 27. that blessing of God by Noah. Dilatet Deus Japheth; Let God spread abroad (or increase the Posterity of) Japheth, and let him dwell in the Tents of Shem. For though Junius here useth the word alliciat, and not dilatet: and the Geneva, persuadeat; yet the Septuagint have dilatet, or amplificet; and such was the blessing given to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his seed for ever. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a blessing by God to the Posterity of Japheth: noting not onely an enlargement of Territories, but that thereby they should be made participant of Gods Church. But to come to Japhets Sons, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if we may believe Berosus and Annius, whose authority the greatest number of all our late Writers have followed) did in the tenth year of Nimrods Reign, depart from Babylonia, & planted Italy: which also Functius confirmeth in these words, Anno decimo Nimrodi, &c. In the tenth year of Funct. Chronol. Nimrods Reign, Gomerus Gallus planted a Colony in that Land afterward called Italy: and in the twelfth year of the same Nimrods Reign, Tubal seated himself in Austuria in Spain (now called Biscay) which was in the 140. and in the 142. years after the Floud, according to Berosus. But this opinion is very ridiculous: For before the confusion of Tongues, the Children of Noah did not separate themselves, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinaar. Let us therefore consider with reason, what time the building of such a City and Tower required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any ready means to perform such a work as Nimrod had erected (and as Functius himself out of his Authour Berosus witnesseth) ad altitudinem & magnitudinem Montium; To the height and magnitude of the Mountains. Sure that both this City and Tower was almost builded, the Scriptures witness: but the Lord
Gen. 6. 11. came down to see the City and Tower which the Sons of men had builded. Let us then but allot a time sufficient for the making of Brick to such a Work, of the greatest heighth (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that ever was. For where the universal Floud covered the highest Mountains fifteen Cubits; Let us build us a City and Tower (saith Nimrod) whose top may reach unto the Heaven: meaning, that they would raise their work above fifteen Cubits higher than the highest Mountain, otherwise they could not assure themselves from the fear of a second Inundation: a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the work. They also began this building upon a ground, the most oppressed with waters of all the world: as by the great ruine which these waters forcibly over-bearing and overflowing, made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest; approved also by the Prophet Jeremie, speaking of Babylon in these words: Thou that dwellest upon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantial foundation for so high a raised building on a marish ground: and to which Glycas upon Genesis giveth fourty years. For it seemeth that the Tower was near finished when God overthrew it: it being afterward written; So the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the Earth, and they left to build the City. Out of which place it may be gathered (because the Tower is not then named) that they very near had performed the work of their supposed defence, which was the Tower: and that afterward they went on with the City adjoyning, wherein they inhabited. It is also to be noted, that till such time as this confusion seized them (whereupon the Tower was thrown down) these Nations did not disperse themselves: for from thence the Lord scattered them upon all the Earth, (that was) when they perceived not one anothers speech. Now, to Gen. 11. think that this work, in the newness of the World, (wanting all instruments and materials) could be performed in ten years; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same year, could creep through 3000. miles of Desart, with Women, Children, and Cattel: Let those light believers, that neither tye themselves to the Scripture, nor to reason, approve it, for I do not. And if the Ark of Noah was 100. years in building, or but near such a time, (and then) when the World had stood 1556. years; it were more than foolishness, and madness it self, to think that such a work as this could be performed in ten; when the World (from the Floud to the arrival at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 131. years, and whereof they had spent some part in travelling from the East. Again, if all Asia set to their helping hands Pliny.
in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they consumed in that Work 400. years (or be it but half that time) and in such an Age as when the World flourished in all sorts of Artificers, and with abundant plenty of materials and carriages: This Work of the Tower of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) be erected in those thoſe few years remembred. And for concluſion, let all men of judgment weigh with themſelves how impoſſible it was for a Nation or Family of men, with their Wives, and Children, and Cattel, to travel 3000. miles through Woods, Bogs, and Deſarts, without any Guide or Conductor; and we ſhall find it rather a work of 100. years than of 100. days. For in the Weſt Indies, of which the Spaniards have the experience, in thoſe places where they found neither path nor guide, they have not entred the Countrey ten miles in ten years. And if Nimrods people ſpent many years by the account before remembred in paſſing from the Eaſt India, or the higher part thereof, which ſtandeth in 115. degrees of Longitude, untill they came into Shinaar, which lieth in 79. degrees (the diſtance between thoſe places containing 36. degrees, which makes 720. leagues, which is 2160. miles) and did all the way keep the Mountains and hard ground; then the difference between Babylon and Biſcay is much more: for the body of Biſcay lyeth in ten degrees, and Babylon, or Shinaar, (as aforeſaid) in 79. ſo the length of way from Shinaar to Auſturia, or Biſcay, is 69. degrees, which make 1380. leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod took divers years to find Shinaar, which was but 2160. miles: or (ſuppoſing that the Ark reſted in Armenia) little above 400. miles: there is no cauſe to the contrary, but to allow as many years to Gomer and Tubal to travel 3000. miles, to Countries leſs known unto them by far, than the Land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradiſe was known to Noah before the Floud: and ſo was the Region of Eden by Moſes afterward remembred; but what he underſtood of moſt part of the world elſe, it is unknown. And therefore did Annius ill adviſe himſelf to plant Gomer in Italy, and Tubal in Spain, in the tenth and twelfth of Nimrods Reign: Shall the Earth be brought forth in one day, or ſhall a Nation be born at once? But it may be objected, that the Sons of Japheth might come by Sea, and ſo ſave this great travel through Deſarts by Land. But we never read of any Navigation in thoſe days, nor long after. Surely, he that knoweth what it is to imbarque ſo great a People, as we may juſtly ſuppoſe thoſe Conductors carried with them, will not eaſily believe that there were any Veſſels in thoſe days to tranſport Armies, and (withall) their Cattel, by whoſe milk they lived, and fed their children: For milk and fruit were the banquetting diſhes of our Fore-Fathers. And in the eldeſt times, even the Kings and Fathers of Nations valued themſelves by the Herds and numbers of their Cattel: who had Flocks of Sheep, and great Droves and Herds of their own, and their own Shepherds and Herdſmen. Now, if Tubal had paſt by Sea from any part of Palæſtina, Syria, or Silicia, he might have made good choice within the Streights, and not have overgone Granado, Valentia, and other Provinces in that Tract; paſt the Streights of Gibralter; diſdained all Andaluſia and Portugal, with all thoſe goodly Ports and Countreys; and have ſought out the Iron, Woody, and barren Countrey of the World (called Biſcay) by a long and dangerous Navigation. But before the journey of the Argonautæ, there were ſcarce any Veſſels that durſt croſs the Seas in that part of the World: and yet that which Jaſon had (if the tale be true) was but a Galley, and a poor one (God knows) and perchance, ſuch as they uſe this day in Ireland: which although it carried but four and fifty paſſengers, yet it was far greater than any of the former times: Erat enim antea parvarum navicularum uſus: For in former times they uſed very ſmall veſſels. I deny not but that the Tyrians gave themſelves of old to far-off Navigations, whence Tibullus aſcribed the invention of Ships to them:

Diod. Sicul. l. 4 c. 4. fol. 115.

Tyrus knew firſt how Ships might uſe the Wind.

And for thoſe Boats called Longæ naves, or Gallies, Pliny ſaith, that Ægeſias aſcribeth the device to Paralus: and Philoſtephanus, to Jaſon: Cteſias, to Samyras; and Saphanus, to Semiramis: Archimachus, to Ægeon: to which invention the Erythræi are ſaid to have added certain numbers of Oars: and then Aminocles the Corinthian to have increaſed them: the Carthaginians afterwards to have brought them to four Banks: the Quinque Remi firſt to have been uſed by Neſichthon the Salaminian, with which Veſſels, in thoſe parts of the World, the Romans ſerved themſelves in the Punick War. But theſe be, perhaps, but the partialities of Writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as conſtantly caſt the deviſing of theſe Gallies on Seſoſtris, though Semiramis uſed them in the paſſage of her Army over Indus in Abrahams time. So it is ſaid, that Danaus was the firſt brought a Ship into Greece; and yet the Samothracians challenge the invention: and yet Tertullian (on the contrary) gives it to Minerva: others, to Neptune; Thucydides, to the Corinthians. And ſo ignorant were the people of thoſe Ages, as the Egyptians uſed to coaſt the ſhores of the Red-Sea upon raffs, deviſed by King Erythrus: and in the time of the Romans, the Britans had a kind of Boat (with which they croſt the Seas) made of ſmall twigs, and covered over with leather: of which kind I have ſeen at the Dingle in Ireland, and elſe-where. Naves ex corio circumſutæ in Oceano Britannico (ſaith Textor:) of which Lucan the Poet:

Texitur in puppim, cæſoque induta juvenco,
Vectoris patiens tumidum ſupernatat amnem.
Sic Venetus ſtagnante Pado, fuſoque Britannus

And although it cannot be denied, when Noah, by Gods inſpiration, was inſtructed in ſo many particulars concerning the Ark, that then many things concerning Navigation were firſt revealed; yet it appears that there was much difference between the Ark of Noah, and ſuch Ships as were for any long Navigation. Yea, ancient Stories ſhew, that it was long after theſe times, ere any durſt preſume upon any long voyages to Sea, at leaſt with multitudes of Women, and Children, and Cattel; as alſo common reaſon can tell us, that even now, when this Art is come to her perfection, ſuch Voyages are very troubleſome and dangerous. So as it doth appear, that there was not in that Age of Nimrod any Ship, or uſe of Ships, fit for any long navigation. For, if Gomer and Tubal had paſſed themſelves and their people by Sea; the exerciſe of Navigation would not have been dead for ſo many hundred years after. Leaving therefore the fabulous to their Fables, and all men elſe to their fancies, who have caſt Nations into Countreys far off, I know not how, I will follow herein the Relation of Moſes and the Prophets: to which Truth there is joyned both Nature, Reaſon, Policie, and Neceſſity: and to the reſt, neither probability, nor poſſibility.

§. IV.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Meſhech, ſeated firſt about Aſia the Leſs; out of Ezechiel, Chap. 38. 39.

NOw, although many learned and reverend men have formed (I know not whereby led) a Plantation of the World, which alſo hath been and is received; yet I hope I may be excuſed, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great Learned man of this latter Age, Arias Montanus, was alſo in ſome things much miſtaken: and for Joſephus. as he hath many good things, and is a Guide to many errours withall; ſo was he in the Plantation of the World very groſs and fabulous; whereby both Euſebius, Hieroſolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that have taken his teſtimonies for currant, have been by him far miſs-led. But the better to conceive what Regions of the World Gomer the Son of Japheth poſſeſt, as alſo Tubal, it is needfull to begin with Magog: becauſe the Scriptures take moſt knowledge of Gog and Magog: which two names have troubled many Commentators, ſaith Matth. Beroaldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that ever I read) I find moſt judicious in the examination of this Plantation. He takes authority from the Prophet Ezechiel chiefly, who in the 38. and 39. Chapters directeth us, what Nations the Gomerians, Tubalines, and Togormians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was Prince, or chief Conductor, in their Attempts againſt Iſrael. For beſides the portions of Europe, and the North-eaſt parts of the greater Aſia, which Japheths Iſſues poſſeſt, all Aſia the Leſs was peopled by them. And that thoſe of the Iſſue of Japheth (whom Ezechiel ſpeaks of) were ſeated hereabout, it may beſt appear, if we conſider the circumſtances of the place, and the dependency upon the former Prophecie in the 37. Chapter. For in that 37. Chapter Ezechiel propheſieth of the uniting of the two Kingdoms of Iſrael and Juda, after their delivery from Captivity. Chap. 37. v. 19.

By which Prophecie of Ezechiel, it appeareth, that God purpoſed to gather together his people, to give life to dead bones, and to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpoſe it is written; And David my Servant ſhall be King over them, and they ſhall have one Sheepherd, (that is) they ſhall be united as they were in Davids time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter, Ezechiel propheſieth againſt thoſe Nations, which ſhould ſeek to impeach this Union, and diſturb the people of Iſrael, whom God purpoſed to receive to grace, and promiſed to reſtore. And ſo in the ſame Chapter are thoſe Nations coupled together, which infeſted the Iſraelites after their return, and ſought to ſubject them: all which were the Subjects or Allies of Gog, Prince of the Magogians, or Cæloſyrians, next bordering

ing Palæstina, or the holy Land, followed also by the rest of the Nations of Asia the less, which lay North from Judæa. The
c. 38. v. 2. words of Ezechiel are these: Son of man, set thy face against Gog, and against the Land of Magog, the chief Princes of Meshech (or Mosoch) and Tubal: and afterward; Behold, I come against the chief Prince of Meshech and Tubal: and in the sixth Verse; Gomer and all his Bands, and the House of Togorma of the North quarters. Herein Ezechiel having first delivered the purpose of his Prophecie, teacheth what Nations they were that should in vanity assayl Israel. He joyneth them together under their Prince Gog, and sheweth that their habitations were on the North quarters of Juda, and how seated and joyned together. Gog signifieth in the Hebrew (saith Saint Hierom) tectum or covering of a house: and Pintus upon Ezechiel affirmeth, that by Gog is meant Antichrist: for (saith In Ezech. he) Antichristus erit Diaboli tegumentum sub specie humana: That Antichrist shall be the covering of the Devil under humane form. He addeth, that Magog is as much to say as Gog: the Letter (M) being an Hebrew Preposition, and importeth as much as of, or, from: so he taketh Magog for those people which follow Antichrist. So far Pintus; at least in this not amiss, that he expoundeth Magog not for any one person, but for a Nation: with which agreeth this observation of Beroaldus, Magog (saith he) in Hebrew is written Ham-Magog, which sheweth Magog to be a Region or Nation: for the Letter (He) which is used but for an Emphasis (which the Hebrews call Heliajedia) is never added to proper names of men, but often to place. So as Gog was Prince of that Nation (called either Magog, or, according to others, the people of Gog) also Prince of Meshech (or Mosoch) and of Tubal: as by the first Verse of the 29. Chapter is made manifest: Behold, I come against thee Gog the chief Prince of Meshech and Tubal. This must needs be meant by the Successors of Seleucus Nicanor, who did not (as other conquering Nations) seek to make the Jews their Tributaries only, but indeavoured by all means, and by all kind of violence, to extinguish the Religion it self (which the Hebrews profess'd) and the acknowledging of one true God: and to force them to worship and serve the mortal and rotten gods of the Heathen; of which nothing remained but the very name, and
l. 2. de Fide. dead Images. S. Ambrose and Isidore take Gog for the Nation of the Goths: belike, because they invaded Europe, and sacked Rome, and many other places and cities thereabout. Hermolaus Barbarus out of Pomp. Mela derives the Turks from the Scythians, esteemed Magogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a Man: others, of a Region: others, for a Nation inhabiting a Region, as Junius, who sayes that Gog is the name of a Nation, denominated from him whom the Greeks Stories call Gyges: who in former time having slain Candaules the Lydian, gave his own name to that Nation, thence after called Gygades: and thereof also the Gygean Lake; which Lake Strabo also findeth in Lydia (of Strab. lib. 13. which Gyges was King) fortie Furlongs from Sardis. Plinie calleth it Gygeum stagnum. Herodotus and Nicander set it about the Rivers of Hillus, and Mœnander; but the difference is not great. Marius Niger maketh mention of this Gyges King of Lydia: who, after he had subdued the Country about the River Rhodius which runneth into the Hellespont, called the Promontory Trapese after his own name Gyges. These Opinions do also seem to strengthen that of Junius. For Suid. Col. 107. Magog, saith he, is that part of Asia the less, which Halyattes obtained, and after him his Son Cræsus; who (as Junius further notes)
Jun. in Ezech. 38. having mastered all those Regions as farr South as Libanus, in that Border built the City Giganta, or Gogkarta (which in the Syrian signifieth the City of Gog) seated in Cœlosyria, whose People were the ancient Enemies of the Jews.

Now, that Magog is found in Cœlosyria, Pliny affirmeth, saying; Cœlosyria habet Bambycen, quæ alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur: Syris verò, Magog; Cœlosyria hath in it Bambyce, which in another name is called Hierapolis; but of the Syrians, Magog. He further telleth us, that the monstrous Idol Atergatis, called by the Greeks Derceto, was here worshipped. Lucian makes mention hereof, saying, That the City had anciently another name, which he yet expresseth not; forbearing, perhaps, the word Magog, as sounding nothing elegantly in the Greek. But if we may Strab. l. 16. believe Strabo, then was Edessa in Mesopotamia, the same Bambyce or Hierapolis, where the same Idol was worshipped. Ortelius is doubtfull whether one of these Authors did not mistake the place of this Bambyce, or Hierapolis. It may well enough be, that the same name and Religion was common to them both. Certain it is, that both of them lay due North from Palæstina, and were both subject unto the Kings of the Race of Seleucus. Now, I do not condemn the Opinion of Hermolaus Barbarus following Josephus, but grant that, perhaps, Magog might also be the Father of the Scythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made Prince of Magog, the Nations of Cœlosyria, and the North parts adjoyning be meant by Magog: for by a latter Plantation from these parts they might be propagated into Scythia. Yet it is not to be denied, that the Scythians in old times coming out of the North-east, wasted the better part of Asia the less, and possest Cœlosyria, where they built both Scythopolis and Hierapolis, which the Syrians call Magog. And that to this Magog Ezechiel had reference, it is very plain: for this City Hierapolis or Magog standeth due North from Judæa, according to the words of Ezechiel, that from the North-quarters those Nations should come. For as the Kings of the South which infested the Israelites were the Ptolemies, Kings of Egypt: so those of the North were the Kings of Asia and Syria, the Successors of Seleucus, the Successors of Alexander Macedon. Gulielmus Tyrius thinks that this Hierapolis is that Rages, mentioned in the Story of Tobias. Pliny takes it not onely to have been called Bambyce, as we have said, but also Edessa: not that by Euphrates; but another of the same name: now, the known name is Aleppo: for so Bellonius expounds this Hierapolis, or Magog. This City had the Title of Sacred, as the Sacred City, (for so the word Hierapolis signifieth) yet was it a place of most detested Idolatry, and wherein was worshipped the Idol of the Mermaid Atergates, or Atergitis, according to Pliny, which the Greeks call Derceto.

Lib. 4. cap de bello sacro.

If then we confer the words of Ezechiel in the third Verse of the thirty eight Chapter, wherein he joyneth together Gog, Meshech and Tubal; and withal remember that Hierapolis was the City of Magog, which also is seated directly North from Judæa: with whom also Ezechiel coupleth Gomer, and all his bands of the North quarters; we may (as I conceive) safely conclude, that these Followers and Vassals of Gog (which were Northern Nations in respect of Judæa) were not the Gomerians of France, nor the Tubalines of Spain, but a people of the lesser Asia, and Cœlosyria: and therefore that the opinions of Berosus, Josephus, and whosoever else hath followed them therein, are to be rejected. But if Josephus refer himself to latter times, and think that some Colonie of the Tubalines might from Iberia and Asia pass into Spain (to wit) from that piece of Land between Colchis (or Mengrelia) and Albania, (most part possessed by the Georgians) then is his judgment of better allowance. For without any repugnancy of opinions, it may be granted, that in process of time these people might from their first habitation, pass into the Countries neer the Euxine Sea, and from thence in after-Ages into Spain.

Josephus makes mention of the Iberi, saying, that they were antiently called Thobelos, as of Tubal; from whence (saith Justine) they passed into Spain to search out the mines of that Region: having belike understood that it was a Southerly Country, and Mountainous. For it seemeth that the Tubalines called Chalybes, lived altogether by the exchange of Iron, and other Metals, as Apollonius witnesseth in these following Verses, telling how the Argonautes did visit them:

Hæc gens tellurem rigido non vertit aratro,
Sed ferri venas scindit sub montibus altis:
Mercibus hæc mutat, quæ vitæ alimenta ministrant.

The Calybes plough not their barren soil,
But undermine high Hills for Iron Veins:
Changing the purchase of their endless toil
For Merchandize, which their poor lives sustains.

But it is more probable, that Spain was first peopled by the Africans, who had ever since an affection to return thither, and to re-people it anew. This appeared by the Carthaginians of old, who were easily drawn to pass over the Streights into that Countrey: and after by the Moors who held Granado, and the South parts, eight hundred years, till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel. And either of these opinions are more probable, than that in the twelfth year of Nimrods Reign, Tubal past into Spain, and therein built Saint Uval: a poor Town and a poor device, God knows. Certain it is, that we must find Moshoch or Meshech, and Tubal Neighbours, and Gomer and Togarma not farr off, or else we shall wrong Ezechiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince of Meshech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togarma their assistants. And that Meshech inhabited Asia, Functius (though he followed Berosus) confesseth, for these be his words: Mesacus, qui à Mose Mesech, priscos Mesios ab Adula monte usque ad Ponticam regionem posuit: hæc regio postea Cappadocia dicta est, in qua urbs Mazica, &c. hæc est terra Magog principalis; Mesacus, whom Moses calleth Mesech, placed the ancient Mesians from the Mount Adulas, unto the Coasts of Pontus. This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Town Mazica, &c. this is the principal Countrey of Magog. And this doth Annius also avow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Mesech and Tubal: and therefore that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous; Spain lying directly West, and not North from Judæa. Also Ezechiel in the 27. Chapter, where he prophecieth phecieth of the deſtruction of Tyre, nameth Meſech and Tubal jointly. And for a final proof, that theſe Nations were of a Northern Neighbour Land (how far ſoever ſtretched) Ezechiel in the 38. Chapter makes them all Horſmen. Thou, and much people with thee, all ſhall ride upon Horſes, even a great multitude, and a mighty. Then, if any man believe that theſe troups came out of Spain over the Pyrenes, and firſt paſſed over a part of France, Italy, Hungary, and Sarmatia, and imbarqued again about the Helleſpont, or elſe compaſſed all Pontus, and Euxinus, to come into the leſſer Aſia, which is half the length or compaſs of the then known World; he may be called a ſtrong Believer; but he ſhall never be juſtified thereby. But on the contrary, it is known that Seleucis was a Province neighbouring Palæſtina or Judæa, and that Hierapolis (or Magog) joyned unto it: whoſe Princes commanded all Syria, and Aſia the leſs, (namely; the Seleucida) and held it, til Scipio Aſiaticus overthrew Antiochus the Great: after which yet they poſſeſt Syria, till the time of Tigranes: and whether Meſhech be in Cappadocia, or under Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the ſame Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be ſaid. Firſt, he ſeated himſelf with Togarma, not farr from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward he proceeded further into Aſia the leſs; and in long tract of time his valiant Iſſue filled all Germany, reſted long in France and Brittany, and poſſeſſed the utmoſt borders of the Earth, accompliſhing (as Melanthon well notes) the ſignification of their Parents name, which is Utmoſt bordering. But when theſe borderers wanted further place, wherein they might exonerate their ſwelling multitudes that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they return upon the Nations occupying the Countreys, through which they had formerly paſſed, oppreſſing firſt their Neighbours, afterwards the people more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy Reſtorer of our Antiquities, M. William Cambden hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their old Language doth ſignifie Robbers; neceſſity inforcing them to ſpoil their Neighbours, to whom in their original, they were as near joyned, as afterwards in the ſeats which they poſſeſſed. For that the Warlike Nations of Germany were in elder Ages accuſtomed to be beaten by the Gaules, the authority of Cæſar affirming it, is proof ſufficient. But in times following, they purſued richer Conqueſts, and more eaſie, though further diſtant, by which (to omit their other enterpriſes not here to be ſpoken of) they were drawn at length into Aſia the leſs, and occupied thoſe parts, which had formerly been held by their Progenitours. I ſay not that they claimed thoſe Lands as theirs by Deſcent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their own Pedigree. Neither can any man therefore deny, that they were of old ſeated in Aſia, becauſe in late Ages they returned thither; unleſs he will think, that all thoſe Nations which from far parts have invaded and conquered the Land of Shinaar, may by that Argument be proved not to have iſſued from thence at the firſt.

Now, concerning Samothes, for his excellent wiſdom, ſirnamed Dis, whom Annius makes the Brother of Gomer and Tubal (which Brother, Moſes never heard of, who ſpake his knowledge of Japheths Sons) they muſt find him in ſome old Poet: For Functius, a great Beroſian, confeſſeth: Quis hic Samothes fuerit incertum eſt; Who this Samothes was, it is uncertain; neither is there any proof that he was that ſame Dis, whom Cæſar ſaith the Gaules ſuppoſe to be their Anceſtor; yea, and Vignier confeſſeth with Functius: Mays on ne ſcayt qui il eſtoit; No man knows who he was.

§. V.

Againſt the fabulous Beroſus his Fiction, That the Italian Janus was Noah.

But before I go on with Noah his Sons, I think it is neceſſary to diſprove the Fiction which Annius hath of Noah himſelf; an invention (indeed) very ridiculous, though warranted (as he hath wreſted) by thoſe Authors of whom himſelf hath Commented: as the Fragment of Beroſus, Fabius, Pictor, Cato, Lavinius and others. For Annius ſeeks to perſwaded us, that Noah (ſurnamed Janus) was the ſame which founded Genoa, with other Cities in Italy, wherein he lived 92. years. This to diſprove, by Moſes ſilence, is a ſufficient argument to me, if there were nothing elſe to diſprove it. For, if he vouchſafed to remember the building of Babel, Erec, Achad, Chalne and Nineve, by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great mark to be forgotten, with all the acts he did in 92. years. But it were a needleſs labour for me to diſprove the authority of that Beroſus, on whom Annius groundeth, ſeeing ſo many learned men have ſo demonſtratively proved that Fragment to be counterfeit. Beſides that, Tatianus the Aſſyrian, in his Oration againſt the Greeks, avoweth, that the ancient and true Beroſus wrote onely three Books dedicated to Antiochus the Succeſſor of Seleucus Nicanor:

Ann. de Hetruſ. Pict. de ant. ſæculo. Cato de origen. Lavin. ibi. luſt. de Gall.

Nicanor: but Annius hath deviſed five Books, wherewith he honoureth Beroſus. And whereas Beroſus handled onely the eſtate of the Chaldæans and Aſſyrians, Annius hath filled this Fragment with the buſineſs of all the World. And if we may believe Euſebius better than Annius, then all the Kings of the Latines (before Æneas) conſumed but 150. years: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Æneas arrival into Italy, there paſt 1126. (after the leaſt rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Janus (who was the firſt of their Kings) lived at once with Ruth, who married Booz in the Worlds year (as ſome reckon) 2717. after the Floud 1064. and Noah died 350. years after the Floud: and ſo there paſt between Janus of Italy, and Noah ſurnamed Janus 704 years. For Saturnus ſucceeded Janus, Picus after Saturnus, Fannus after Picus, and Latinus followed Fannus: which Latinus lived at once with Tautanes the 27. King of Aſſyria; with Pelaſgus of Peloponneſus; with Demophoon of Athens; and Sampſon Judge of Iſrael. Now, all theſe five Kings of the Latines having conſumed but one hundred and fifty years, and the laſt of them in the time of Sampſon: then reckoning upwards for one hundred and fifty years, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Janus lived.

True it is, that the Greeks had their Janus; but this was not Noah: ſo had they Ion the Son of Xuthus, the Son of Deucalion, from whom they draw the Iones, who were indeed the children of Javan, the fourth Son of Japheth. For the vulgar Tranſlation (where the Hebrew word is Javan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint, Hellas; which is the ſame. So had they Medus the Son of Medea, whom they make the Parent of the Medes, though they were deſcended of a farr more ancient Father (to wit) Madai the third Son of Japheth.

Ezech. 27. 19, 23. and ſo the place of Eſai. 66. 19. (for Javan) Hellada: and (for the plural Javanim) one.

Laſtly, we ſee by a true experience, that the Britiſh Language hath remained among us above 2000. years, and the Engliſh Speech ever ſince the invaſion of the Angles, and the ſame continuance have all Nations obſerved among themſelves, though with ſome corruption and alteration. Therefore it is ſtrange, if either Noah (by them called Janus) had left in Italy his Grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spain, that no plain reſemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Scythian, (which no time could have quite extinguiſhed) ſhould have been found in the Languages of thoſe Countreys. For which reaſons we doubt not but theſe perſonal Plantations of Janus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. In Italy, Spain, or France, are meerly fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themſelves with the Grecian Janus which commanded them, and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150. years (ſaith Euſebius) which was in the time of Latinus, the fifth King: which alſo Saint Auguſtine and Juſtine confirm: and this agreeth with reaſon, time, and poſſibility. And if this be not ſufficient to diſprove this vanity, I may out of themſelves add thus much: That whereas ſome of them make Veſta (others Camaſena) the wife of this Janus, who inſtituted the holy Fire of the Veſtal Virgins in Rome (the Latines and Romans taking from Janus all their Idolatrous and Heatheniſh Ceremonies) there is no man ſo impious, as to believe that Noah himſelf (who is ſaid by Moſes to have walked with God, to be a juſt man, and whom God of all mankind made choice of) could be either ignorant of the true and only God, or ſo wicked and ungrateful, to ſet up or deviſe any Heathen, Salvage, or Idolatrous adoration, or have inſtituted any Ceremony, contrary to that which he knew beſt pleaſing to God himſelf.

§. VI.

That Gomer alſo and his Son Togorma of the Poſterity of Japheth, were firſt ſeated about Aſia the Leſs: and that from thence they ſpred Weſtward into Europe, and Northward into Sarmatia.

TO turn now to the Sons of Noah, and the Worlds Plantation after the Floud: therein I obſerve, that as both reaſon and neceſſity taught them; ſo, when they multiplied in great numbers, and diſperſed themſelves into the next Countreys bordering to their firſt habitations, and from thence ſent forth Colonies elſewhere, it was in ſuch manner, as that they might repair to each other, and keep intelligence by River: becauſe the Land was yet Deſart, and overpreſt with Woods, Reeds, Boggs, and rotten Mariſhes. As when Nimrod ſeated in Babylonia, Chuſh took the South part of Chaldæa down the River of Gehon, by which he might paſs to and fro from Babylon to his own Plantation: thoſe alſo, which were of the Race of Shem, inhabiting at Ur, or Orchoa, near the Lakes of Chaldæa, might by the ſame River get up to Babylon, and receive ſuccour from thence. All which Tract of Land upon Gehon Southward, Moſes, in the deſcription of Paradiſe, calleth the Land of Chuſh: becauſe the Dominion and Empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Chuſhite, by whom the children of Shem (which came into that Valley and ſtayed not in the Eaſt) were for a while oppreſt, preſt, till God afterward by the ſeed of Abraham made them his own Nation and victorious. Havilah, the brother of Nimrod, and ſon of Chuſh, took both Banks of Tygris, eſpecially on the Eaſt ſide of the River: by which River his people might alſo paſs to and fro to Babel.

The Imperial ſeat of which Region of Havilah or Suſian, was antiently called Chuſian or Chuſan, afterward Suſa. Chuſh himſelf took the Banks of Gehon, and planted thoſe Countries Weſt-ward, and Southweſt-ward towards Arabia the Stony, and the Deſart, where Ptolemy placeth the City of Chuſidia, firſt Chuſia. Ptol. Aſia Tab. 4.

Seba, and Sheba, with the reſt that planted Arabia fœlix, had Tygris, to convey them into the Perſian gulf, which waſheth the banks of Arabia fœlix on the Eaſt ſide: ſo as thoſe ſons of Cuſh might take Land down the River as they pleaſed. Alſo the City of Ninive was by Nimrod founded on the ſaid River of Tygris, and from thence a Colonie paſs'd to Charran, ſtanding alſo upon a navigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Japheths ſons ſettle themſelves together, and took their ſeats in Aſia the leſs: from whence they might indifferently ſtretch themſelves Northward, and Weſtward, into the next parts of Europe, called the Iſles of the Gentiles. And it ſeemeth very agreeable to reaſon, that both Gomer, Magog, and Tubal, ſate down firſt of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Paleſtina and Phœnicia: and from thence Gomer, or his children, paſs'd on into Aſia the leſs, as thoſe of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines ſpred themſelves into Iberia: and the Magogians more Northerly into Sarmatian. The firſt Gomerians, and firſt Planters in Aſia the leſs, held the Country of the Cymmerians (witneſs Herodotus) the ſame Region which was afterward by the Gallo-Greeks called Galatia, to whom Saint Paul wrote his Epiſtle ſo intituled. This Nation of the Cymmerians (whom the invincible Scythians afterwards diſperſed, and forced from their firſt Plantations) gave names to divers places, as to the Mountains about Albania (called Cymmerini) and to the City of Cymmeris in Phrygia: alſo Boſphorus Cymmerius took appellation from this Nation, in the out-let whereof was alſo a City of that name, called Cymmerian: which Pliny ſaith (miſtaking the place) had ſometime the name of Cerberion; but Cerberion was a Town in Campania, ſo called of the unhealthful waters ſavouring of Brimſtone, which Auguſtus cauſed to be cleanſed by letting in the water of the Lake Lucrinus. Lib. 4.

The children of Tubal ranged as far as Iberia, to whom the Moſchici were Neighbours, which others write Meſhech. The Prophet Ezechiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Meſchech and Tubal. For theſe Meſchi (which Ptolemy calleth Moſchi) inhabit Syracena a Province of Armenia, directly South from the Mountains Moſchici, in the Valley between the Mountains Moſchici, and the Mountains Pariardes: out of whoſe North part ſpringeth the River Phaſis; from the Eaſt part Araxis; and from the Weſt Euphrates: and of this Meſchech are deſcended alſo the Moſcovians (ſaith Melanthon); and it may be, that in proceſs of time ſome of them inhabited thoſe Regions alſo: For Meſhech (ſaith Melanthon) ſignifieth extendens, enlarging or ſtretching forth. Togorma alſo at firſt did inhabit amongſt his Parents and Kindred: The Togormians were alſo called Giblei, a people neighbouring the Sydonians in Gabala, a Tetrarchy of Phœnicia, the ſame which Pliny calleth Gaben: from whence Solomon had his moſt excellent Maſons, which hewed ſtones for the Temple of Jeruſalem. Thence the Togormians ſtretched into the leſs Armenia, whoſe Kings were hence called Tigranes, and their Cities Tigranokartæ: of which Cities Tigranes, ſubdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one. Hieroſolymitanus hath planted the Togormians in Barbary; forgetting the prophecy of Ezechiel againſt the Tyrians: They of the houſe of Togorma, brought to thy Fairs, Horſes, and horſemen, and Mules; which could not well be driven over the whole length of the Mediterran Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by land. But Joſephus takes them for the parents of the Phrygians; which I do not deny, but they might be, in the enſuing ages: and ſo might the Tubalines be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred years after the twelfth of Nimrod's reign. The Jews conceive that the Turks came of thoſe Togormians, becauſe their Emperor is called Togor. The Chaldeans make them the Fathers of the Germanes. But Laonicus affirms, that the Turks deſcended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Muſcovia. But for theſe ſubderivations it were infinit to examine them. Only of the firſt and ſecond Plantation, and of the firſt Nations after the Floud, is the matter which I labour to diſcover; and therein to open the ignorance of ſome, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we muſt Note, that thoſe grand-children of Noah which were of a more quiet, or (perchance) of leſs underſtanding, and had not therefore the leading of Colonies ſent out, their proper habitations could could be hardly known: only reason hath taught us, that they dwelt among the rest, and were covered with the fame of others, who took on them the Conduction and Dominion over the rest.

From Madai the third son of Japheth, were the Medes. The Grecians bring them (as before) from Medus the son of Medea.

§. VII.

Of Javan the fourth son of Japheth: and of Mesech of Aram, and Meshech of Japheth.

OF Javan the fourth son of Japheth came the Iones, which were afterwards called the Greeks: and so the Latine and Greek Interpreters for Javan write Greece, as in Esay: Et mittam ex iis qui salvati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italiam, & Græciam: And I will send those that escape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italy and in Greece. The Geneva here useth the word (Tarshish) for Tarsus, a City in Cilicia, though Tarsis in many places be taken for the Sea. The Tigurine and the Geneva use the names Tubal and Javan, and not Italy and Greece: keeping the same Hebrew words. Of the Iones were the Athenians, though themselves dream that they were Aborigines, or men without Ancestors, and growing (as it were) out of the soile it self: who abounding in people, sent Colonies into Asia the less, of whom came the Iones of those parts. Others derive the Athenians from Ion the son of Xuthus, the son of Deucalion; but the antiquity of Javan marrs the fashion of that supposition, who so many years preceded Xuthus, Ion or Deucalion. Pausanias tels us that Xuthus stole out of Thessaly with all his Fathers treasure, and his Brothers portions, and arriving at Athens, he was graciously received by Erictheus, who gave him his Daughter in marriage; of whom he received two sons, Ion and Achæus, the supposed Ancestors of the Athenians: (For Attica was called Ionia, saith Plutarch in the life of Theseus;) who, when he had joyned Megara to Attica, erected a Pillar in that Isthmos or Strait, which fastneth Peloponnesus to the other part of Greece: writing on that part which looketh towards the East, these words: Hæc non sunt Peloponnesus, ast Ionia; These Countries are not Peloponnesus, but of Ionia: and on the other side which looketh towards the South, and into Peloponnesus, this: These parts are Peloponnesus, and not Ionia.

Thucyd.

Strabo out of Hecatæus affirmeth that the Iones came out of Asia into Greece, which is contrary to the former opinion: That the Iones of Greece transporting certain companies into Asia the less, the name of Iones was thereby therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof than he learned of the Greeks themselves, yet I find this conjecture of Hæcateus reasonable enough. For though it were to him unknown, yet sure I am that Asia the less had people before Greece had any: and that Javan did not flie from Babylonia into Greece, but took Asia the less in his passage; and from thence past over the neerest way, leaving his own name to some maritimate Province on that side, as he did to that part of Greece so called. But yet Strabo himself believed, that Ionia took the name from Ion the son of Xuthus; for so much he had learned from themselves: which was also the opinion of Pausanias. True it is, that the Greeks in after-times cast themselves into that part of Asia the Less, opposite unto them, which they held for divers years. And howsoever the Greeks vaunt themselves to be Fathers of Nations, and the most antient; yet all approved Historians (not their own) deride and disprove their pride and vanity therein. For this dispute of Antiquity (among prophane Writers) rested between the Scythians and the Egyptians, as Justine out of Trogus, in the War between Vexorus of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia, witnesseth: which preceded far the reign of Ninus, and was long before the name of Greece was ever heard of. And it is also manifest, that in Cecrops time the Greeks were all Salvages, without Law or Religion, living like brute Beasts in all respects: and Cecrops (saith Saint Augustine) lived together with Moses.

Lib. 18. de Civ. Dei, c. 10.

The sixth son of Japheth was Meshech, whom the Septuagint call Mosech (a part of those Nations commanded by Gog the chief Prince of Meshech and Tubal.) But this we must remember, that between Mesech the son of Aram, and Meshech (or Mosech) the son of Japheth, there is little difference in name, and both by divers Interpreters diversly written. Montanus, with the Vulgar, writeth Mesech, the son of Aram, Mes; the Geneva, Mash; Junius, Mesch. But it may be gathered out of the 120. Psalm, that either Meshech the son of Japheth, was the parent of those people, or gave the name to that Province wherein David hid himself: or else (which may rather seem) that it took name from Mesch the son of Aram. For David bewayling his exile (while he lived among a barbarous and irreligious People) useth these words: Wo is me that I remain in Mesech, and dwell in the Tents of Kedar: which Junius converteth thus; Hei mihi quia peregrinor tam tam diu: habito tanquam Scenitæ Kedareni: The Septuagint gives it this ſence: Wo is me Pſal. 120. v. 5. becauſe my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the Inhabitants of Kedar: with which this of the Latine agreeth; Heu mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus eſt, habitavi cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldean otherwiſe, and in theſe words: O me miſerum, quia peregrinatus ſum Aſianis, habitavi cum taburnaculis Arabum; O wretch, that I am, for I have travailed among thoſe of Aſia: I have dwelt in the Tabernacles of the Arabians. But howſoever or which ſoever converſion be taken for the beſt, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Province of Arabia Petræa; and the Chaldean putteth Aſia in ſtead of Meſech, but the Hebrew it ſelf hath Meſech. And if it be to be taken for a Nation, (as it is moſt likely, becauſe it anſwers to Kedar, the name of a Nation) ſeeing Meſch the ſon of Aram, 1 Chron. 17. is called Meſhech, it is indifferent whether this Nation took name from Meſhech or Meſch both bordering Judæa, and like enough to be commanded by one Prince; for ſo Ezechiel makes Meſech and Tubal. But as for thoſe that take Meſech out of the word Moſoch (given by the Septuagint) to be the Muſcovian: ſure they preſume much upon the affinity of names, as aforeſaid. Sure I am that David never travelled ſo far North (for to him Muſcovia was utterly unknown) but about the border of Kedar (it may be) he was often in all the time of his perſecution: the ſame being a City on the Mountains of Sanir or Galaad. And yet Arias Montanus makes Moſoch the Father of the Muſcovians: and herein alſo Melanchton runs with the tide of common opinion, and ſets Meſech in Muſcovia, though with ſome better advice of judgment; as, firſt ſeated in Cappadocia, and from thence travailing Northward: expounding the places of the 120. Pſalm, (Hei mihi quòd exulo in Meſech) to ſignifie, Gentis ejus feritatem inſignem eſſe; That the ferity of that Nation exceeded: which fierceneſs or brutality of the Muſcovians, David never proved, or (perchance) never heard of. But the ſame ferity or cruelty which thoſe Northern Muſcovians had, may aſwell be aſcribed to the Arabians and Kedarens. For this Country Gen. 25. 13. took name of Kedar the ſecond ſon of Iſmael, of whom a people of equal fierceneſs to any of the world were begotten, both in thoſe times and long after, even to this day (if the Arabians, Iſmaelites, and Saracens, may be accounted one people:) the ſame being foreſhewed by the ſpeech of the Angel to Hagar, Gen. 16. v. 12. And he ſhall be a wilde man: his hand ſhall be againſt every man, and every mans hand againſt him. Now Arabia the Deſart (ſaith Pliny) confronteth the Arabians Cochlei on the Eaſt, and the Cedræi Southward, both which joyn together upon the Nabathæi. So it appeareth (as before) that Meſech, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma, and Magog, neighboured Canaan and Iſrael, and that Kedar alſo did joyn to Meſech: all which were Regions of Syria, or of Aſia the Leſs, commanded by the ſucceſſors of Seleucus, enemies of the re-eſtabliſhment of Iſrael and Juda. But (as I have already ſaid) it might well be, that long after the firſt Plantation the iſſue of Meſech (or Moſoch) might paſs into Cappadocia, and thence into Hyrcania, and give names both to Mazega in the one, and to the Mountains Moſchici in the other, and from thence might ſend people more Northerly into Muſcovia, and ſo all opinions ſaved. But all ſalvage Nations over-grown and uncultivated, do (for the moſt part) ſhew a late Plantation, even as civility, letters, and magnificent building, witneſs antiquity.

Tyras, the ſeventh ſon of Japheth, which Montanus reckons among the ſons of Gomer, was the Father of the Thracians, as all Authors (worthy the examination) affirm. Joſephus was the firſt that determined hereof: and becauſe the Scriptures are altogether ſilent, what part of the World Tyras peopled, the conjectures are indifferent, and give no ground at all of diſpute. It followeth now to ſpeak of the Sons of Gomer, which were three, Mont. in Chr.

Aſcanez, Riphath, and Togorma.

§. VIII.

Of Aſcanez and Riphath, the two elder Sons of Gomer.

Aſcanez was the Father of thoſe which the Greeks call Regini, (ſaith Joſephus) but he gives no reaſon why.

Euſebius makes Aſcanez the Father of the Goths. The Jews in their Thargum make him the root of the Germane Nation; but their expoſitions are commonly very idle. Pliny findeth Aſcania in Phrygia, neer the Rivers of Hilas and Cios: Melanchton being of the ſame opinion, that the Tuiſcones were deſcended of the Aſcanez: (for Tuiſcones, ſaith he, is as much to ſay, as of the Aſcanez, præpoſito articulo die Aſcanes) and that the word ſignifieth, a Religious Keeper of fire: it being an antient ſuperſtition to pray at the fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the Tombs of Martyrs. Not far from Phrygia was the Lake Aſcania, known by that name in the Romans time. And among the Kings which came to Melanch. in Cor. lib. 1.

Hom. Iliad. 2. the ſuccour of Troy, was Aſcanius (Deo ſimilis, ſaith Homer) like unto God: becauſe he was beautifull and ſtrong: for in the ſame manner doth Virgil grace Æneas, Os humeroſque Deo ſimilis; In face and body like one of the gods: Virgil alſo remembreth ſuch a River, together with the Hills Gargara: as, Illas ducit amor trans Gargara, tranſque ſonantem Aſcanium; Appetite leads them both over the mountains Gargara, and the roaring Aſcanius. Virg. Geor. l. 3. But this Pliny maketh more plain in the deſcription of Phrygia. For he placeth the City of Brillion upon the River Aſcanius, which is adjoyning to Myſia, and is near the border of the Trojan Empire: and the Lake Aſcanez he directs us to find by the deſcription of Pruſia, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lyeth farr within the Countries of Bithynia: and then from Pruſia to Nicea are accounted 25. miles, in which way this Lake lieth, even between Pruſia and Nicea. And ſo Junius (as I conceive him) takes them of Aſcanez, to be the Inhabitants of Pontus and Bithynia, and thoſe North parts of Aſia. Stephanus de Urbibus makes it a City of Troas, built by Aſcanius the Son of Æneas: ſaying, that there was another of that name in Myſia. Of Aſcania a Lake of Bithynia, Ptolemy witneſſeth: and Strabo giveth Aſcania both a Lake, a River, and a Town in Myſia, near unto Cio; which alſo agreeth with Pliny. For Pliny findeth Pruſia (before ſpoken of) near Cio, and calleth the Iſlands before Troy, Aſcanes.

Now, whether theſe places took name of Aſcanez the Son of Gomer, or of Aſcanius the Son of Æneas, it might be queſtioned: ſure it is, that Aſcanius which brought ſuccour to the Trojans, could not take his name from Æneas Son, who was then either exceeding young, or rather unborn: and it ſeemeth that the Countreys whence thoſe ſuccours came, were not out of any part of Phrygia, or Myſia, but farther off, and from the North parts of all Aſia the leſs, which by Hieremy is called Aſcanez, by the figure Synechdoche, as Junius thinketh. Out of thoſe teſtimonies therefore which deceive not, we may confidently determine. For of the Prophet Hieremy we ſhall learn of what Nation the Aſcanez were, whoſe words are theſe: Cap. 51. v. 27. Set up a Standard in the Land, blow the Trumpet among the Nations againſt her, call up the Kings of Ararat, Minni, and Aſcanez, againſt her, &c. meaning, againſt the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as moſt Interpreters conſent, ſo called of the Mountains of Ararat which run through it: Minni, the leſſer Armenia; Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name (ſaith Junius and others before him:) and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which contained all that Tract from Euphrates to the Sea-coaſts of Phœnicia, and Palæſtina; and therefore Meſopotamia being in elder times but a Province of Syria, the Scriptures difference it in the Story of Jacob and Eſau, and call it Aram-Padan. Then if theſe two Nations were of the Armenians, and Aſcanez joyned with them (who altogether united under Cyrus and Darius, came to the ſpoil of the Babylonian Empire) we ſhall erre much to call Askenez Germany, or Almain: for we hear of no ſwart Ruttiers at that ſiege. But the Askenez were of thoſe Nations which were either ſubject or allied to the Medes: of which if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the diſperſion of Nations was in after-times without acount. But for the opinion of Euſebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Joſephus, who calls them Rhegini; or of the Jews, who will have them to be Almains; when they confirm it either by Scriptures or Reaſon, I will think as they do.

Of Riphath, the ſecond Son of Gomer, there is mention in the firſt of Chronicles. Beroaldus and Pererius think that he wandered farr off from the reſt of his Brothers, and therefore no memory of his Plantation. But I ſee nothing to the contrary, but that he might ſeat himſelf with the reſt of his Family: for there wanted no room or ſoil in thoſe days for all the Sons and Grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to be well underſtood, that the Riphei were of Riphath, which the Greeks afterward s (according to Joſephus) called the Paphlagones: and Riphei (ſaith Melanchthon) ſignifieth Giants. Theſe people were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the moſt of number and power among them, Sarmatarũ gens maxima Heneti, The greateſt number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti; who ſpake the ancient Polac: which being firſt called Riphei (for the love of ſome of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names, and became Heneti (a cuſtom exceeding common in thoſe times) and dwelt firſt in Paphlagonia, as Homer witneſſeth, and ſo doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: Now, when theſe Riphei (afterward Heneti) ſought new Regions, they came along the ſhores of Euxinus, and filled the North-part of Europe, containing Ruſſia, Lituania, and Polonia. From thence thy croſt thwart the Land, and peopled Illyria, deſirous (ſaith Melanchthon) of a warmer ſoil of Fruit and Wine. Theſe Heneti, or Veneti, whom Melanchthon taketh to be one people, filled all the Land between the Baltick and Adriatick Melanch. in Carion.

Adriatick Sea; and to this day the name of the Gulf Venedicus is found in Russia. This Nation, after they were possest of Lituania and Polonia, disturbed the Plantation of the Boii and Hermondurii. Therefore it seemeth to me, that of Riphath, came the Riphei, afterward Heneti; and so thinketh Arias Montanus, first seated in Paphlagonia, but in course of time, Lords of Sarmatia, and those other parts before remembred, chiefly between the Rivers of Vistula and Albis. The name (saith Melanchthon) signifieth wandering, or wanderers, or Nomades: a people which lived by White-meats and Fruits, as (indeed) all Nations did in the first Ages.

Of the third Son of Gomer, Togorma, I have spoken already; now therefore of Javans children, which were four:

Elisa, Tharsis, Cethim, Dodonim.

Of the four Sons of Javan: and of the double signification of Tharsis, either for a proper Name, or for the Sea.

OF Elisa, or Elipha, came the Æoles: and of this Elisa, all the Greeks were called Hellenes, saith Montanus. Melanchthon makes Elisa the Father of the Æoles in Asia side: others of Elis in Peloponnesus; or of both. And seeing the Greeks were descended in general of Javan, it is probable that Æoles and the Elei, took name of Elisa his eldest Son. Ezechiel in the 27. Chap. speaking of Tyre, nameth the Isles of Elisa, Hyacinthus & purpura de insulis Elisæ facta sunt operimentum tuum: Blue Silk and purple, brought from the Isles of Elisa, was their covering. The Chaldæans for Elisa, write Italia: but the Vulgar, the Tigurine, the Geneva, and Junius, keep the word Elisa: and so I think they might do with reason. For there was not found any such Purple-Die in Italy in those days, nor since, that I can read of: but those Isles of Elisa, were by a better conjecture the Isles of Greece; and the best Purple was found afterward at Tyre it self: and before that, among the Cyclades, and on the Coast of Getulia. Vers. 7.

Tharsis the second Son of Javan, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharsis is the Metropolis. Montanus, for Tharsis in Cilicia, understands Carthage in Africa; but (reserving the respect due to so learned a man) he was much mistaken in that conjecture. The Chaldæan Paraphrast puts Carthage for Tharsis, but it hath no authority nor warrant of reason therein. So likewise, where it is written, that the Ships of Solomon went every three years to Tharsis, and brought thence Gold, Silver, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldæan Paraphrast translates Tharsis (Africa.) But Solomons Ships were prepared in the Red-Sea at Esion-Gaber, in the Bay of Elana, near unto Madian, where Jethro (Moses Father-in-law) inhabited; a Province of Arabia Petrea, Idumæa, or of the Chusites; and they sailed to the higher part of the East-India. For it had been a strange Navigation to have spent three years in the passage between Judæa and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might have been sailed in six or ten days. And if so great riches might have been found within the bounds of the Mediterrane Sea, all the other neighbouring Princes would soon have entertained that Trade also. But this enterprise of Solomon is in this sort written of, in the first of Kings: Also King Solomon made a Navie of Ships in Esion-Gaber, which is beside Elath, and the brink of the Red-Sea in the Land of Edom: and Hyram sent with the Navie his servants, that were Mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the servants of Solomon: and they came to Ophir, and fet from thence 420. Talents of gold, &c. But as the Nations about Pontus thought no Sea in the World like unto their own, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that onely (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word used for the Sea in general) so, because the Israelites and the Phœnicians knew no other Sea than that of the Mediterrane in the beginning; and that the people of Tharsis had the greatest Ships, and were the first Navigators in those parts with such Vessels, they were therefore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharsis used often for the Sea. And whereas it is said that the Ships of Solomon went every three years to Tharsis, that phrase is not strange at all; for we use it ordinarily wheresoever we navigate, (namely) that the Kings Ships are gone to the Sea, or that they are set out every year, or every three years to the Sea, and therefore Tharsis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but used for the Sea it self. But in this place, Tharsis is truly taken for Tharsis, the chief City in Cilicia, founded by Tharsis the second Son of Javan, or by his Successors in memory of their first Parent. To this City arrived Alexander Macedon, before he gave the first overthrow to Darius, and casting himself into the River to bathe and wash his body, he fell into an extreme Fever, and great danger of death: and in this City of Tharsis was S. Paul born. Now, this agreeth with the reason and nature of a Plantation. For (Gomer and his other Sons inhabiting Asia the less, and that part of Syria adjoyning) Javan, who was to pass over the Sea into Greece, took the edge of the same Coast, and first planted the Iones on that shore: gave the Islands betwen Asia the less and Greece to Elisa, and left Tharsis upon the Sea-side in Cilicia; of whom that City took name.

The third Son of Javan was Cethim, of whom were the Romans and Italians, saith Beroaldus, but I allow better of Melanchons opinion, who makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plural (saith he) and signifies percussores, though in that respect it may be meant by either. But it seemeth more probable, that the place of Isai. 23. (according to Melanchon) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians: Hae calamitas ab Esai prædicta est, qui capite vicesimo tertio inquit, venturos esse everssores Tyri ex terra Cittim; This calamity (saith Melanchon) was foreshewed by Esai the Prophet, who in the three and twentieth Chapter pronounced, that the destroyers of Tyre were come out of Cittim. And although the children of Israel esteemed all men Islanders, which came to them by Sea, and separate from the Continent (and so also Cittim might be taken for Italy, saith Beoraldus) yet we must take the first performance of the former Prophecie which took effect by the destruction of the Tyrians by Alexander, who, after seven Moneths siege, entred that proud City, and cut in pieces seven thousand principal Citizens; strangled two thousand, and changed the freedom of thirteen thousand others into bondage and slavery. Now, that Macedon was taken for Cethim, it doth appear plainly in the first of the Macchabees, in these words: After that Alexander the Macedonian, the Son of Philip, went forth of the Land of Cethim, and slew Darius King of the Persians, and Medes. Josephus sets Cethim in the Isle of Cyprus, in which (saith he) there remaineth the City Citium, the Country of Zeno the Philosopher (witnes Laertius;) which City Pintus upon Ezechiel affirmeth, that it stood in S. Hieroms time. So it may be that all the Islands in ancient times by the Hebrews were called the Islands of Cethim; and in that sence might Cyprus be so called also; and yet, because Tharsis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly over against it, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharsis: and finding that Island too straight for his people, after they were increased, and that the rest of the Coasts, both in Asia and Greece, were inhabited by his Father and brothers, he sent Colonies over the Ægean Sea, and inhabited Macedonia.

Dodonim the fourth Son of Javan, and the youngest brother (by the most opinions) sate down at Rhodes, as near Cethim, Tharsis, and Elisa, as he could. For Dodonim and Rhodanim are used indifferently by many Translators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are so alike, as the one may easily be taken for the other, as all Hebricians affirm. There is also found in Epirus the City of Dodona, in the Province of Molossia. And as Cethim, when he wanted soil in Cyprus: so Dodonim (seated in a farr less Island) did of necessity send his people farther off; and keeping alongst the Coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Elisa, he passed a little further on the Westward, and planted in Epyrus. And though the City of Dodona was not then built (or perchance not so ancient as Dodonim himself) yet his posterity might give it that name in the memory of their first Parent, as it happened all the World over. For names were given to Cities, Mountains, Rivers, and Provinces, after the names of Noahs children, and grand-children; not in all places by themselves, but by their successors many years after: every of their Families being desirous to retain among them, by those memories, out of what branch themselves were taken and grafted else-where. And because great Kingdoms were often by new Conquerers newly named, and the greatest Cities often fired and demolished, therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gave their own names, or the names of their Ancestors, to Mountains and Rivers, as to things (after their judgments) freest from any alteration.

Thus then did Javan settle himself and his children in the edge and frontier of Asia the less, towards the Sea-shore: and afterward in Greece, and the Islands and neighbour Provinces thereof, as Japheth their Father had done in the body of the lesser Asia, together with Javans brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Mesech, and the rest, round about him. And in like sort did Chush (the Son of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldæa, and the borders thereof towards the West and South-west: and the Sons of Chush (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it self) travelled Southward in Arabia fœlix, and South-westward into Arabia Petræa: the rest of his children holding the Regions adjoyning to Nimrod. Mizraim the brother of Chush in like manner took the way of Egypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Palestina adjoyning. The Sons of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations came, which were afterward the Enemies both to the Hebrews, and to those of the Sons of Shem, which spread themselves towards wards the West, and the borders of the Mediterrane Sea: of which I shall speak hereafter. But first of the Sons of Cham or Ham; which were four:

Chush, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan.

§. X.

That the seat of Chush the eldest Son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Æthiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill Translations of Scriptures, grounded on the mistaking of this point.

¶. I.

Of Josephus his Tale of an Æthiopess, Wife of Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seat of Chush.

THat Ham was the Father of the Egyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Psalm, vers. 51. Then Israel came to Egypt, and Jacob was a stranger in the Land of Ham: and in the 78. Psalm, He slew all the first-born in Egypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of Ham. There is also found a great City in Thebaidai, called Cheramis (as it were the City of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discovers an Island in the same Region. But because Chush is the elder Son of Ham, it agreeth with order to speak first of him. Now, though I have already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proved that Chush could not be Æthiopia: yet seeing it cometh now to his turn to speak for himself, I will add some farther proof to the former. For, the manifestation hereof sets many things streight, which had otherwise very crooked constructions, and senceless interpretations. Surely, howsoever the Septuagint and Josephus have herein failed, that Chush could not be Æthiopia, but Arabia (to wit) both that Arabia called Petræa, and a part of Arabia the Happy and the Desart: which Regions Chush and the Chusites presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first sate down altogether. And there is nothing which so well cleareth the Controversie, as the true interpretation of the place, Num. 12. vers. 1. where Moses his Wife is called a Chusite; together with some places which speak of Nebuchodonozor's Conquests. For whereas Josephus and the Septuagint in the place Numb. 12. vers. 1. as also else-where, understand Chush for Æthiopia, we must give credit to Moses himself herein; and then it will appear that Josephus was grosly mistaken, or vainly led by his own invention. For Josephus, presuming that Chush was Æthiopia, and therefore that the Wife of Moses (which in Scripture, Numb. 12. vers. 1. is called a Woman of Chush) was a Woman of the Land of Æthiopia, feigneth that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Æthiopia, fell in love with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Saba her Fathers City; and to the end, to obtain Moses for her Husband, she practised to betray both her Parents, Countrey, and Friends, with the City it self, and to deliver it into Moses hands: The Tale (if it be worth the reciting) lieth thus in Josephus. And after he hath described the strength of the Æthiopian City Meroe, which he saith at length Chambyses called so from the name of his Sister (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words: Hic cum Moses residere exercitum otiosum ægrè ferret, hoste non audente manus conserere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Æthiopum Regis filia nomine Tharbis, &c. which Tale hath this sence in English: When Moses was grieved that his Army lay idle, because the Enemy besieged durst not sally and come to handy-strokes, there happened this accident in the mean while: The Æthiopian King had a Daughter called Tharbis, who at some assaults given, beheld the person of Moses, and withall admired his valour. And knowing that Moses had not onely up-held and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Æthiopians to the very brink of subversion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her own affection, which daily increased, she made means to send unto him by one of her trustiest servants, to offer her self unto him, and become his Wife; which Moses on this condition entertained, that she should first deliver the City into his possession; whereupon she condescending, and Moses having taken oath to perform this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

¶. II.

A Dispute against the Tale of Josephus.

THis Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Josephus fashioned, and therein also utterly mistaken himself, in naming a City of Arabia for a City of Æthiopia, as he names Æthiopia it self to have been the Countrey of Moses his Wife, when (indeed) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Æthiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and modern, teach us, saying, that the Sabæans are Arabians, and not Æthiopians; except Josephus can can perſwade us, that the Queen of Saba, which came from the South to hear the Wiſdom of Solomon, were a Negro, or Black-Moor. And though Damianus à Goes ſpeak of certain Letters to the King of Portugal from Preſter John, of the Abiſſines: wherein that Æthiopian King would perſwade the Portugals, that he was deſcended of the Queen of Saba, and of Solomon; yet it doth no where appear in the Scriptures, that Solomon had any Son by that great Princeſs: which had it been true, it is likely that when Siſhac King of Egypt invaded Roboam, and ſackt Hieruſalem, his Brother (the Son of Saba and Solomon) who joyned upon Egypt, would both have impeached that enterprize, as alſo given aid and ſuccour to Roboam againſt Jeroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelve Tribes to his own obedience. Neither is it any thing againſt our Opinion of Moſes his Wife, to have been an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach us, that Moſes married the Daughter of Jethro, Prieſt of Midian or Madian: which ſtanding on the North-coaſt of the Red-Sea, over againſt the body of Egypt, and near Eſion-Gaber, where Solomon provided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red-Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Idumæa joyneth to the Tribe of Juda by the North; to Arabia Petræa, by the Eaſt; to the Mediterrane, by the Weſt; and to the Red-Sea, by the South-eaſt. And if we mark the way which Moſes took when he left Egypt, and conducted Iſrael thence, it will appear that he was no ſtranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it ſelf, he had formerly lived fourty years; where it ſeemeth, that beſides his carefull bringing up in Egypt, he was inſtructed by Jethro in the Egyptians learning. For Joſephus confeſſeth, and S. Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the Wiſdom of the Egyptians. But on the other ſide, this Text makes much againſt Joſephus, where it is written in Exodus the ſecond, Therefore Moſes fled from Pharaoh, and dwelt in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Æthiopia. And in the third Chapter, it is as plain as words can expreſs, in what Region Madian was, where it is written, When Moſes kept the Sheep of Jethro his Father-in-law, Prieſt of Madian, and drave the Flock to the Deſart, and came to the mountain of God in Horeb. Now, that Mount Horeb is not in Æthiopia, every infant knoweth. And if we may believe Moſes himſelf, then was not the Wife of Moſes purchaſed in that manner which Joſephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Countrey and friends) neither had ſhe the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was ſhe a Negro, but a Madianiteſs. And as God worketh the greateſt things by the ſimpleſt means: ſo it pleaſed him from a Shepherd to call Moſes, and after him David, and by them to deliver his People firſt and laſt. For Moſes ſitting by a Well (as diſconſolate, and a ſtranger) defended the Daughters of Reguel from the other Shepherds, and drew them Water to water their Sheep: upon which occaſion (by God ordained) he was entertained by Jethro, whoſe Daughter he married, and not for any betraying of Towns or Countreys.

Exod. 2.

From hence alſo came Jethro to Moſes at Rephidim, not far from Idumæa, and finding the inſupportable government of ſuch a multitude, he adviſed him to diſtribute this weighty charge, and to make Governours and Judges of every Tribe and Family. And if Jethro had been an Æthiopian, it had been a farr progreſs for him to have paſſed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moſes, and to have found Moſes in the border of Idumæa: the Ægyptians hating Moſes, and all that favoured him. But the paſſing of Moſes through Arabia Petræa (which joyneth to Madian) proveth that Moſes was well acquainted in thoſe parts, in which the ſecond time he wandered fourty years, and did by theſe late travels of his, ſeek to inſtruct the Children of Iſrael in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plenty and reſt. For he found them nouriſhed up with the milk of Idolatry, and obſtinate in the Religion of the Heathen, and finding that thoſe ſtiff Plants could not be bowed or declined, either by perſwaſion or by miracle, he ware them out in the Deſarts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from thoſe he might receive fruit, agreeable to his own deſire, and Gods Commandments.

Exod. 3. 10.

Laſtly, this Opinion of Joſephus is condemned by Auguſtinus Chryſamenſis, where alſo he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who avowed that Moſes had married both Tharbis and Sephora: His own words have this beginning: Mentitur etiam Apollinaris duas uxores habuiſſe Moſen, &c. Apollinaris alſo lyeth, in affirming that Moſes had two Wives: and who doth not perceive theſe things feigned by them? for it is manifeſt, that the Wife of Moſes was Zephora, Daughter to the Prieſt or Preſident of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Æthiopia beyond Egypt; being the ſame that joyneth to Arabia: So farr Chryſamenſis.

§. III.

Chuſh ill expounded for Æthiopia, Ezechiel 29. 10.

NOw, as Chuſh is by the Septuagint converted Æthiopia, and the Wife of Moſes therefore called Æthiopiſſa: ſo in the conqueſt of Nebuchodonoſor is Æthiopia written for Arabia. For by the words of Ezechiel, it is manifeſt that Nebuchodonoſor was never in Æthiopia. Behold (ſaith Ezechiel, ſpeaking of the perſon of this great Aſſyrian) I come upon thee and upon thy Rivers, and I will make the Land of Egypt utterly waſte and deſolate, from the Tower of Seveneh, even to the borders of the Black-Moors: which laſt words ſhould have been thus converted: From the Tower Seveneh, to the borders of the Chuſites, or Arabians, between which two is ſituated all Egypt. For to ſay, from the borders of Seveneh to the Æthiopians, hath no ſence at all, Seveneh it ſelf being the border of Egypt, confronting and joyning to Æthiopia, or the Land of the Black-Moors. So as if Nebuchodonoſors conqueſt had been but between Seveneh and the border of Æthiopia, it were as much to ſay, and did expreſs no other victory than the conqueſt of all that Land and Countrey, lying between Middleſex and Buckingham, where both the Countries joyn together; or all the North parts of England between Barwick and Scotland: for this hath the ſame ſence with the former, if any man ſought to expreſs by theſe two bounds, the Conqueſt of England: Barwick being the North border of England, as Seveneh or Syena is the South bound of Egypt, ſeated in Thebaida, which toucheth Æthiopia. But by the words of Ezechiel it appeareth, that Nebuchodonoſor never entred into any part of Æthiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneva, and all other (in effect) have written Æthiopia for Chuſh.

§. IV.

Another place of Ezechiel, Chap. 30. Verſ. 9. in the like manner miſtaken.

AND as the former, ſo is this place of Ezechiel miſtaken, by being in this ſort converted: In die illa egredientur nuncii à facie mea in trieribus ad conterendam Æthiopiæ confidentiam: Which place is thus turned in Engliſh by the Geneveans: In that day ſhall their meſſengers go forth from me in ſhips to make the careleſs Moors afraid. Now, the Latine for (ſhips) hath the Greek word Trieres for Triremes, which are Gallies of three banks, and not ſhips. But that in this place the Tranſlation ſhould have been (as in the former) amended by uſing the word Chuſh, or Arabia, for Æthiopia, or the Black-Moors, every man may ſee which meanly underſtandeth the Geography of the World, knowing, that to paſs out of Egypt into Æthiopia, there need no Gallies or Ships, no more than to paſs out of Northampton into Leiceſterſhire: Æthiopia being the conterminate Region with Egypt, and not divided ſo much as by a River. Therefore in this place of Ezechiel it was meant, that from Egypt Nebuchodonoſor ſhould ſend Gallies alongſt the Coaſt of the Red-Sea, by which an Army might be tranſported into Arabia the Happy and the Stony (ſparing the long wearíſom march over all Egypt, and the Deſart of Pharan) which Army might thereby ſurpriſe them unawares in their ſecurity and confidence. For when Nebuchodonoſor was at Seveneh within a mile of Æthiopia, he needed neither Gally nor Ship to paſs into it; being all one large and firm Land with Egypt, and no otherwiſe parted from it, than one In-land ſhire is parted from another: and if he had a fancy to have rowed up the River but for pleaſure, he could not have done it; for the fall of Nilus (tumbling over high and ſteepy Mountains) called Catadupæ Nili, were at hand.

Laſtly, I have already obſerved, the Sons of every Father ſeated themſelves as near together as poſſibly they could; Gomer and his Sons in Aſia the leſs; Javan and his Sons in Greece, and the Iſlands adjoyning; Shem in Perſia and Eaſtward. So the ſons and grandchildren of Chuſh from the River of Gehon (their Fathers firſt ſeat) inhabited upon the ſame, or upon ſome other contiguate unto it, as Nimrod and Havilah on the one ſide, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtecha (with the reſt) did on the other ſide. And to conclude, in a word, the Hebrews had never acquaintance or fellowſhip, any war, treaty of peace, or other intelligence with the Æthiopian Black-Moors, as is already remembred in the Chapter of Paradiſe.

§. V.

A place, Eſay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted, by taking Chuſh for Æthiopia.

AND as in theſe places before remembred, ſo in divers others is the word Æthiopia put for Arabia, or Chuſh, which puts the Story (where it is ſo underſtood) quite out of ſquare; one Kingdom thereby being taken for another. For what ſence hath this part of Scripture, Iſai. 18. Væ terræ Cymbalorum alarum rum quæ est trans flumina Æthiopiæ; or, according to the Septuagint, in these words: Væ terræ navium alarum quæ est trans fluvios Æthiopiæ; Wo to the Land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia, sending Embassadors by Sea, even the Vessels of Reeds upon the waters. Væ terræ umbrosæ oræ; Wo to the Land of the shady coast, saith Junius, The former Translators understand it in this sence; That the waters are shadowed with the sails, which are significatively called the wings of the ships; the other, that the coast of the Sea was shadowed by the height of the Land.

But to the purpose: That this Land here spoken of by the Prophet Isaiah, is Egypt, no Interpreter hath doubted. For they were the Egyptians that sent this Message to the Israelites, which Isaiah repeateth, and by the former Translation, every man may see the transposition of Kingdoms: for hereby Egypt is transported unto the other side of Æthiopia, and Æthiopia set next unto Judæa; when it is the Land of Chush and Arabia indeed that lieth between Judæa and Egypt, and not Æthiopia, which is seated under the Equinoctial Line. And of this, Beroaldus asketh a material question (to wit) what Region that should be, of which the Prophet speaketh, and placeth it beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia? Nam de ignota agi regione dici nequit; For it cannot be said that he treateth of an unknown Region. Now, if Æthiopia it self be under the Equinoctial line, with whom the Jews had never any acquaintance, why should any man dream that they had knowledg of Nations far beyond it again, and beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia? except we shall impiously think that the Prophet spake he knew not what, or used an impertinent discourse of those Nations, which were not discovered in 2000. years after, inhabiting as far South as the Cape of Good Hope, commonly known by the name of Bona esperanza.

§. VI.

That upon the like mistaking, both Terrhaca in the Story of Senacherib, and Zera in the Story of Asa, are unadvisedly made Æthiopians.

AND by this Translation is the Story of Senacherib utterly mistaken in the cause of his retrait. For Senacherib was first repulsed at Pelusium, at the very entrance of Egypt from Judæa: when having certain knowledge that Thirrhaca (which all the Intepreters called King of Æthiopia) was on the way to set on him, he began to withdraw himself: and fearing to leave his Army in two parts, he sent threatning Messengers to Ezechia King of Juda, perswading him to submit himself: the Tenor whereof is set down in the second of Kings in these words: Have any of the gods of the Nations delivered his Land out of the hands of the King of Ashur? Where is the god of Hamah, &c. By which proud Embassage, if he had obtained entrance into Jerusalem, he then meant to have united that great Army before Jerusalem, commanded by Rabshekeh, with the other which lay before Pelusium, a great City upon the branch of Nilus next Arabia. For Senacherib had already mastered the most part of all those Cities in Judæa and Benjamin, with a third Army (which himself commanded) being then at the siege of Lebna. But upon the rumor of that Arabian Army led by the King Thirrhakeh (whom Josephus calls Tharsices) Rabsakeh hasted from the siege of Hierusalem, and found Senacherib departed from Lachis, and set down before Lebna, which was afterwards called Eleuthoropolis, as some have supposed. But while he had ill success at Pelusium, and feared Thirrhakeh, God himself, whom he least feared, strook his Army before Hierusalem by the Angel of his power, so as 158000. were found dead in the place, as in the life of Ezechias is hereafter more largely written. And that this Army of Thirrhakeh was from Arabia, Josephus himself makes it plain. For he confesseth in the tenth Book, the first Chapter of the Jews Antiquities, that it was come to Senacheribs knowledge, that the Army which was afoot (both to relieve the Egyptians and the Jews) marched towards him by the way of the Desart: Now, the Desart which lay indifferent between Hierusalem and Pelusium, was that of Pharan or Sur, which also toucheth on the three Arabia's, to wit, the Stony, of which it is a part; the Desart, and the Happy; and by no other way indeed could the Arabians come on to succour either Pelusium or Hierusalem. But that there is any Desart between Pelusium and the South part of Egypt, hath never yet been heard of, or described by any Cosmographer or Historian. So then this description of the second of Kings, Vers. 9. hath the same mistaking as the rest. For here the word (Chush) is also translated Æthiopia; and in this sence have all the Interpreters (but Junius) expressed the beginning of the ninth Verse: He heard also men say of Thirrhakeh King of Æthiopia, &c. whereas it should have been thus converted with Junius: Audiens autem de Thirrakeh Rege Chushi; He heard also of Thirrhakeh King of the Chushites. For they were the Chushites and Arabians, whose whoſe Houſes and Cities were next the fire, and upon whom the very ſmoak of Juda flaming was blown, being their neareſt Neighbours: and ſo were not the Æthiopian Black-Moors under the Equinoctial, whom neither War nor Peace (which diſcovereth all Regions) ever found out, ſaith Pliny. For this King was no more King of Æthiopia than Zerah was, who invaded Aſa King of Juda, with an Army of a Million, and three thouſand Chariots. Indeed, how ſuch an Army, and thoſe Chariots ſhould paſs through all Egypt (the Kings of Egypt being mighty Kings) let all men that know how theſe Regions are ſeated, and how far diſtant, judge. For Princes do not eaſily permit Armies of a Million to run through them; neither was there ever ſuch ſtrength of Black-Moors heard of in that part of the World, or elſewhere. Neither are theſe Æthiopians ſuch Travellers or Conquerors; and yet is this King Zerah alſo called King of Æthiopia. But the word Chuſh being firſt ſo converted for Æthiopia, the reſt of the Interpreters (not looking into the ſeats of Kingdoms, or the poſſibilities of attempts, or invaſions) followed one another in the former miſtakings.

§. VII.

A farther Expoſition of the place, Eſai. 18. 1.

COncerning theſe words in that eighteenth Chapter of Eſay, Navium alarum, Winged Ships (ſo the Septuagint turn it) or Cymbalo alarum (according to the Latine) ſails whiſtling in the winds, or terræ umbroſæ oræ (after Junius) the Land of a ſhadowed coaſt, or the Land ſhadowing with wings, as our Engliſh Geneva hath it. The two firſt interpretations of the Septuagint and S. Hierom, have one ſence in effect. For the ſails are commonly called the wings of a Ship; and we uſe to ſay ordinarily when our Ships ſails ſlowly, that ſhe wanteth wings (that is) when her ſails are either worn, or too narrow: and we alſo uſe the ſame phraſe of the wind whiſtling in the ſails. And it may be that the Egyptians imployed ſo many of thoſe ſmall ſhips, as their ſails were ſaid to give a ſhadow over the Red-Sea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (upon Iſaiah) affirmeth, that the word (Sabal) doth ſignifie both to ſhadow, and to gingle (which is) to make a kind of Cymbaline ſound: ſo as the meaning of this place (ſaith Pintus) is this: Wo to thee, O Egypt, which doſt promiſe to others ſafeguard, under the ſhadow of thy wings: which (indeed) ſeemeth to agree with the argument of the eighteenth Chapter of Iſaiah: and this phraſe is often elſe-where uſed, as in the 16. Pſalm: Sub umbra alarum tuarum protege me; Defend me under the ſhadow of thy wings. The Boats of Reed ſpoken of are of two kinds; either of baſket-Willow covered with hides (as anciently in Brittain) or a Tree made hollow in the bottome, and built up on both ſides with Canes. Of the one ſort I have ſeen in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

§. XI.

Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Egypt.

||. I.

That Mizraim the chief Planter of Egypt: and the reſt of the Sons of Ham, were ſeated in order one by another.

THe ſecond Son of Ham was Mizraim; who (according to the place of a ſecond brother) was ſent ſomewhat farther off to inhabit. For Chuſh firſt poſſeſt Chaldæa on the Weſt ſide of Gehon chiefly: and from thence, as he increaſed in people, ſo he entred Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red-Sea, and to the South-eaſt ſide of Judæa. Mizraim his brother (with Phut) paſt over into Africa. Mizraim held Egypt; and Phut (as a third brother) was thruſt farther off into Mauritania. Canaan took the Sea-coaſt, and held the ſide of Palæſtina: and theſe four brothers poſſeſt all that Tract of Land, from Gehon in Chaldæa, as far to the Weſt as the Mediterrane Sea: comprehending all Arabia Deſerta, and Petræa, all Canaan which embraceth Galilæa, Samaria, and Judæa; with the two Egypts, whereof the neather is bounded by Memphis on the South, and by the Mediterrane Sea on the North: and Thebaida (called the upper Egypt) ſtretcheth it ſelf toward the South as far as Syene, the border of the Æthiopians, or Black-Moors. All the reſt of the coaſt of Africa Weſtward, Phut peopled; which brothers had not any other Nation or Family that dwelt between them. And in the ſame manner did all their Sons again, and all the Sons of the reſt of Noahs children, ſort themſelves.

||. II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be known: and of the Egyptians Lunary years, which made their Antiquites ſeem more fabulous.

THis flouriſhing Kingdom poſſeſt by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and became Egypt, at such time as Ægyptus (otherwise Rameſſes, as some think) the son of Belus, chased thence his elder brother Danaus, shifting him into that part of Greece, now called Morea, by whom the Argives were made Danai, abandoning their proper names: which happened 877. years after the Floud, in the time of Josua, as Saint Augustine conjectureth out of Eusebius. But in Homers Odysses it appeareth that the Egyptians were so called at the time of the Trojane Warr. And before this, Egypt was known by divers other names, as Oceana, Aria, Osiriana, &c. And Manethon (whom Josephus citeth in his first Book against Appion) numbreth all the Kings of Egypt after Moses departure, who consumed 393. years. By which other men conjecture, that the Egyptians took on them that name, 330. years after Josua, and about 1000. years after the Floud. But where Josephus in the same Book taketh Israel to be those Hycsos, which he also calleth Pastores, or Shepherds, which are said to have reigned in Egypt 511. years: whom also he calleth his Ancestors (meaning the Ancestors of the Jews) in this I am sure he was grosly deceived, or that he vainly boasted: for the Israelites had no such Dominion as Manethon faineth, nor abode in Egypt so long a time by many years.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirm (saith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330. Kings before Amasis, who was contemporary with Cyrus; and that they had Memory and Story of 13000. years; and that the Stars had four times changed their course, and the Sun twice set in the East. These Riddles are also rife among the Athenians and Arcadians, who dare affirm, that they are more ancient than Jupiter and the Moon; whereof Ovid:

The Arcadians the Earth inhabited
Ere yet the Moon did shine, or Jove was bred.

But for those 13000. years, it may well be true; seeing it is certain that the Egyptians reckon their years by Moneths, which makes after that account not above 1000. or 1100. years, whether we take their Moneths or Lunary years to have been of the first kind of 27. days and eight hours; or otherwise 29. days and twelve hours; or after any other of those five diversities of their Lunary years.

§. III.

Of certain vain assertions of the Antiquity of the Egyptians.

GErardus Mercator, in his Chronologie, reasoneth for the Egyptians Antiquity in this manner: That the sixteenth Dynasty (where Eusebius begins to reckon the Egyptians times) had beginning with the general Floud: and that therefore the first of the other fifteen reached the Creation, or soon after it. To which conjecture of Mercator, Pererius maketh this answer; That therein Mercator was first deceiv'd, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty was at once with the general Floud: which Eusebius maketh 292. years after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the shepherds Dynastia (being in number 17.) in the time of their first King, Saltis, to have been in the year of the World 1846. which Eusebius findeth in the Worlds Age 2140. For the 16. Dynastia was begun but in the 292. year after the Floud, as they account, and continued 190. years. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh every Dynastia to endure 115. years, Eusebius reckoneth many of them at less than 100. years: for the 28. had but six years, the 29. but 20. and the 30. but 18. years.

Now, Annius in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15. Dynasties lasted but 162. years: and that the first of the 15. began but in the 131. year after the Floud: so as where Mercator maketh all the 15. to precede the Floud, and the 16. to have been then in being at the time of the Floud, Annius makes them all after it. But the contrariety of falshood cannot be hidden, though disguised. For Annius had forgotten his former Opinion and Assertion, that it was in the 131. year that Nimrod, with the Sons of Noah, came into the Valley of Shinaar: so he forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confusion of Speech there was no dispersion, nor far-off plantation at all. And though he hastily conveyed Gomer into Italy, and Tubal into Spain, in the tenth year of Nimrods reign (which was ten years after his arrival into Babylonia) yet herein he is more unadvised. For he makes Egypt possest, and a Goverment established in the very first year of the arrival of Nimrod into Shinaar, before all partition, or any expedition farr off, or near, in question: for, from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them upon all the earth.

§. IV.

§. IV.

Against Pererius: that it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within 200. years after the Creation; at least, that both it, and the most parts of the World were peopled before the Floud.

BUt whereas Pererius seeketh to overthrow this Antiquity of the Egyptians touching their Dynasties (which Eusebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I do not find any great strength in this Opinion of Pererius (to wit) that it was either unlikely or impossible that Egypt should be peopled within 100. or 200. years after Adam, in the first Age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the general Floud, I do verily believe the contrary: and that not only of Egypt, but the better part of all the World was then peopled: Pererius his words are these: Quòmodo enim primos mundi ducentos, vel etiam centum annos Adami proles adeò multiplicari potuit, ut ad Ægyptum usque habitandum & complendum propagata sit, &c. For how could the children of Adam be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred years of the World, and so propagated as to inhabit and fill Egypt? for allowing this (saith Pererius) we must also confess, that there were then both the Assyrians and other Nations.

Now, seeing that the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our saving-belief, it is lawfull for every man to be guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I do not gainsay any mans opinion out of any crossing or cavelling humours: for I think it the part of every Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibility of union, than out of froward subtilty, and prejudicate resolvedness, to maintain factions needless, and dangerous contentions.

First therefore, for this Opinion, that Egypt was not planted so soon after Adam, no, not at all before the Floud, I say, that there is no reason why we should give a less increase to the Sons of Adam, than to the Sons of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded those which came after the Floud double, and (after a few years) treble, is an infallible proof of their strength and ability, to beget many Children: and at that time, they observed no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinity. And that there was a speedy increase of people, and in great numbers, it may in some sort appear by this, that Cain, who (being fearfull that the death of Abel would have been revenged on him) withdrew himself from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, and there, by the help of his own issues, built a City (called Enoch) after the name of his first-born. Now, if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinaar with so many multitudes as sufficed to build the City and Tower of Babel: and that to this increase there was given but 130. years by Berosus, and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly understood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Phalegh) but one hundred and one year: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the Infancie of the first Age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, even within 130. years the same (if not a greater) number might be increased; and so within 70. years after (that is, by such time as the World had stood 200. years) as well Assyria, Syria, and Egypt might be possest before the Floud, as they were within the same or less time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumstance or true Story of the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire, that all those people, which we increased in the first 100. or 130. years after the Floud, came into Shinaar and Babylonia: For, that ever Noah himself came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authority to prove it, so all probable conjecture and reason it self denies it. Again, those multitudes and powerfull numbers which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her own Army of three millions (and she left not all her Kingdoms empty) do well prove, that if the World had such plenty of people in so few years after the Floud, it might also be as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their own account, Ninus governed Babylonia and Assyria but 292. years after the Floud of Noah. And these Troops of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Eastern Kingdoms, from Media to the Mediterrane Sea; when there had now past from the Floud to the time of this her invasion somewhat less or more than 360. years: for much more time the true Chronologie cannot allow; though I confess, that in respect of the strange greatness of Semiramis Army, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well be given. And if but one half be true of that which is said, That her Army consisted of 1300000. Foot-men, and 500000. Horse-men, it must needs be, that long before Semiramis Reign, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge Army was gathered) was full of people: yea, Arabia it self (much part whereof is barren) must long before this time of Semiramis, have been plentifully peopled; when Ninus having a determination to make himself Master of all Nations, entred (notwitstanding) in league with the King thereof: whom therefore he either feared, or sought his assistance. And if Arabia were then so well repleniſhed, I see no cause but Egypt might also be peopled. Now, if we may believe Trogus Pompeius (Epitomiz'd by Justine) Egypt was a most flouriſhing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was born. For these be his own words, speaking of Ninus: Fuêre quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vexoris Rex Ægypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient Vexoris King of Egypt, and Tanais King of the Scythians: of which the one invaded Pontus, the other Egypt. And how full of people all that part of the World was, the Conquests of Ninus witness, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterward the Bactrians; yea, all that whole body of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesias numbreth the Armies wherewith Ninus invaded Zoroaster, at 1700000. Foot-men, and 200000. Horſ-men: and the Stories generally shew, that though Zoroasters Army was far short of this, yet it was greater than any that those parts of the World ever since beheld. But to what end should I seek for foraign Authority? for no man doubteth, but that Egypt was possest by Mizraim, the Son of Ham; and that it was an establiſhed Kingdom, filled with many Cities in Abrahams time, the Scriptures tell us. And sure, to prepare and cultive a desolate and overgrown ground, to beautifie it with many Cities, Laws, and Policies, cannot be esteemed a labour of a few days: and therefore it must be inhabited in a less time than 200. years after the Floud; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the Floud. For if so many millions of men were found within 300. years after the general Floud; so as not onely Babylon, and Assyria, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Egypt, Palestina, yea, the far-off Lybia on the one side, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to neither) were all filled: into what small corners could then all those Nations be compreſt, which 1656. years brought forth before the Floud? even necessity, which cannot be resisted, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the known World; especially, where death forbare the Father, and made no place for the Son, till he had beheld living Nations of his own body.

§. V.

Of some other Reasons against the Opinion of Pererius.

FOr what a strange increase did the long lives of the first Age make, when they continued 800. or 900. years? Surely we have reason to doubt, that the World could not contain them, rather than they were not spread over the World. For let us now reckon the date of our lives in the Age of the World: wherein if one exceed 50. years, ten for one are cut off in that passage, and yet we find no want of people; nay, we know the multitude such, as if by Wars, or Pestilence they were not sometimes taken off by many thousands, the Earth, with all the industry of man, could not give them food. What strange heaps then of Souls had the first Ages, who enjoyed 800. or 900. years, as aforesaid? These numbers, I say, cannot be counted nor conceived. For it would come to the same reckoning in effect, as if all those which have been born in Brittain since three or four hundred years before the Norman Conquest (saving such as by accident, or by violence were cut off) were now alive; and if to these there were added as many as by Polygamy might have been increased. For (to omit, that the Giants and mighty Ones of the first Age observed no Law of Matrimony) it is to be thought, that those Lovers of the World and of Pleasure, when they knew the long and liberal time which nature had given them, would not willingly or hastily present themselves to any danger which they could fly from, or eschew. For what humane argument hath better perswasion to make men careless of life, and fearless of death, than the little time which keeps them asunder, and that short time also accompanied with so many pains and diseases, which this envious old Age of the World mingleth together, and soweth with the seeds of Mankind?

Now, if that Berosus or Annius may be alledged for sufficient Authours, whom Pererius himself in this question citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Josephus confirmed, that the City of Enoch was seated near Libanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cains time, I see no cause why Palæstina (wich is also a Province of Syria) and Egypt (which neighboureth it) could be left desolate both all the life-time of Cain, and all those times between his death and the Floud, which were by estimation 700. or 800. years. And sure, though this fragment of Berosus with Annius his Comment

Comment be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or loſt) yet all things in Beroſus are not to be rejected. Therefore S. Hierome, for ſuch Authours gives a good rule: Bona eorum eligamus, vitemus contraria; Let us chooſe what is good in them, and reject the reſt. And certainly, in the very beginning of the firſt Book, Beroſus agreeth (in effect) with Moſes, touching the general Floud: and in that firſt Part Beroſus affirmeth, that thoſe mighty men and Giants which inhabited Enoch, commanded over all Nations, and ſubjected the univerſal Word: and though that phraſe (Of all the World) be often uſed in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the ſecond of the Acts, That there were dwelling at Hieruſalem Jews, men that feared God of every Nation under Heaven: yet by the words which follow in Beroſus, it is plain, that his words and ſence were the ſame: for he addeth, from the Suns riſing to the Suns ſetting; which cannot be taken for any ſmall part thereof. Again, we may ſafely conjecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his Sons at adventure, or left them as Diſcoverers, but directed them to thoſe Regions which he formerly knew had been inhabited. And it cannot be denied that the Earth was more paſſable and eaſie to travel over before the Floud, than after it. For Pererius himſelf confeſſeth, that Attica (by reaſon of mud and ſlime which the water left upon the Earth) was uninhabited 200. years after Ogyges Floud; whereby we may gather, that there was no great pleaſure in paſſing into farr Countreys, after the general Deluge, when the Earth lay (as it were) incopſed for 100. or 130. years together. And therefore was the face thereof in all conjecture more beautifull, and leſs cumberſome to walk over, in the firſt Age, than after the general overflowing.

§. VI.

Of the words of Moſes, Gen. 10. Verſ. ult. whereupon Pererius grounded his Opinion.

LAſtly, whereas Pererius draws this Argument out of the laſt Verſe of the tenth of Geneſis; And out of theſe were the Nations divided after the Floud: Quo ſignificatur talem diviſionem non fuiſſe ante diluvium; By which it appeareth (ſaith Pererius) that there was no ſuch diviſion before the Floud; which he alſo ſeeketh to confirm out of the eleventh of Geneſis, becauſe the diviſion of Tongues was the cauſe of the diſperſion of the people. This conſequence, quo ſignificatur, &c. ſeemeth to me very weak: The Text it ſelf rather teacheth the contrary: For out of theſe (ſaith Moſes) were the Nations divided in the Earth after the Floud; inferring, that before the Floud the Nations were divided out of others, though after the Floud out of theſe onely. But whatſoever ſence may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawn to the times before the Floud, or to any plantation or diviſion in that Age: for if there were none elſe among whom the Earth could be divided after the Floud, but Noahs Sons, wherein doth that neceſſary diviſion controul the planting of the World before it? And whereas it is alledged that the confuſion of ſpeech was the cauſe of this diſperſion; it is true, that it was ſo for that preſent; but if Babel had never been built, nor any confuſion of Languages at all, yet increaſe of people and time would have enforced a farther-off and general plantation: as Beroſus ſays well, that when man-kind were exceedingly multiplied, Ad comparandas novas ſedes neceſſitas compellebat, They were driven by neceſſity to ſeek new Habitations, For we find (as it is before ſaid) that within 300. years after the Floud, there were gathered together into two Armies ſuch multitudes, as the Valley about Babylon could not have ſuſtained thoſe numbers, with their increaſe, for any long time; all Aſia, the Greater and the Leſſer; all Scythia, Arabia, Paleſtina, and Egypt, with Greece, and the Iſlands thereof; Mauritania, and Lybia, being alſo at that time fully peopled. And if we believe Beroſus, then not onely thoſe parts of the World, but (within 140. years after the Floud) Spain, Italy, and France were alſo planted: much more then may we think, that within 1656. years before the Floud, in the time of the chief ſtrength of mankind, they were repleniſhed with people. And certainly, ſeeing all the World was overflown, there were people in all the World which offended. Lib. 3.

§. VII.

A Concluſion, reſolving of that which is moſt likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with ſomewhat of Phut (another Son of Ham) which peopled Lybia.

THerefore, for the Antiquity of the Egptians, as I do not agree with Mercator, nor judge with the Vulgar, which give too much credit to the Egyptians Antiquities: ſo I do not think the report of their Antiquites ſo fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceive it. But I rather incline to this, that

Egypt

Egypt being peopled before the Floud, and 200. or 300. years more or less after Adam, there might remain unto the Sons of Mizraim some Monuments in Pillars or Altars (of Stone or Metal) of their former Kings or Governours: which the Egyptians having added to the List and Roll of their Kings after the Floud, in succeding time (out of the vanity of glory, or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inserted. And that the memory of antiquity was in such sort preserved, Berosus affirmeth it of the Chaldæans, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write, that the use of Letters, and the Art of Astronomy was known to the Babylonians 3634. years before Alexanders Conquest: and this report Annius findeth to agree, and reach to the time of Enoch, who was born 1034. years before the Floud, and wrote of the Worlds destruction, both by Water and Fire; as also of Christ his coming in judgment, as Saint Jude hath witnessed. But leaving these Antiquities to other mens judgments, and every man to his own reason, I will conclude this Plantation of Egypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it took the name of Egypt from Egyptus, the Son of Belus, as aforesaid. Being divided into two Regions, that part from Memphis, or Nicopolis, to the Mediterrane Sea, was called the Inferiour Egypt; surnamed also Delta: becaus the several branches of Nilus breaking asunder from one body of the River, gave it the form of the Greek Letter Delta which is the form of a Triangle. That branch, which ran toward the North-east, and embraced the Sea, next unto the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, had on it the City of Pelusium, where Senacherib was repulsed: The other branch, which yielded it self to the Salt-water towards the North-east, is beautified by that famous City of Alexandria: The upper part of Egypt is bounded between Memphis and Syene near Æthiopia, and had the name of Thebaida, of the ancient City of Thebes; which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates: and therefore called Civitas centum portarum; and by the Greeks, Diospolis; in the Scriptures No-hamon, which signifieth multitudes of Inhabitants, exceeding belief. Josephus calls Egypt, Mersin of Mizraim: and Herodotus affirms that it had once the name of Thebais.

Joseph. l. 1. Ante c. 7. Hero. Euterpe.

Phut, the third Son of Ham, took the next portion of Land to his Brother Mizraim, and inhabited Lybia: whose people were anciently called Phutei (saith Josephus) and Pliny mentioneth the River Phut in Mauritania: which River from the Mountain Atlas (known to the Inhabitants by the name of Dyris) he maketh to be distant the space of two hundred miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chusb, and Lud were contermini, and associates with the Egyptians.

§. XII.

Of the eleven Sons of Canaan, the fourth Son of Ham.

¶. I.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his eleven Sons.

CAnaan (the fourth Son of Ham) possest all that Region, called by the Romans Palæstina; in the Scriptures Galilæa, Samaria, and Judæa; in the latter times known by the name of the Holy Land and Jurie: the limits whereof are precisely set down by Moses, Genesis the tenth, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goest to Gerar until Azzah, and as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorrah, and Adma, and Zeboim, even unto Lasha. Now, howsoever these words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goest) be converted, Moses meaning was, that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan, and Zidon the North; Sodom and Gomorrah the East, and the other Cities named, stood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right line from Gaza in the way of Egypt, the uttermost Territory of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now, the Sons of Canaan which possest this Countrey, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number eleven.

1. Zidon.
2. Heth, or Chethus.
3. Jebusi, or Jebusæus.
4. Emori, or Emoreus, or Amoreus.
5. Girgeshi, or Girgiseus.
6. Hevi, or Chiveus.
7. Arki, or Harkeus.
8. Seni, or Sinæus.
9. Arvadi, or Arvadæus.
10. Zemari, or Samareus, or Tzemareus.
11. Hamathi, or Hamatheus, or Chamatheus.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Gergesites, Amorites, Hevites, Jebusites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zemari, or Samareus, or from some of his.

¶. II.

§. II.

Of the Portions of Zidon and Heth.

ZIdon the first-born of Canaan, built the famous City of Zidon in Phœnicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Asser: for Asser, Zabulon, and Nepthali had a great part of the ancient Phœnicia distributed among them; but the Asserites could never obtain Zidon it self.

The second Son of Canaan was Heth, or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of those seven principal Nations (Commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, the Hevites, and the Jebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hebron, near the Torrent Besor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the uttermost limit of Canaan, having the Desart of Pharan to the South: for about Bersabe (otherwise Puteus juramenti) four miles from Gaza, dwelt Heth and his Posterity, as far to the North-east as Hebron, and Mamre, and of Ephraim the Hittite, did Abraham buy the Field of Sarahs burial. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her self to Isaac, saying, That she was weary of her life for the Daughters of Heth. The Giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce Nation, whose entertainment by the Kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the seventh of the Kings; Israel hath hired against us the Kings of the Hittites.

§. III.

Of the Jebusites and Amorites.

JEbusæus, the third Son of Canaan, of whom came the Jebusites, and whose principal seat was Jebus (afterward Hierusalem) were also a valiant and stubborn Nation, and held their City and the Countrey near it, till such time as David by Gods assistance recovered both: yet were not the Jebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Solomon.

Amoreus was the fourth Son of Canaan, of whom the Amorites took name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, having Arnon and the Mountains of Galaad on the East, and Jordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Basan) and Sihon (overthrown by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations dispersed within the bounds of Canaan: as behind Libanus, in the edge of Coelosyria, or Syria Libanica. They had also their being in the Mountains of Juda, and in Idumæa, near the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were sometimes called Amorites: as in Genesis the fifteenth: For the wickedness of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerfull Nation, we find in the Prophet Amos: Yet destroyed I the Amorite, before them, whose height was like the height of a Cedar, and he was strong as the Oak.

§. IV.

Of the Gergesites, Hevites and Harkites.

THe fift Son of Canaan was Gergesius, or Gergesion (otherwise Girgasi) who inhabited on the East-side of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolemy sets the City Gerasa, which Josephus calls Gesera, in the Territory of Decapolis. Here it was that Christ dispossessed the possessed with devils; and the Gergesites desired him to depart their Coasts, because their Swine, filled with the evil Spirits, drowned themselves in the Sea of Galilee: Gergesius also built Beritus (sometime Geris) afterward Fœlix Julia, three miles from the River Adonis in Phœnicia: in which the Romans held a Garrison: and to which Augustus gave many large priviledges.

Heveus the sixth Son, and Father of the Hevites, inhabited under Libanus near Emath. These Hevites, howsoever the Caphthorim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomie the second is remembred) yet many of them remained all the Warr of Josua, and afterward to the time of Solomon. For God was not pleased utterly to root out these Nations, but they were sometimes made Tributaries to the Israelites, and at other times served (in their falling away from the true worship of God) to afflict them: for as it is written, Judges the third: They remained to prove Israel by them, whether they would obey the Commandments of God.

The seventh Son was Araceus, or Harki, who between the foot of Libanus and the Mediterrane Sea (over against Tripolis) built the City of Archas, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Arachis.

§. V.

Of Sini and Arvadi.

SIneus the eighth Son, Hierosolymitanus sets at Caparorsa, which Ptolemy finds in Judæa, not farr from Jebus; to the South thereof, saith Junius. But it is more probable; bable, that Sineus founded Sin, which Saint Hierome calls Sim: Ptolemy, Simyra: Mela, and Pliny, Symirus: Brochard, Sycon (called Synochis) near Arca. Pererius thinks that Sineus inhabited the Desarts of Sinai, or thereabout; but hereof there is no other certainty than the report of Brochard, who took view of all these places, affirming, that Sineus built Sinochis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is also another Nation of Cini, written with the letter C. (otherwise Kenæi) who descended of Hobab the Son of Raguel the Madianite, who assisted the Israelites in their conduction through the wilderness of Pharan. But the Cinæi were admitted among the Israelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephtalims, beside their inhabitations with the Amalekites: against these Cinæi, Balaam prophesied, that they should be destroyed by the Assyrians.

Gul. Tyr. Vii.

The ninth Son was Aradeus, or Arvadeus, who in the Isle of Aradus, built the City Arados: opposite against which Island, on the Main of Phœnicia, they founded another City of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this City came Saint Peter (saith Clement) and in this Isle preached the Gospel, and founded a Church in honour of our Lady: but we find no such work of his in the Acts of the Apostles. Both these two were very famous, and places of skilfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembreth in his Prophecies against the Tyrians: The inhabitants of Zidon and Arvad were thy Mariners.

Cap. 27. v. 8.

||. VI.

Of Zemari.

OF Samareus, or Zemari, the tenth Son, there are divers Opinions. Some think that he inhabited in Cœlosyria at Edessa, and founded Samaraim, which in Josua is placed in the Tribe of Benjamin. There is also Samarajim (of the same Orthography) upon the Mountain of Ephraim (saith Beroaldus) mentioned in the second of Chron. c. 13. v. 4. which the Latine converteth amiss (saith he) by Semeron. The Hierosolymitan Paraphrast. makes Samareus (of whom were the Perizzites) the Parent of the Emissani, which Pliny calls the Hemisseni, in Cœlosyria; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembred. But that they founded Samaria, both the Hebrew Orthography, and this place in the first of Kings (speaking of Omri) disproveth: And he bought the Mountain Samaria, or Shemeron, of one Shemar, for two Talents of Silver, and built in the Mountain; and called the name of the City which he built, after the name of Shemar, Lord of the Mountain, Samaria. But of all these places I shall speak more at large in the Conquest of the Holy Land, by the children of Israel. Of whomsoever the Samaritans were descended, sure I am, that they were ever a perfidious Nation, and base: for as long as the state of the Jews stood up, they always called themselves Jews: when it suffered, or sank, they then utterly denied to be of that Nation or Family; for at such time as they were returned from their first captivity, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Assyrians, and partly of the Naturals.

||. VII.

Of Hamathi.

THe last of Canaans Sons was Hamatheus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath (saith Beroaldus:) of which (the aspiration taken away) the same is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamatheus was present. Josephus, and Saint Hierome confound Emath with Antioch: not that Antioch which standeth on the River Orontes, on the frontier of Comagena, between the Mountain Cassius, and the Province of Pieria, and Seleucis, of which Saint Peter was Bishop, and in which Saint Luke and Ignatius were born; but Antioch, surnamed Epiphania, as Beroaldus supposeth, which standeth between Apamea and Emesa in Cassiotis. Yet indeed, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch upon Orontes, and that which neighboureth Emesa, are farther off seated from Canaan, than ever any of those Nations straggled. And whereas S. Hierom setteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephtali; it is manifest, that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emesa, hath all the Province of Laodicea between it and any part of the Land divided. And if Libanon it self were not shared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong unto them: for both the Provinces, Laodicea, and Libanica, are between Epiphania and any part of the Holy Land: and therefore Emath so taken, could not be a part of Nephtali, as in the thirteenth of Josua is directly proved. For Josua counting the Lands that remained unpossest, reckoneth all Mount Libanon towards the Sunrising, from Baalgad under Mount Hermon, until we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is used, that Emath was not in in Nephtalim, or any way belonging to the children of Israel: becauſe David accepted

2 Sam. 8. 9. the preſents of Tohu King of Emath, and (therewithal) conditions of peace: which he would not have done, if that Territory had ever belonged to the children of Iſrael, but would have recovered it without compoſition, and by ſtrong hand, as he did the reſt. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great weight: For if the promiſe which God made, be conſidered, as it is written in
Cap. 11. v. 24. Deuteronomy, then might Emath be comprehended, though ſeated altogether without the bounds of the Land promiſed, according to the deſcription of Moſes and Joſua: for Emath is indeed ſituated on the other ſide of the Mountain of Hermon, which joyneth to Libanus; and is otherwiſe called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Joſua 19. v. 35. and written in the Latine converſion Emath, therein (ſaith Beroaldus) was S. Hierom miſtaken Emath or Iturea is that over the Mountains, and the City in Nephtalim ſhould be written Hamath: and ſo the Septuagint (underſtanding the difference) write it Ammath and not Emath, the ſame which indeed belongeth to the Nephtalims, ſeated on the South ſide of Libanus, to the Eaſt of Aſſedim: which City S. Hierom writes Emath; Joſephus, Hamah; others, Emathin, or Amatheos, and the people Amathein; of which (as I take it) Rabſakeh vaunteth in the ſecond of Cap. 18. & 19. Kings. Where is the God of Hamath?

§. XIII.

Of the Sons of Chuſh (excepting Nimrod, of whom hereafter.)

The Sons of Chuſh were, { Sheba, Havila, Sabta, Raama, Sabteca, Nimrod. } And the Sons of Raama were, { Sheba, and Dedan, }

‖. I.

That moſt of the Sons of Chuſh were ſeated in Arabia the Happy: and of the Sabæans that robbed Job: and of the Queen that came to Solomon.

SEba or Saba was the eldeſt ſon of Chuſh, the eldeſt Son of Ham; to make a difference between Him and his Nephew Sheba, the Son of his Brother Raama or Regma (or Ragma after Montanus) his name is written with a ſingle (s) Samech, and Sheba the Son of Regma with an (ſ) aſperat, which is the Hebrew, Schin. Seba the eldeſt Son of Chuſh, Regma his brother, and Sheba the Son of Regma, poſſeſs'd both the ſhores of Arabia fœlix. Saba took that part towards the Red-Sea, as neereſt his Father Chuſh, and the Land of the Chuſites: Regma and Sheba the Eaſt coaſt of the ſame Arabia, which looketh into the Gulfe of Perſia; of which Pliny: Sabæi, Arabum populi, propter thura clariſſimi, ad utraque maria porrectis gentibus habitant; The Sabæans, people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincenſe, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas (to wit) the Perſian, and the Arabian or Red-Sea. This Country was afterwards called Arabia, à populi mixtione, ſaith Poſtellus. To this agreeth Ptolemy; who ſetteth the City of Saba towards the Arabian or Red-Sea, and the City Rheguma towards the Perſian; with whom alſo we may leave Sabta: for ſo much Montanus gathereth out of Ptolemy, becauſe he remembreth a Nation (called Stabæi) near the Perſian Sea; and Majjabathæ which deſcended of them. But Montanus hath ſent Regma, or (as he calls him) Rhama, into Carmania, for which I ſee no reaſon. Joſephus, who only attended his own fancies, hath baniſhed Saba or Seba to the border of Ethiopia. But Beroaldus thinks it ſtrange, that the Sabæi, which ſtole away Job's Cattel, ſhould run through all Egypt, and all Arabia Petræa, and find out Job in Traconitis, between Paleſtina and Cœloſyria, 1200. miles off. Now, as this conjecture was more than ridiculous, ſo do I think, that neither the Sabæi on the Red-Sea, nor thoſe towards the Perſian Sea, could by any means execute the ſtealth upon Job, which ſoever Beroaldus ſhall take for neareſt. But theſe were the Sabæi of Arabia the Deſart, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth, out of his own experience, that the City Saba is ſeated: the ſame which Ptolemy calls Save, now Semiſcaſac: and from this Saba in Arabia the Deſart, came thoſe Magi or Wiſe-men, which worſhipped Chriſt, ſaith Melchior, whoſe words are theſe: The Magi came neither out of Meſopotamia (as Chryſoſtom, Hierom, and Ambroſe ſuppoſed) nor out of Arabia the Happy, as many wiſe-men do believe, but out of Saba in Arabia the Deſart: which City, when my ſelf was there, was (as I judged it) called Semiſcaſac. And to approve this Opinion of Guilandinus, it appeareth that theſe Sabæi were neighbours to Job, and lay fit to invade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well thoſe on the Perſian Sea, as thoſe on the Red Sea) are ſo diſ-joyned with large Deſarts, as there is no poſſibility for ſtrangers to paſs them, eſpecially with any numbers of Cattel, both in reſpect of the Mountains, of the ſands, and of the extreme want of water in thoſe parts: Ubi nec homines, nec beſtiæ videntur, nec aves, imò nec arbores, nec gramen aliquod, ſed non niſi monteſ ſaxoſi, altiſſimi, aſperrimi; Where there are found neither men, nor beaſts, nor birds, no, not ſo much as trees, or any paſture or graſs, but onely ſharp, and high, ſtony, and craggie mountains. Beroaldus and Pererius conceive, that the Queen of Saba, which came to viſit Solomon, was of the Sabæi, on the Eaſt ſide of Arabia fœlix; but the contrary ſeemes more probable, and that ſhe was Queen of Saba towards the Red Sea: for Solomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petræa, betwixt Idumæa and the Red Sea, as far down as Midian, or Madian, and Ezion Gaber; and this Queen of Saba, which inhabited the Weſt part of Arabia Fœlix, being his neighbour, might, without any far travel, enter his Territories, free from all danger of ſurpriſe by any other Prince or Nation.

But, to avoid tediouſneſs, it is manifeſt that Seba, or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Regma, with his Sons, Sheba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the poſſeſſors of Arabia the Happy, and the Deſart; onely Havilah and Nimrod dwelt together on the Eaſt ſide of Chuſh, who held Arabia Petræa. Now, for Sabta, there is found of his Name, the City of Sbbatha, or Sabota in the ſame Arabia: of which both Pliny and Ptolemy; who withall nameth Sabotale, within the walls whereof there was ſometimes found ſixty Temples. Ezechiel joineth the Father and the Son together, The Merchants of Sheba and Raama were thy Merchants. And that they were the Eaſtern Arabians, their Merchandiſe witneſſeth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradiſe. For Joſephus his fancies, that Saba was the Parent of the Ethiopians about Meroe, and Sabta of the Ethiopians Aſtabari, they be not worthy any farther Anſwer then hath already been given: eſpecially ſeeing theſe Cities, preſerving the memory of the names of Saba, and of Sabta in Arabia, were yet remaining in Ptolemy's time, though in ſome letters changed. As alſo in the coaſts adjoining, the names of other of the brethren of the Family of Chuſh, with little alterations, are preſerved. In Arabia the Deſart, is found the City of Sabæ, or Save (now Semiſcaſac) with the City of Rhegana for Rhegma; and the Nation by Ptolemy himſelf called Raabeni of Raamah. In Arabia the Happy, is found the City of Rhegama, and Rabana; which alſo keepeth the ſound of Rhegma, the City of Saptha, or Saptah, not far from the Eaſt-coaſt of Arabia: as alſo the Metropolis and chief City in the body of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabatha, and to the Weſt of Sabatha towards the Red Sea, the great City of Saba; and the Nation adjoining, Sabæi; and to the South thereof again toward the ſtreight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Sabe. To all theſe his brothers and nephews which were ſeated on the Eaſt ſide of Arabia, Havilah by the paſſage of Tygris was a neighbour, to whom he might paſs by Boat, even unto Rhegma the City of Raama, or Rhegma, ſet neer the River of Lar towards the mouth of the Perſian Sea, which ſtood in Ptolemy's time.

Joſephus his Opinion of Dedan, one of the Iſſue of Chuſh, to have been ſeated in the Weſt Æthiopia, diſproved out of Ezechiel and Hieremy.

AND whereas Joſephus (whom in this Saint Hierom followeth, as not curious herein) ſent Dedan the Son of Raamah into the Weſt Æthiopia, it is ſtrange that Ezechiel ſhould couple Sheba, and Raamah, and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15. Verſe, and Sheba and Raamah in 22. Verſe, to be the Merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in Weſt Æthiopia, which is diſtant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his father and brother) above four thouſand miles. Beſides which, the Merchandiſe that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Black-Moors. For they of Dedan (ſaith Ezechiel) were thy Merchants in precious cloaths for thy Chariots; and theſe Weſtern Æthiopians never ſaw cloth, till the Portugals, ſeeking thoſe Coaſts, traded with them: the Merchandiſe of the Countrey being Hides, Elephants Teeth, ſome Gold and Amber, Civet-Cats, and Rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: and all theſe they exchanged for Linnen, or Iron chiefly.

But in thoſe days, the Weſt part of Africa, within the body of the Land, was known onely by imagination: and, being under the burnt Zone, was held uninhabitable. And therefore, that the Negroes of the Weſt Æthiopia, which inhabite about Serra Liona, or Niger, could either paſs by Sea or Land to Tyre, in the bottom of the Mediterrane Sea, were a ſtrange, or rather a fooliſh fancy. Now, to put it out of diſpute, that Dedan alſo dwelt by the reſt of the children of Chuſh, which ſeats they held by that name in the time of Hieremy the Prophet; let us hear Hieremy his own words: Fly, ye inhabitants of Dedan, for I have brought the deſtruction of Eſau upon him. Hereby it appeareth, that Dedan was was a Neighbour to the Idumæans: and Idumæa is a Province of Arabia Petræa: and Dedan, which dwelt on the North part of Arabia Fœlix, joined in that part to Petræa, the ſeat of his Grand-father Chuſh; which neighbourhood of Dedan and the Idumæans, is alſo confirmed by Ezechiel: I will ſtretch out my hand upon Edom, and deſtroy Man and Beaſt out of it, and will make it deſolate from Teman: and they of Dedan ſhall fall by the ſword.

Ezech. 15. v. 15.

§. XIII.

Of the iſſue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, Chap. 9. Verſe 7.

The termination im in the Hebrew, is commonly a ſign of the plural number, as aim, of the dual.

AFter Chuſh, it followeth to ſpeak of Mizraim's Sons, whoſe names (ſaith Saint Auguſtine) were plural, to ſignifie the Nations which came of them. Ludim, the elder Son of Mizraim, was the Father of the Lybians in Africa: and the reſt of his Brothers diſperſed themſelves into all the Regions adjoining. Among the Sons of Shem, there is alſo Lud; but he is differenced from Lud the Son, of Mizraim by the ſingular number: the Son of Shem being written Lud; the Son of Mizraim, Ludim: and yet theſe Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithſtanding the apparent difference both of Names and Nations. For, that Ludim the Son of Mizraim was the Parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that he was ſeated not far from Mizraim his Father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremie, who joined them in this ſort together: Come up ye Horſes, and rage ye Chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Black-moores, and the Lybians which bear the ſhield: for thoſe Nations aſſiſted the Egyptians, being of one Parent deſcended. And in Ezechiel, Phut and Lud are joined together. Æthiopia (or Chuſh) ſaith Ezechiel, c. 30. v. 3. and Phut and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the Land that are in league, ſhall fall with them by the ſword: which is as much to ſay, as the Sons of Chuſh (which were the Chuſites) the Sons of Mizraim (which were the Egyptians) and the Lybians (deſcended of his Son Lud) with other the Inhabitants of Egypt and Africa, ſhall fall together. Hieroſolymitanus finds alſo in Africa a Nation of the Lidyans. And I believe it: becauſe Hieremie joineth the Libyans and Lydians together in the place before remembred. But Libya in Africa is by the Hebrews called Ludim (ſaith Arias Montanus) though 2 Chron. 12. 3. they ſeem to be called Lubim, or Lubæi, a name ſomewhat neer the word Lybies, and by which it may ſeem that the truer writing is, not Libyes, but Lybies. Neither is it here to be omitted, that Pintus (upon the thirtieth of Ezechiel) underſtandeth that which is ſpoken in the third Verſe of Lud, not to be meant of the Lybians at all: for he will have this threatning to be meant againſt the people of Lyda, a City (ſaith he) between Egypt and Palæſtina, which opinion I could not miſlike, if the City of Lyda were ſo ſeated. But Lyda (which ſhould be written Lydda, with a double d, and is the ſame City which was afterward Dioſpolis, in which S. Peter cured Æneas of the Palſey) ſtandeth neer the Torrent Gaas, not farr from Joppe the Port of Hieruſalem. Yet it is not impoſſible but that this City might have Lud for the Founder: For there are many Cities of one name, founded in all the Regions of the World, and farr aſunder; as after the names of Alexander, Seleucus, and Antiochus, many Cities called Alexandria, Seleucia and Antiochia: ſo of divers others. S. Hierome maketh Lehabim to be the Father of Libya, who was the third Son of Mizraim: and ſo doth Poſtellus; and either Opinion may be true.

Chap. 46. v. 9.

The reſt of Mizraim's Sons have no proper Countreys given them in the Scriptures, ſaving Caſluhim and Caphtorim, of whom came the Philiſtims, whom the Scriptures call Peleſet.

Theſe Caſluhim inhabited Caſſiotis, a Region lying in the enterance of Egypt from Paleſtina, in which the Lake Sirbonis, and the Mountain Caſſius are found, not far from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphtorim ſeated near Caſluhim in that Tract of Egypt called Sethrotis, not far from Peluſium. Strabo calls it Sethrotis; Stephanus and Pliny, Sethroitis, of the City Sethron: which Ortelius takes to be the ſame which Ptolemy calls Hercules parva. Of the Caſluhim and Caphtorim came the Philiſtims, which are called by the Septuagint Allophyli (which is) Alienigenæ, Strangers, or of a ſtrange kindred. Theſe Philiſtims inhabited the South part of the Holy Land towards Egypt, of whom Palæſtina took name. For the Hebrews (ſaith Iſidore) do not uſe the letter (p) but inſteed of it (ph.) Their principal Cities were Gaza, Aſcalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gaſæi, Aſcalonitæ, Azotii, Gethæi, and Accaronitæ: Iſidore affirms, that Aſcalon was firſt called Philiſtim; and of that City the Countrey adjoining. But where Iſidore had it, I know not.

The firſt known King of the Philiſtims, was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abrahams wife; with whom Abraham made a covenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written, that he was alſo King of the Philiſtims, in these words: Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philistims unto Gerar. Now in regard that this or some antienter Abimelech governed the Common-wealth greatly to his glory, the rest of his successors called themselves by the same name. The Philistims commanded that Tract of Land upon the Mediterran Sea to the Northward, from the Castle of Pilgrims (otherwise Cæsarea Palæstina, or Stratons Tower) which was the South border of Phœnicia, to Gaza, or to the River of Egypt. The Anakims or strong Gyants were of these Philistims: and Goliah was of Geth, one of the five Cities above named. They had sometimes five Kings, saith Lyranus. They mastered the Israelites at several times above 150. years, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by Sampson and Samuel; but in the end, this yoke was taken off by David, and laid on themselves.

It is Objected, that because these Cities and the Countries adjoyning, were held by the Sons of Mizraim, therefore did the Israelites dispossess the Sons of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this saith Pererius, that although the Palæstines or Philistims held it in the time of Josua, yet at the time of the Promise it was possessed by the Canaanites; as in the second of Deuteronomy. The Hevites dwelt in the Villages unto Gaza. And what marvel, if (the Canaanites being the greater part) the denomination were from them? For that the Philistims were of Caphtor, and so of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, besides Moses, the Prophet Jeremy witnesseth: The Lord will destroy the Philistims: the remnant of the issue of Caphtor: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistims are said to be the reliques of Caphtorim: Have not I brought up Israel out of the Land of Egypt, and the Philistims from Caphtor, and Aram from Kir? so I read this place with divers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, and Palæstinos de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this conversion Beroaldus condemneth; where Caphtor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a City directly West from Egypt, between Ptolomais or Barce and Apollonia; but Kir in Asia under the Assyrians: Junius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene; and so hath the Geneva. But Pererius calls Caphtorim Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he mean Cappadocia in Palæstina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Asia the Less. For whether they inhabited Sethreites, or Cappadocia of Palæstina, it is not certainly known. And sure in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, aswell as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Teglatphalasser King of the Assyrians carried away the inhabitants of Damascus into Kir: and so Josephus seems to understand this Kir of Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene, Media superior: for it was the manner and policy of the Assyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-Media: because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captived.

Of the issue of Sem.

||. I.

Of Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

It remaineth lastly to speak of the Sons of Sem, who are these:

1. Alam, or Elam,
2. Ashur,
3. Arphaxad,
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

THe posterity of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them he proceedeth in order with the Genealogie and Story of the Hebrews: (For of Sem was Abraham descended.)

Of these five Sons, the Scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad only, and only the Children of him and Aram; the rest are barely spoken of by rehersal of their names, saving that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Ninive) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose issues, and the issues of Cham, instantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians, sometimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the virtue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth us that all the East parts of the World were peopled by Assur, Elam, and Lud (saving India) which I believe Noah himself first inhabited: and to whom Ophir and Havilah the Sons of Joctan afterward repaired: Hi filii Sem ab Euphrate fluvio partem Asiæ usque ad Oceanum Indicum tenuerunt; These Sons of Sem (saith (St.

Of Elam came the Elamites, remembred, Acts 2. v. 9. and the Princes of Perſia; which name then began to be out of uſe and loſt, when the Perſians became Maſters of Babylonia: the Eaſt Monarchy being eſtabliſhed in them. Some prophane Writers diſtinguiſh Elam from Perſia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Suſa (which the Scriptures call Suſan) in Elam was the Kings ſeat of Perſia (witneſs Daniel) And I ſaw (ſaith he) in a Viſion, and when I ſaw it, I was in the palace of Suſan, which is in the Province of Elam. This City is embraced by the River Euleus (according to Ptolemy) in Daniel, Ulai: and ſeated in the border of Suſiana.

Cap. 8. v. 2. Ptol. Aſiæ tab. 5. Dan. 8. 2.

Aſſur (as moſt Hiſtorians believe) the ſecond Son of Sem, was Father of the Aſſyrians, who diſdaining the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Ninive, of equal beauty and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we ſhall in due place diſprove that opinion. Every mans hand hath been in this Story, and therefore I ſhall not need herein to ſpeak much: for the Aſſyrians ſo often invaded and ſpoiled the Iſraelites, deſtroyed their Cities, and led them Captives, as both in Divine and Humane letters there is large, and often mention of this Nation.

But howſoever Herodotus and D. Siculus extend this Empire, and honour this Nation with ample Dominion; yet was not the ſtate of the Aſſyrians of any ſuch power, after ſuch time as Sardanapalus loſt the Empire. For Senacherib, who was one of the powerfulleſt Princes among them, had yet the Mountain Taurus for the utmoſt of his Dominion towards the North-eaſt, and Syria bounded him towards the Weſt, notwithſtanding theſe vaunts of Senacherib in Eſay the 37. Have the Gods of the Nations delivered them whom my Fathers have deſtroyed: as Gozan, and Haran, and Reſeph, and the children of Eden which were at Telaſſar? Where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, and the King of the City Sepharuaim, Hena and Ivah? All theſe were indeed but petty Kings of Cities, and ſmall Countries, as Haran in Meſopotamia: Reſeph in Palmyrena: Hamath or Emath in Ituræa, under Libanus: the Iſle of Eden: Sephar, and others of this ſort. Yea, Nebuchadonozor, who was moſt powerful before the conqueſt of Egypt, had but Chaldea, Meſopotamia, and Syria, with Palæſtina, and Phœnicia, parts thereof. But in this queſtion of Aſſur, I will ſpeak my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whoſe Plantation I have omitted among the reſt of the Chuſites, becauſe he eſtabliſhed the firſt Empire: from whom the moſt memorable ſtory of the World taketh beginning.

Verſ. 11.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldeans, ſaith Saint Hierom and Joſephus; but it muſt be thoſe Chaldeans about Ur: For the Sons of Cham poſſeſt the reſt. It is true that he was the Father of the Hebrews: For Arphaxad begat Shela, and Shela, Heber, of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the fourth Son of Shem, gave name to the Lydians in Aſia the leſs, is the common opinion, taken from Joſephus and Saint Hierom; but I ſee not by what reaſon he was moved to ſtraggle thither from his friends.

||. II.

Of Aram, and his Sons.

ARam the firſt and laſt Son of Shem was the Parent of the Syrians: of which Damaſcus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrus (ſaith Euſebius out of Joſephus) which Syrus lived before Moſes was born; the ſame which others call the Son of Apollo. Meſopotamia alſo, being but a Province of Syria, had the name of Aram Naharajim, which is as much to ſay, as, Syria duorum fluviorum; Syria compaſſed with two Rivers, (to wit) Tygris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Meſopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greeks Meſopotamia ſimply.

Eſay 7. 8. Euſeb. p. 10. C.

Ariſe and get thee to Padan Aram (ſaith Iſaac to Jacob) to the houſe of Bethuel thy Mothers Father, and thence take thee a wife. Strabo alſo remembreth it by the antient name of Aram, or Aramea, as theſe his own words converted witneſs: Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipſi Syri Aramenios & Arameos vocant; Thoſe which we call Syrians (ſaith he) themſelves call Aramenians and Arameans.

Gen. 28. 2. ſee Gen. 25. 20 alſo Deut. 23. 4. Judg. 3. Paral. 1. 19. Pſal 59. Strab. l. 1.

Againſt this opinion, that Aram the Son of Sem was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in general; (and not only of thoſe in Syria Inter-Amnis, which is Meſopotamia) ſome read, Geneſ. 22. 21. Kemuel, the Father of the Syrians: where others out of the original read Kemuel, the Son of Aram. Neither is it any inconvenience for us to underſtand the word (Aram) here, not for the Nation, but for the name of ſome one of note; the rather, becauſe in the Hiſtory of Abraham and Iſaac (which was in time long before Kemuels Poſterity could be famous) we find Meſopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition, ſometimes with Naharajim, and ſometimes of Padan, to diſtinguiſh it from from another Aram, which (as it seems) then also was called Aram. For whereas Junius thinks, in his Notes upon Gen. 25. 20. that Padan-Aram ought to be restrained to some part of Mesopotamia (to wit) to that part which Ptolemy calls Ancobaritis (so called from the River Chaboras, which, dividing it, runneth into Euphrates) the promiscuous use of Padan Aram and Aram Naharajim (which latter appellation questionless comprehends the whole Mesopotamia) may seem to refute this Opinion: especially seeing the signification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it signifieth as much as the yoak of Syria, which name agreeth with this Region: because the two Rivers (as it were) yoaked together go along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appear in the name of two Cities, in Ptolemy called Aphadana (as Junius hath well noted) the one upon Chaboras, the other upon Euphrates.

The Sons of Aram were, Uz, or Hus. Hul. Gether, and Mesch, or Mes.

Hierom. in trad. Hebraic.

Uz, or Hus, inhabited about Damascus, and built that City, saith Josephus and Saint Hierom. But Tostatus mistaking this Opinion, both in them and in Lyra, who also followeth Josephus, affirmeth, that Abraham's Steward, Eliezer, was the Founder thereof; though it were likely that Hus, the eldest Son of Aram, dwelt neer unto his Father, who inhabited the body of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the same, adjoining to Arabia the Desart, and to Batanea, or Traconitis; whereof the Prophet Hieremy: Rejoyce and be glad, O daughter of Edom, that dwellest in the Land of Hus. Hus therefore is seated beyond Jordan, in the East Region of Traconitis, adjoining to Basan, having Batanea Gaulonitis, and the Mountain Seir to the East, Edrai to the South, Damascus North, and Jordan West: having in it many Cities and People, as may also be gathered out of Hieremy: And all sorts of people, and all the Kings of the Land of Hus. In this Region dwelt Job, descended of Hus, the Son of Nahor, the Brother of Abraham (saith S. Hierom) and married Dina the Daughter of Jacob, saith Philo.

Hierom. Lam. chap. 4. v. 21.

Chap. 25. v. 10.

Hul, the second Son of Aram, S. Hierom makes the Father of the Armenians; and Gether, the third son, Parent to the Acarnanians, or Carians: which Opinion (because I find not where to set him) I do not disprove, though I see no reason why Gether should leave the fellowship of his own Brethren, and dwell among strangers in Asia the less. Junius gives Hul (whom he writes Chul) the Desart of Palmyrena, as far as Euphrates, where Ptolemy setteth the City of Cholle.

Gether (saith Josephus) founded the Bactrians: but Josephus gave all Noah's children feathers, to carry them far away in all hast. For mine own Opinion, I always keep the rule of Neighbourhood, and think with Junius (to wit) That Gether seated himself neer his Brothers in the Body of Syria, and in the Province of Cassiotis, and Seleucis, where Ptolemy placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Pliny called Gindareni.

Junius also giveth to Mes, or Mesch the North part of Syria, between Cilicia and Mesopotamia, neer the Mountain Masius. The certainty of those Plantations can no otherwise be known than by this probability, that Aram the Father (of whom that great Region took name) planted his Sons in the same Land about him: for he wanted no scope of Territory for himself and them; neither then when the World was newly planted, nor in many hundred years after: and therefore there is no reason to cast them in the Desart parts of the World, so far asunder. And as necessity and policy held them together for a while; so ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children, set them asunder. For although these Sons of Aram, and the Sons of the rest of Noah's children, kept themselves within the bounds of some one large Kingdom; yet therein every one also sought a Province apart, and to themselves; giving to the Cities, therein built, their own names, thereby to leave their memory to their Posterity: the use of letters being then rare, and known to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Provinces: every one emulating and disdaining the greatness of other, as they are thereby to this day subject to invasion, expulsion, and destruction: so as (Nova Hispania and Peru excepted, because those Countreys are unaccessible to strangers) an easie force wil cast them out of all the rest.

Mes, the fourth Son, is made the Parent of the Mœonians: of whom something hath been spoken already. Arphaxad, the third Son of Shem, begat Shelah, and Heber. Heber had two Sons, Phaleg and Joctan: and in Phaleg's time was the Earth divided. Chap. 8. Sect. 7.

§. III.

Of the division of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the Sons of Heber, of the issue of Sem.

THe many People which at the division (at Phaleg's birth) were then living, and the through Plantation of all the East part of the World (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the Earth were divided at either. The Hebrews, (saith Pererius out of Sedar Holam, one of their Chronicles) affirm that this partition hapned at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was born in the year after the Floud 101. and lived in all 239. years, which numbers added, make 340. And therefore was it so many years after the Floud, ere the children of Noah severed themselves. But to this Opinion of the Hebrews, and the doubt they make, how in so few years as 101. (the time of Phaleg's birth) so many people could be increased, Pererius gives this Answer, That if 70. persons of the Family of Jacob increased to 600000. fighting men in 215. years (besides women, children and impotent persons) how much more is it likely, that so soon after the Floud the children of Noah might, in a shorter time, bring forth many multitudes, having received the blessing of God, Increase and multiply, and fill the Earth? What strength this Answer hath, let others judge: for the children of Israel were 70. and had 215. years time: and the Sons of Noah were but three, and had but 101. yeares of time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceive that Phaleg took that name after the division, in memory thereof: as Josephus and S. Augustine, who reason in this manner. If the division were at Phaleg's death (which happened in the year, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abraham, but was, by more likely, computation 12. years before his birth) then was the division 38. years after Ninus, who governed 52. years: in the 43. year of whose Reign Abraham was born. But when Ninus began to rule the Assyrians, 80. years before this division (as this division is placed by the Hebrews, Hierom and Chrisostome) then was the Earth so peopled in all the East and Northern parts, as greater numbers have not been found at any time since. For Ninus, associating to himself Arieus King of Arabia, a People who at that time (saith Diodorus Siculus) plurimum opibus atque armis præstabant, Exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, subdued many Cities in Armenia; received Barzanis into grace; then invaded Media, and crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his Wife and seven Children; vanquished all those Regions between Nilus and Tanais, the Egyptians, Phœnicians, the Kingdoms of Syria, and all the Nations of Persia, to the Hyrcanian Sea. For the number which followed Ninus (already remembred out of Ctesias) against Zoroaster and others: and Zoroaster on the other side who made resistance with 400000 prove it sufficiently, that if the division had not hapned before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no division at that time at all. For some of them were so ill satisfied with their portions, as they sought to be masters of all, and greater Armies were there never gathered than by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this Opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

Per. in Gen lib. 15 c. 10.

But for that conceit, that if the division had been made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then sufficient numbers born to fill the Earth: It was never meant that the Earth could be filled every where at the very instant, but by times and degrees. And surely, whatsoever mens Opinions have been herein, yet it is certain, that the division of Tongues and of Men must go neer together with the ceasing of the work at Babel: and that the enterprise of Babel was left off instantly upon the confusion of Languages, where followed the execution of the division; and so neither at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was born in the year 101. after the Floud, which was the year that Nimrod came into Shinaar, or ten years after he arrived, saith Berosus.

Now, if it be objected, That Phaleg (the Etymologie of whose name signifieth Division) must have lived without a name, except the name had been given him at the time of this confusion and partition: to this Objection, it may answered, That the change of names upon divers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures; for Jacob was called Israel after he had wrestled with the Angel; Abraham was first Abram; and Edom, Esau; and that Phaleg being a principal man in this division, had his first name upon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly, whereas the Hebrews, Saint Hierom, and Chrysostom, account Heber for a great Prophet, if that by giving his Son the name Phaleg, he foretold the division which followed: to this I say, I do not find that Heber deserved any such honour, if he had thereupon so called his Son: for division and dispersion followeth increase of people of necessity; and this Prophecy (if any such had been) might also have reference to the division, which afterwards wards fell amongst the Hebrews themselves.

But if we give a reasonable time to the Building of the Tower and City of Babel, in which time many people (by reason and by demonstrative proof) might be increased: and that upon the fall thereof the confusion and division followed (whereupon Phaleg took name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

§. IV.

Of the sons of Joctan, the other Son of Heber.

The Sons of Joctan were,
1. Elmodad.
2. Saleph, or Salep, or Sheleph.
3. Asamath, or Chatzar.
4. Jare, or Jaraah, or Jerath.
5. Hadoram.
6. Uzal, or Uxal.
7. Dicklach, or Dicla.
8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
9. Abimael.
10. Sheba, or Seba.
11. Ophir, or Opir.
12. Havilah, or Chavila, and
13. Jobab.

ALl those Sons of Joctan (according to Saint Hierom) dwelled in the East parts of the World, or India, even from the River Cophe or Choas, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certain places of those thirteen Sons cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Moses being general: Gen. 10. 30. And their dwelling was from Mesha as thou goest unto Separ a Mount in the East. Of all these thirteen Sons, there were only three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Havilah. Concerning whose names, to avoid confusion, it is to be observed, that among the Sons of Chush, two of them had also the names of Sheba and Havilah. Abraham had also a third Saba, or Sheba, his Grand-child by his wife Ketura. But Seba the Son of Chush, and Sheba the Son of Rhegma his Nephew we have left in Arabia fœlix; and Havilah the Son of Chush upon Tygris. Saba the Grand-child of Abraham was (as some have thought) the Father of the Sabæans in Persia: of which Nations Dionysius de Orbis situ maketh mention; Primum Sabæi; post hos sunt Pasiagardæ; prope verò hos sunt Tusci: The first are Sabæans; after these be Passægarde; and near these the Tasci. And whereas it is written: Gen. 25 6. But unto the Sons of the Concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his Son (while he yet lived) Eastward to the East-Country: Hereupon it is supposed, that this Saba the Son of Abraham wandered into Persia: for Persia was accounted the furthermost East-Country in respect of Judæa; which also Ovid setteth under the Sun-rising. Yet seeing the rest of Abraham's Sons seated themselves on the borders of Judæa: I rather choose to leave Saba the Son of Abraham in Arabia the Desart, where Ptolemy setteth a City of that name. Metam. l. 1.

But Saba, the Son of Joctan, the Son of Heber (as I conceive) inhabited India it self. For Dionysius Afer in his Periegesis (or description of the World) which he wrote in Greek Verse, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabæi. Taxilis hos inter medios habitatque Sabæus; In the middest of these dwell the Sabæi, and the Taxili, saith Dionysius. τῶν δὲ μέσοι ναίουσι Σαβαῖοι τε καὶ ἐγγὺς Ταξίλοι ἀνδρες.

§. V.

Of Ophir one of Joctan's Sons, and of Peru, and of that voyage of Solomon.

OPhir also was an inhabitant of the East India, and (as St. Hierom understands it) in one of the Islands plentiful with Gold, which are now known by the name of Moluccæ. Josephus understands Ophir to be one of those great head-lands in India, which by a general name are called Chersonesi, or Peninsulæ: of which there are two very notorious; Callecut and Malacon. Pererius takes it rightly for an Island, as St. Hierom doth, but he sets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccas farther East.

Arias Montanus, out of the second of Chronicles, the third Chapter and sixth Verse, gathers that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the West Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, or the South Sea; by others, Mare pacificum. The words, in the second of the Chronicles, are these: And he over-layed the house with precious stones for beauty; and the gold was gold of Parvaim. Junius takes this gold to be the gold of Havilah, remembred by Moses in the description of Paradise: And the gold of that Land is good: finding a Town in Characene, a Province of Susiana, called Barbatia; so called (as he thinks) by corruption for Parvaim: from whence those Kings subjected by David, brought this gold, with which they presented him; and which David preserved for the inriching of the Temple. Gen. 2. 11. & 12. Plin. l. 6. c. 28.

But this fancy of Peru hath deceived many men, before Montanus, and Plessis, who also took Ophir for Peru. And that this Question

ſtion may be a ſubject of no further diſpute; it is very true that there is no Region in the World of that name: ſure I am, that at leaſt, America hath none, no not any City, Village or Mountain ſo called. But when Francis Piſarro firſt diſcovered thoſe Lands to the South of Panama, arriving in that Region which Atabaliba commanded (a Prince of magnificence, riches, and dominion inferior to none) ſome of the Spaniards, utterly ignorant of that language, demanding by ſignes (as they could) the name of the Country, and pointing with their hand athwart a River, or Torrent, or Brook that ran by, the Indians anſwered Peru, which was either the name of that Brook, or of Water in general. The Spaniards thereupon conceiving that the people had rightly underſtood them, ſet it down in the Diurnal of their enterpriſe, and ſo in the firſt deſcription made, and ſent over to Charles the Emperor, all that Weſt part of America to the South of Panama, had the name of Peru, which hath continued ever ſince, as divers Spaniards in the Indies aſſured me; which alſo Acoſta the Jeſuite in his natural and moral Hiſtory of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus alſo findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Jucatan) took that name of Jochan, who as he ſuppoſeth navigated from the utmoſt Eaſt of India to America: it is moſt true, that Jucatan is nothing elſe in the language of that Country, but [What is that?] or [What ſay you?] For when the Spaniards aſk'd the name of that place (no man conceiving their meaning) one of the Salvages anſwered Jucatan (which is) What aſk you, or What ſay you? The like happened touching Paria, a Mountainous Country on the South ſide of Trinidado, and Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men do) the names of thoſe new Regions which they diſcovered, pointed to the Hills afar off, one of the people anſwered, Paria, which is as much to ſay, as, high Hills or Mountains. For at Paria begins that marvellous ledg of Mountains, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan, from eight degrees of North latitude to the 52. of South: and ſo hath that Country ever ſince retained the name of Paria.

The ſame happened among the Engliſh, which I ſent under Sir Richard Greenevile to inhabit Virginia. For when ſome of my people asked the name of that Country, one of the Salvages anſwered, Wingandacon, which is as much to ſay, as, You wear good cloaths, or gay cloaths. The ſame happened to the Spaniard in aſking the name of the Iſland Trinidado: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that ſelf place which the Sea encompaſſed, they anſwered, Caeri, which ſignifieth an Iſland. And in this manner have many places, newly diſcovered, been entituled, of which Pern is one. And therefore we muſt leave Ophir among the Moluccas, whereabout ſuch an Iſland is credibly affirmed to be.

Now, although there may be found Gold in Arabia it ſelf (towards Perſia) in Havilah, now Suſiana, and all alongſt that Eaſt Indian ſhore; yet the greateſt plenty is taken up at the Philippines, certain Iſlands planted by the Spaniards, from the Eaſt India. And by the length of the paſſage which Solomons Ships made from the Red-Sea (which was three years in going and coming) it ſeemeth they went to the uttermoſt Eaſt, as the Moluccas or Philippines. Indeed theſe that now go from Portugal, or from hence, finiſh that navigation in two years, and ſometimes leſs: and Solomon's Ships went not above a tenth part of this our courſe from hence. But we muſt conſider, that they evermore kept the coaſt, and crept by the ſhores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the uſe of the compaſs was known, it was impoſſible to navigate a-thwart the Ocean; and therefore Solomon's Ships could not find Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themſelves (had it not been for the plenty of Gold in the Eaſt India Iſlands, farr above the Mines of any one place of America) to ſail every year to the Weſt part of America thither, and there to have ſtrongly planted, and inhabited the richeſt of thoſe Iſlands: wherein they built a City called Manilia. Solomon therefore needed not to have gone farther off than Ophir in the Eaſt, to have ſped worſe: neither could he navigate from the Eaſt to the Weſt in thoſe days, whereas he had no coaſt to have guided him.

Toſtatus alſo gathereth a fantaſtical Opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Countrey, whoſe mountains of Gold are kept by Griffins: which mountains Solinus affirmed to be in Scythia Aſiatica, in theſe words: Nam cum Auro & Gemmis affluant, Griphes tenent univerſa, alites ferociſſimæ, Arimaſpi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas theſe Countreys abound in Gold and rich Stones, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kind of Fowl, the fierceſt of all other; with which Griffins a Nation of people, called Arimaſpi, make Warr. Theſe Arimaſpi are ſaid to have been men with one eye onely, like unto the Cyclops of Sicilia: of which Cyclops, Herodotus, and Ariſteus make mention: and ſo doth Lucan in his third Book: and Valerius Flaccus lib. 6. Diodorus Siculus lib. 16.

Flaccus: and D. Siculus, in the Story of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine own Opinion) I believe none of them. And for these Arimaspi, I take it that this name signifying one-eyed, was first given them, by reason that they used to wear a vizzard of defence, with one sight in the middle to serve both eyes; and not that they had by nature any such defect. But Solinus borroweth these things out of Pliny, who speaks of such a Nation in the extreme North, at a place called Gisolitron, or the Cave of the North-east wind. For the rest, as all Fables were commonly grounded upon some true Stories, or other things done: so might these tales of the Griffins receive this moral: That if those men, which fight against so many dangerous passages for Gold, or other riches of this World, had their perfect senses, and were not deprived of half their eye-sight (at least of the eye of right reason and understanding) they would content themselves with a quiet and moderate estate; and not suject themselves to famine, corrupt air, violent heat and cold, and to all sorts of miserable diseases. And though this Fable be feigned in this place, yet, if such a tale were told of some other places of the World, where wilde Beasts or Serpents defend mountains of Gold, it might be avowed. For there are in many places of the World, especially in America, many high and impassable mountains, which are very rich, and full of Gold, inhabited onely with Tygers, Lions, and other ravenous and cruel Beasts: unto which, if any man ascend (except his strength be very great) he shall be sure to find the same warr which the Arimaspi make against the Griffins: not that the one or other had any sense of the Gold, or seek to defend that metal, but being disquieted, or made afraid of themselves or their young ones, they grow inraged and adventurous. In like sort it may be said, that the Alegartos (which the Egyptians call the Crocodyles) defend those Pearls which lie in the Lakes of the In-land: for many times the poor Indians are eaten up by them, when they dive for the Pearl. And though the Alegartos know not the Pearl, yet they find savour in the flesh and bloud of the Indians, whom they devour.

||. VI.

Of Havilah the Son of Joctan, who also passed into the East-Indies: and of Mesha and Sepher named in the bordering of the families of Joctan: with a Conclusion of this Discourse touching the plantation of the World.

OF Havilah the Son of Joctan, there is nothing else to be said, but that the general Opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East-India, in the Continent, from which Ophir past into the Islands adjoining. And whereas Ganges is said to water Havilah, it is meant by Havilah in the East-India, which took name of Havilah the Son of Joctan: but Havilah which Pison compasseth, was so called of Havilah, the Son of Chus, as is formerly proved by this place of Scripture: Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah, as thou comest to Shur, which is before Egypt. But, that Saul ever made warr in the East-India, no man hath suspected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteen Sons of Joctan, these three, Saba, Havilah, and Ophir; though at the first seated by their Brethren about the Hill Masius, or Mesh, Gen. 10.30. (to wit) between Cilicia and Mesopotamia; yet, at length, either themselves, or their issues removed into the East-India, leaving the other Families of Joctan, to fill the Countreys of their first plantations, which the Scripture defines to have been from Mesh unto Sephar. And although S. Hierome take Mesh to be a Region of the East-India, and Sephar a Mountain of the same (which Mountain, Montanus would have to be the Andes in America) those fancies are farr beyond my understanding. For, the word (East) in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Judæa, is never farther extended than unto Persia. But Mesch is that part of the Mountain of Masius in the North of Mesopotamia, out of which the River Chaboras springeth, which runneth by Charran: and in the same Region we also find for Sephar (remembred by Moses) Sipphara by Ptolemy, standing to the East of the Mountain Masius; from whence, Joctan having many Sons, some of them might pass into India, hearing of the beauty and riches thereof. But this was in process of time.

1 Sam. 15. v. 7.

The other fashion of Planting I understand not, being grounded but upon mens imaginations, contrary to reason and possibility. And that this Mountain in the East was no farther off than in those Regions before remembred, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the same phrase is used: as in Numbers 23. Balac the King of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the Mountain of the East; which was from the East part of Mesopotamia. For Balac brought Balaam out of Mesopotamia (witness this place of Deuteronomy:) Because they hired Balaam the Son of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Naharajim, to curse thee: for Aram Naharajim was Syria fluviorum, which is Mesopotamia, as aforesaid.

Floud doth best agree (as to me it seems) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And these be the reports of reason and probable conjecture; the guides which I have followed herein, and which I have chosen to go after; making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their own fancies, be they ancient or modern. Neither have I any end herein, private or publick, other than the discovery of truth. For as the partiality of man to himself hath disguised all things: so the factious and hireling Historians of all Ages (especially of these later Times) have, by their many Volumes of untrue reports, left Honour without a Monument, and Virtue without Memory: and (in stead thereof) have erected Statues and Trophies to those, whom the darkest forgetfulness ought to have buried, and covered over for evermore. And although the length and dissolving nature of time hath worn out or changed the names and memory of the Worlds first Planters after the Floud (I mean the greatest number, and most part of them) yet all the footsteps of Antiquity (as appears by that which hath been spoken) are not quite worn out, nor over-grown: for Babylon hath to this day the sound of Babel; Phœnicia hath Zidon, to which City the eldest Son of Canaan gave name; so hath Cilicia, Tharsis; and the Armenians, Medes, Hibernian, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumæans, Libyans, Moors, and other Nations, have preserved from the death of forgetfulness some signs of their first Founders and true Parents.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Beginning and Establishment of Government.

§. I.

Of the proceeding from the first Government under the eldest of the Families to be Regal, and from Regal absolute, to Regal tempered with Laws.

IT followeth now, to intreat how the World began to receive Rule and Government, which (while it had scarcity of people) under-went no other Dominon than Paternity and Eldership. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the eldest of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was always used, both for the Magistrate, and for those of Age and Gravity: the same bearing one signification almost in all Languages. For, in the Eleventh of Numbers, God commanded Moses to gather together 70. of the Elders of the people, and Governours over them: the Hebrew bearing the same sence which the Latine word Senes, or Seniores doth. So it is written in Susanna, Then the Assembly believed them as those that were the Elders and Judges of the people. And so in the words of those false Judges and Witnesses to Daniel, Shew it unto us, seeing God hath given thee the Office of an Elder. Demosthenes useth the same word for the Magistrate among the Grecians. Cicero in Cato giveth two other reasons for this appellation: Apud Lacedæmonios qui amplissimum Magistratum gerunt, ut sunt, sic etiam appellantur, Senes; Among the Lacedæmonians, the chief Magistrates, as they were, so they are called, Eldermen: And again, Ratio & prudentia nisi essent in senibus, non summum Concilium Majores nostri appellâssent Senatum; If reason and advisement were not in old men, our Ancestours had never called the highest Councel by the name of Senate.

But, though these reasons may well be given, yet we doubt not, but in this name of (Elders) for Governours, or Counsellours of State, there is a sign that the first Governours were the Fathers of Families; and under them the eldest Sons. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard, take the word (Signor) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordship and Dominion: signifying (according to Loyseau) puissance in propriety, or proper power. The kinds of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two: The one, Potestas aut imperium, Power or command: the other, Proprietas aut dominum; Propriety or mastership: The correlative of the one is the Subject; of the other, the Slave. Ad Cæsarem (saith he) potestas omnium pertinet; ad singulos proprietas; Cæsar hath power over all, and every man propriety in his own: And again, Cæsar omnia imperio possidet, singuli dominio; Cæsar holdeth all in his power, and every man poſſeſſeth his own. But as men and vice began abundantly to increaſe: ſo obedience (the fruit of natural reverence, which but from excellent ſeed ſeldome ripeneth) being exceedingly over-ſhadowed with pride, and ill examples, utterly withered and fell away. And the ſoft weapons of Paternal perſwaſions (after man-kind began to neglect and forget the Original and firſt giver of life) became in all over-weak, either to reſiſt the firſt inclination of evil, or after (when it became habitual) to conſtrain it. So that now, when the hearts of men were onely guided and ſteered by their own fancies, and toſt to and fro on the tempeſtuous Seas of the World, while Wiſdom was ſevered from power, and ſtrength from charity: Neceſſity (which bindeth every nature but the immortal) made both the wiſe and fooliſh underſtand at once, that the eſtate of reaſonable men would become far more miſerable than that of beaſts, and that a general floud of confuſion would a ſecond time over-flow them, did they not, by a general obedience to Order and Dominion, prevent it. For the mighty, who truſted in their own ſtrengths, found others again (by interchange of times) more mighty than themſelves: the feeble fell under the forcible; and the equal from equal received equal harms. Inſomuch, that the licentious diſorder (which ſeemed to promiſe a liberty upon the firſt acquaintance) proved, upon a better trial, no leſs perillous than unindurable bondage.

Neceſſitas eſt firmum judicium, & immutabilis providentiæ poteſtas.

Theſe Arguments, by Neceſſity propounded, and by Reaſon maintained and confirmed, perſwaded all Nations which the Heavens cover, to ſubject themſelves to a Maſter, and to Magiſtracy in ſome degree. Under which Government, as the change (which brought with it leſs evil, than the former miſchiefs) was generally pleaſing: ſo time (making all men wiſe that obſerve it) found ſome imperfection and corroſive in this cure. And therefore the ſame Neceſſity which invented, and the ſame Reaſon which approved, Sovereign power, bethought it ſelf of certain equal rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundleſs) might alſo diſcern her own limits. For before the invention of Laws, private affections in ſupream Rulers made their own fancies both their Treaſurers and Hangmen; meaſuring by this Yard, and weighing in this Ballance, both good and evil.

For as wiſedom in Elderſhip preceded the rule of Kings; ſo the will of Kings forewent the inventions of Laws. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: arbitria principum pro legibus erant; The people were not governed by any other laws than the wills of Princes. Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did thoſe men's Virtues value them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor thoſe men's Vices deforme them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt; Love ſees one while too much, another while ſtark nothing. Hence it came to paſſe, that after a few years (for direction and reſtraint of Royal power) Laws were eſtabliſhed: and that Government which had this mixture of equality (holding in an even Ballance ſupreme power and common right) acquired the title of Regal: the other (which had it not) was known for Tyrannical: the one, God eſtabliſhed in favour of his people; the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancy of this Regal authority, Princes as they were choſen for their virtues only, ſo did they meaſure their powers by a great deal of moderation. And therefore (ſaith Fabius Pictor) Principes, quia juſti erant, & religionibus dediti, jure habiti Dii & dicti; Princes becauſe they were juſt and religious, were rightly accounted and called Gods. De aureo ſæculo, part 1.

And though (ſpeaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be aſcribed to Reaſon and Neceſſity; yet it was God himſelf that firſt kindled this light in the minds of men, whereby they ſaw that they could not live and be preſerved without a Ruler and Conductor: God himſelf by his eternal providence having ordained Kings; and the Law of Nature, Leaders, and Rulers over others. For the very Bees have their Prince; the Deer their Leaders; and Cranes (by order impoſed) watch for their own ſafety. The moſt High beareth rule over the Kingdoms of Men; and appointeth over it whomſoever he pleaſeth. By me (ſaith Wiſedom, ſpoken by the Son of God) Kings reign; By me Princes rule. And it is God (ſaith Daniel) that ſetteth up Kings, and taketh away Kings. And that this power is given from God, Chriſt himſelf witneſſeth, ſpeaking to Pilate; Thou couldeſt have no power at all againſt me, except it were given thee from above. Dan. 5.21. Prov. 8. 15. Dan. 2.21. John 19. 11.

It was therefore by a threefold Juſtice that the World hath been governed from the beginning (to wit) by a Juſtice natural; by which the Parents and Elders of Families governed their Children, and Nephewes, and Families; in which government the Obedience was called natural Piety: Againe, by a Juſtice divine, drawn from the Laws and Ordinances of God; and the Obedience hereunto was called Conſcience: And laſtly, by a Juſtice civil, begotten by both both the former; and the Obedience to this we call Duty. That by these three, those of the eldest times were commanded, and that the rule in general was Paternal, it is most evident: for Adam, being Lord over his own Children, instructed them in the service of God his Creator; as we read, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had been taught by their Parent, the Father of Mankind.

§. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of Government, with their opposites: and of the degrees of humane society.

WHat other Policy was exercised, or State founded, after such time as mankinde was greatly multiplied before the Floud, it cannot be certainly known, though it seem by probable conjecture, that the same was not without Kings in that first Age: it being possible that many Princes of the Egyptians (remembred among their antiquities) were before the general Floud; and very likely, that the cruel Oppressions in that Age proceeded from some Tyranny in Government, or from some rougher form of Rule, than the Paternal.

Berosus l. 1. Berosus ascribeth the rule of the World in those days to the Gyants of Libanus, who mastered (saith he) all Nations from the Sun-rising to the Sun-set. But in the second Age of the World, and after such times as the rule of Eldership failed, three several sorts of Government were in several times established among men, according to the divers natures of Places and People.

The first, the most ancient, most general, and most approved, was the Government of one, ruling by just Laws, called Monarchy: to which Tyranny is opposed, being also a sole and absolute Rule, exercised according to the will of the Commander, without respect or observation of the Laws of God, or Men. For a lawful Prince or Magistrate (saith Aristotle) is the Keeper of Right and Equity: and of this condition ought every Magistrate to be, according to the rule of Deut. 16. 18. Gods word: Judges and Officers shalt thou make thee in thy Cities: And these shall judg the people with righteous judgment.

The second Government, is of divers principal Persons established by Order, and ruling by Laws, called Aristocracy, or Optimatum potestas; to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and usurpation of a few great-ones) is opposed: as the Decem viri, or Trium viri, and the like.

The third is a State popular, (or Government of the people) called Democratia, to which is opposed Ochlocratia, or the turbulent unjust ruling of the confused multitude, seditiously swaying the State, contrary to their own Laws and Ordinances. These three kinds of Government are briefly expresst by Tholosanus; unius, paucorum, & multorum; Of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of Policy since the second increase of mankind, the same grew in this sort: First of all, every Father, or eldest of the Family, gave Laws to his own issues, and to the people from him and them increased. These, as they were multiplied into many households (man by nature loving society) joyned their Cottages together in one common Field or Village, which the Latins call Vicus; of the Greek οἶκος, which signifies a House; or of the word (Via) because it hath divers waies and paths leading to it. And as the first House grew into a Village, so the Village into that which is called Pagus (being a society of divers Villages) so called of the Greeks πηγὴ which signifieth a Fountain: because many people (having their habitations not far asunder) drank of one Spring or Stream of Water. To this word the English Hundreds, or (as some think) Shires, answereth not unfitly.

But as men and impiety began to gather strength, and as emulation and pride, between the Race of the one and the other, daily increased: so both to defend themselves from out-rage, and to preserve such goods as they had gathered, they began to joyn and set together divers of their Villages, invironing them first with Banks and Ditches, and afterwards with Walls: which, being so compassed, were then called Oppida; either ab opponendo se hostibus, Because walls were opposed against Enemies; or ab opibus, because thither they gathered their riches for safety and defence: as also they were called Urbes, ab orbe; because when they were to build a City, they made a Circle with a Plough (saith Varro) therewith measuring and compassing the ground which they went to inclose or fortifie. And although Urbs and Civitas be often confounded, yet the difference was antiently in this, that Urbs signified no other than the very walls and buildings, and Civitas was taken for the Citizens, inhabiting therein: so called of Civis, and that, ab eo quòd multitudo coivit, of comming together. But all inhabitants within these walls are not properly Citizens, but only such as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the charge of the City,

City, may by turns become Officers and Magistrates thereof: the rest go under the name of Subjects, though Citizens by the same general name of Subjects are also known. For every Citizen is a Subject, but not every Subject a Citizen: perhaps also some Citizen (as the chief Magistrate, if he be to be tearmed one of the Citizens) is no Subject; but of this we need not stand to inquire. The word (Magistrate) is taken à Magistro, from a Master, and the word (Master) from the Adverb Magis (as also Magisteria, Precepts of Art) or else from the Greek word (Megistos) and so the Greeks call them Megistanes, whom the Latines call Magnates, or Magistratus.

The Office and Duty of every Magistrate, Arist. 5. Aristotle hath written in few words. A Magistrate or Prince (saith he) is the keeper of right and equity; but the same is best taught by Saint Paul, who expresseth both the cause efficient, and final, (that is) by whom Magistrates and Princes are ordained, together Rom 13. 4. with their Duties and Office. A Magistrate is the Minister of God for thy wealth; but if thou do evil, fear: for he beareth not the sword for nought. For he is the Minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth evil. He also Ver. 1, 2. teacheth in the same place; That every soule ought to be subject to the higher powers, because they are by God ordained, and that whosoever resisteth that power, resisteth God, the giver and fountain thereof: and shall not only be therefore subject to the judgment and con- Ibid. v. 5. demnation of Man, but of God: For ye must be subject (saith he) not because of wrath only, but also for conscience sake.

The examples are not to be numbred of Gods punishments, upon those that have resisted Authority, by God ordained and established. Neither ought any Subject therefore to resist the power of Kings, because they may be taxed with injustice or cruelty: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a tyrannous hand: and the Commandement of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himself subjected themselves to the power of Magistracy. Christ commanded that all due to Cæsar should be given unto him: and he payed Tribute for himself and Peter. Hierem. 29. 7. Hieremy commanded the Israelites (even those Gen. 20. 17. & 27. 10. that were Captives under Heathen Kings) to pray for them and for the peace of Babylon. So Abraham prayed for Abimelech; and Jacob blessed the King of Egypt: And it is acceptable in the sight of our Saviour (saith Paul) that ye make Supplications and Prayers for Kings, and for all that are in authority: and if for such Kings as were Idolatrous, much more for Christian Kings and Magistrates. And so much did Saint Chrysostom, in his Homily to the people, prefer Monarchical Government, as he rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) than that they should be wanting: Præstat Regem tyrannum habere, quàm nullum; Better a tyrannous King, than no King: to which also Tacitus subscribeth: Præstat (saith Tacitus in the first of his History) sub malo principe esse, quàm nullo; It is better to have a bad Prince than none at all. And be they good Kings (which is generally presupposed) then is there no liberty more safe, than to serve them: Neque enim libertas tutior ulla est (saith Claudian) quàm Domino servire bono; No liberty (saith he) more safe for us than to be servants to the virtuous. And certainly, howsoever it may be disputed, yet it is safer to live under one Tyrant, than under 100000. Tyrants: under a wise man that is cruel, than under the foolish and barbarous cruelty of the multitude. For as Agesilaus answered a Citizen of Sparta, that desired an alteration of Government, That kind of rule which a man would disdain in his own house, were very unfit to govern great Regions by.

Lastly, as many Fathers erect many Cotages for their many Children: and as (for the reason before remembred) many Housholds joyned themselves together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: so when these Cities and Citizens joyned together, and established Laws by consent, associating themselves under one Governour, and Government; they, so joyned, were called a Common-Wealth: the same being sometimes governed by Kings; sometimes by Magistrates; sometimes by the People themselves.

§. III.

Of the good Government of the first Kings.

NOw this first Age after the Floud, and after such time as the people were increased, and Families became strong, and they dispersed into several parts of the world, was by antient Historians called Golden: Ambition and Covetousness being as then but green, and newly grown up, the seeds and effects whereof were as yet but potential, and in the blowth and bud. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then sought for no larger Territory than themselves could compass and manure: they erected no other magnificent Buildings, than sufficient to defend them from cold and tempest:

tempest: they cared for no other delicacy of fare, or curiosity of dyet, than to maintain life: nor for any other apparel, than to cover them from the Cold, the Rain and the Sun.

And sure if we understand by that Age (which was called Golden) the antient simplicity of our Fore-fathers, this name may then truly be cast upon those elder times: but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may be attributed more to any one time than to another (I mean to one limited time and none else) it may be doubted. For good and Golden Kings make good and Golden Ages: and all times have brought forth of both sorts. And as the infancy of Empiry (when Princes played their Prizes, and did then only woo men to obedience) might be called the Golden Age; so may the beginning of all Princes times be truly called Golden. For be it that men affect honour, it is then best purchased; or if honour affect men, it is then that good deservings have commonly the least impediments: and if ever Liberality overflow her banks and bounds, the same is then best warranted both by policy and example. But Age and Time, do not only harden and shrink the openest and most Jovial hearts, but the experience which it bringeth with it, layeth Princes torn estates before their eyes, and (withal) perswadeth them to compassionate themselves. And although there be no Kings under the Sun whose means are answerable unto other mens desires: yet such as value all things by their own respects, do no sooner find their appetites unanswered, but they complain of alteration, and account the times injurious and Iron. And as this falleth out in the Reign of every King, so doth it in the life of every man, if his daies be many: for our younger years are our Golden Age; which being eaten up by time, we praise those seasons which our youth accompanied: and (indeed) the grievous alterations in our selves, and the pains and diseases which never part from us but at the grave, make the times seem so differing and displeasing: especially the quality of man's nature being also such, as it adoreth and extolleth the passages of the former, and condemneth the present state how just soever: Fit humanæ malignitatis vitio, ut semper vetera in laude, præsentia in fastidio sint; It comes to pass (saith Tacitus) by the vice of our maligenity, that we alwaies extol the time past, and hold the present fastidious: For it is one of the errors of wayward Age: Quod sint laudatores temporis acti; That they are praisers of fore-passed times, forgetting this advice of Solomon: Say not then, Why is it that the former daies were better then these? For thou doest not inquire wisely of this thing: to which purpose Seneca; Majores nostri questi sunt, & nos queri-mur, posteri querentur, eversos esse mores, regnare nequitiam, in deterius res hominum & in omne nefas labi: Our ancestors have complained, we do complain, our Children will complain, that good manners are gone, that wickedness doth reign, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into all evil. These are usually the Discourses of Age and Misfortune. But hereof what can we add to this of Arnobius? Nova res quandoque vetus fiet, & vetus temporibus; quibus cæpit nova fuit & repentina. Whatsoever is new, in time shall be made old: and the antientest things when they took beginning were also new and sodain. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontentment of present times have made Golden, this we may set down for certain, That as it was the virtue of the first Kings, which (after God) gave them Crowns: so the love of their people thereby purchased, held the same Crowns on their heads. And as God gave the obedience of Subjects to Princes: so (relatively) he gave the care and justice of Kings to the Subjects; having respect, not only to the Kings themselves, but even to the meanest of his Creatures: Nunquam particulari bono servit omne bonum; The infinite goodness of God doth not attend any one only: for he that made the small and great, careth for all alike: and it is the care which Kings have of all theirs, which makes them beloved of all theirs; and by a general love it is, that Princes hold a general obedience: For, Potestas humana radicatur in voluntatibus hominum: All humane power is rooted in the will or dispositions of men.

§. IV.

Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vain vaunt thereof without virtue.

AND with this Supreme Rule and Kingly authority, began also other degrees and differences among Subjects. For Princes made election of others by the same Rule, by which themselves were chosen; unto whom they gave place, trust, and power. From which imployments and Offices sprung those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which have continued from Age to Age, to these daies. But this Nobility, or difference from the vulgar, was not in the beginning given to the Succession of Bloud, but to Succession of Virtue, as hereafter may be proved. Though at length it was sufficient for

for those whose Parents were advanced, to be known for the Sons of such Fathers: and so there needed then no endeavour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excell, upon whom glory or worldly Nobility necessarily descended. Yet hereof had Nobility denomination in the beginning, That such as excelled others in virtue, were so called: Hinc dictus Nobilis, quasi virtute præ aliis notabilis. But after such time as the deserved Honour of the Father was given in reward to his Posterity, Saint Jerom judged of the Succession in this manner: Nihil aliud video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobiles quadam necessitate constringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent; I see no other thing to be affected in Nobility, than that Noblemen are by a kind of necessity bound, not to degenerate from the virtue of their Ancestors. For if Nobility be Virtus & antiquæ divitiæ; Virtue, and antient riches, then to exceed in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glory, and the like, do no otherwise define Nobility, than the word (animal) alone doth define a reasonable man. Or if honour (according to L. Vives) be a witness of virtue and well-doing: and Nobility (after Plutarch) the continuance of Virtue in a Race or Linage: then are those in whom Virtue is extinguished, but like unto Painted and Printed Papers, which ignorant men worship in stead of Christ, our Lady, and other Saints: men in whom there remain but the dregs and Vices of antient Virtue: Flowers, and Herbs, which by change of soile and want of manuring are turned to Weeds. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountains, if in all the rest of their course they run foule, filthy, and defiled? Ex terra fertili producitur aliquando Cicuta venenosa, ex terra sterili pretiosum Aurum; Out of fruitful ground ariseth sometimes poysoning Henbane, and out of barren soyle precious Gold. For as all things consist of matter and form, so doth Charron (in his Chapter of Nobility) call the Race and Linage but the matter of Nobility: the form (which gives life and perfect being) he maketh to be Virtue, and Quality, profitable to the Common-weal. For he is truly and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profession of publike Virtue, serving his Prince and Country, and being descended of Parents and Ancestors that have done the like. And although that Nobility, which the same Author calleth personal (the same which our selves acquire by our Virtue and well deservings) cannot be ballanced with that which is both natural by Descent, and also Personal; yet if Virtue be wanting to the natural, then is the personal and acquired Nobility, by many degrees, to be preferred: For (saith Charron) this Honour (to wit) by Descent, may light upon such a one, as in his own nature is a true Villain. There is also a third Nobility, which he calleth Nobility in Parchment, bought with Silver or Favour: and these be indeed but Honours of affection, which Kings, with the change of their Fancies, wish they knew well how to wipe off again. But surely, if we had as much sense of our degenerating in worthiness, as we have of vanity in deriving our selves of such and such Parents, we should rather know such Nobility (without Virtue) to be shame and dishonour, than Nobleness and glory to vaunt thereof. What calamity is wanting (saith Bernard) to him that is born in sin, of a Potshare body and barren mind? For (according to the same Father) Dele fucum fugacis honoris hujus, & malè coronatæ nitorem gloriæ, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, and the glittering of the ill-crowned glory, that then thou mayest consider thy self nakedly: for thou camest naked out of thy Mothers wombe. Camest thou thence with thy Mytre, or glistering with Jewels, or garnished with Silks, or adorned with Feathers, or stuffed with Gold? If thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration, as certain morning clouds, which do or will soon pass over, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poor, and wretched, and miserable man, and blushing, because he is naked, and weeping, because he is born, and repining, because he is born to labour, and not to honour.

Bern. l. 2. de Consider. ad Eugen. Pap.

For, as touching the matter of all men, there is no difference between it and dust: which if thou dost not believe (saith St. Chrysostom) look into the Sepulchres and Monuments of thy Ancestors, and they shall easily perswade thee by their own example, that thou art dust and dirt: so that if man seem more noble and beautiful than dust, this proceedeth not from the diversity of his Nature, but from the cunning of his Creatour.

CHAP.

Chap. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about thoſe times.

§. I.

That Nimrod was the firſt after the Floud that reigned like a Sovereign Lord: and that his beginning ſeemeth to have been of juſt authority.

THe firſt of all that reigned as Sovereign Lord, after the Floud, was Nimrod, the Son of Chuſh, diſtinguiſhed by Moſes from the reſt (according to S. Auguſtine) in one of theſe two reſpects: either for his eminency, and becauſe he was the firſt of fame, and took on him to command others: or elſe, in that he was begotten by Chuſh, after is other children were alſo become Fathers; and of a later time than ſome of his Grand-children and Nephews. Howſoever, ſeeing Moſes in expreſs words, calleth Nimrod the Son of Chuſh, other mens conjectures to the contrary, ought to have no reſpect.

This Empiry of Nimrod, both the Fathers, and many later Writers call tyrannical: the ſame beginning in Babel (which is) confuſion. But it ſeemeth to me, that Melanchthon conceived not amiſs hereof: the ſame expoſition being alſo made by the Authour of that Work, called Onomaſticum Theologicum, who affirms that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, A bitter, or ſevere Governour, becauſe his form of Rule ſeemed, at firſt, farr more terrible than Paternal authority. And therefore is he in this reſpect alſo called A mighty Hunter: becauſe he took and deſtroyed both beaſts and thieves. But S. Auguſtine underſtands it otherwiſe, and converts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mighty Hunter againſt God: Sic ergo intelligendus eſt Gigas ille, Venator contra Dominum; So is that Giant to be underſtood, a Hunter againſt the Lord.

But howſoever this word (A mighty Hunter) be underſtood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all thoſe which went with him from the Eaſt into Shinaar: ſo, this charge was rather given him, than by him uſurped. For it no where is found, that Noah himſelf, or any of the Sons of his own body, came with this troop into Babylon: no mention at all being made of Noah (the years of his life excepted) in the ſucceeding Story of the Hebrews; nor that Sem was in this diſobedient troop, or among the builders of Babel.

The ſame is alſo confirmed by divers Hiſtorians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Joctan, were the Captains and Leaders of all thoſe which came from the Eaſt. And though Sem came not himſelf ſo farr as Shinaar (his lot being caſt on the Eaſt parts) yet from his Son's Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebrews (according to the generall opinion) took beginning, who inhabited the Southermoſt parts of Chaldæa, about the City of Ur; from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And becauſe thoſe of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldæa, were no partners in the unbelieving work of the Tower: therefore (as many of the Fathers conjecture) did they retain the firſt and moſt ancient language, which the Fathers of the firſt Age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his Iſſues: In familia Heber remanſit hæc lingua; In the family of Heber this language remained (ſaith Saint Auguſtine out of Epiphanius) and this Language Abraham uſed; yea, it was anciently, and before the Floud, the general ſpeech: and therefore firſt called (ſaith Cœleſtinus) lingua humana: the humane tongue.

We know that Goropius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moſes, Ægyptius, Vergara, and others, is of another opinion; but howſoever we determine of this point, we may with good probability reſolve, that none of the godly ſeed of Sem were the chief Leaders of this preſumptuous multitude. And ſeeing it is not likely, but that ſome one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by juſt authority, than violence of uſurpation.

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus were three distinct Persons.

BEnzo, and out of him Nauclerus, with others, make many Nimrods; Eusebius confounds him with Belus, and so doth Saint Hierom upon Ose; and these words of Saint Augustine seem to make him of the same Opinion: Ibi autem Ninus regnabat post mortem patris sui Beli, qui primus illic regnaverat 65. annos; There did Ninus reign after the death of his father Belus, who governed in Babylon sixty five years. But it could not be unknown to Saint Augustine, that Nimrod was the Establisher of that Empire: Moses being plain and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrods Kingdom (saith he) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar; wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly, it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Ninus his time, the World was marvellously repleniſhed. And if S. Augustine had undoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would have given him the name which the Scriptures give him, rather than have borrowed any thing out of prophane Authours. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus illic regnaverat; Who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words do not disprove that Nimrod was the Founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Julius Cæsar overthrew the liberty of the Romane Common-wealth, making himself perpetual Dictator; yet Augustus was the first established Emperour, and the first that reigned absolutely by soveraign Authority over the Romans, as an Emperour.

The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternity, laying the foundation of soveraign rule, as Cæsar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with general allowance, exercised such a power. Pererius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them, both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. years after the Floud (as they account) that Belus reigned; but such agreement of times proves it not. For, so Edward the third, and his Grand-child, Richard the second, were Kings both in one year: the one died; the other in the same year was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is farr more probable than that of Mercator; who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For, it is plain, that the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom was Babel, and the Towns adjoining: but the first, and most famous work of Ninus, was the City of Ninive.

Now, whereas D. Siculus affirmeth, that Ninus overcame and suppreſt the Babylonians, the same rather proveth the contrary, than that Ninus and Nimrod were one Person. For Ninus established the seat of his Empire at Ninive in Assyria, whence the Babilonians might (perchance) in disdain thereof fall from his obedience, whom he recovered again by strong hand; which was easie: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis time.

—Dicitur altam
Coctilibus muris cinxisse Semiramis Urbem.

Semiramis with walls of Brick, the City did incloſe.

Further, where it is alledged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mighty; so Justine hath the same of Ninus, which is one of Mercator's Arguments; it may be answered, that such an addition might have been given to many other Kings as well. For, if we may believe Justine; then were Vexoris King of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia, mighty Kings before Ninus was born. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the undertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference between them.

For, whereas Mercator conceiveth, that it was too early, for any that lived about the time of the confusion of Languages, to have invaded and mastered those Cities so farr removed from Babel, namely, Erech, Accad, and and Chalne: which work he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest undertaking; and consequently would have Nimrod to have been long after the time, in which we suppose he flouriſhed; and both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one Person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I do not find that supposition true, That ever Nimrod invaded any of these Cities; but that he founded them, and built them from the ground, being the first after the Floud, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hand.

Besides, whereas these Cities, in many mens opinions, are found to stand farr away from Babylon, I find no reason to bring me to that belief. The City of Accad, which the Septuagint calls Archard; and Epiphanius, Arphal; Junius takes it to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for for the Region thereabout, the Cosmographers (saith he) call Accabene for Accadene. Others understand Nisibis and Ninive, to be one City: so do Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran, but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, and Charran, are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accedene to be a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus, out of S. Hierom, calls Achad: and so do the Hebrews also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the City of Erec, which the Septuagint call Orech; S. Augustine, Oreg; and Pagninus, Erec; this place Junius understands for Aracca in Susiana: but there is also a City in Camagena, called Arace; and indeed, likelihood of name is no certain proof, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third City (called Chalne) some take it for Calinisis: of which Am. Mercellinus. S. Hierom takes it for Seleucia; Hierosolymitanus, for Ctesiphon: others do think it to be the Agrani upon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Judge of this Dispute, who teacheth us directly, that these Cities are not seated in so diverse and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdom (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne in the Land of Shinaar: so as in the Valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldæa (being all one) we must find them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) think, with Viterbiensis, that these four made but one Babylon, than that they were Cities farr removed, and in several Provinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalne from Babylon. Go you (saith Amos) to Chalne, and from thence go you to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistims. The Geneva Translation, favouring the former Opinion, to set these Cities out of Shinaar, hath a marginal note expressing that Shinaar was here named, not that all these cities were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldæ, from Babylon in Egypt: but I find little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrod's Empire, there was no such Babylon, nor any City at all to be found in Egypt: Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great City of Cairo, which was built long after, not farr from the place where stood Memphis the ancient City, but not so ancient as Babylon upon Euphrates. Now, that Chalne is situate in the valley of Shinaar, it hath been formerly proved in the Chapter of Paradise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Cities from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successive Kings.

Cap. 6. v. 2.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive; and that it is probable, out of Esay 23. 13. that Assur built Ur of the Chaldees.

NOw, as of Nimrod; so are the Opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great State of Babylon and Assyria: a controversie wearisomly disputed without any direct proof, conclusion, or certainty. But to me (of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voice of reason hath the best hearing) the Interpretation of Junius is most agreeable; who, besides all necessary consequence, doth not dis-join the sence of the Scriptures therein, nor confuse the understanding thereof. For in this sort he converteth the Hebrew Text: Erat enim principium Regni ejus Babel, & Erec, & Accad, & Chalne, in terra Shinaaris: è terra hac processit in Assyriam, ubi ædificavit Niniven (which is) For the beginning of his Kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar: and he went forth of this Land into Assyria, and built Ninive. So as Junius takes Assur in this place, not for any Person, but for the Region of Assyria; the Land being so called in Moses time, and before it. For certainly, the other construction (where the word Assur is taken for Assur the Son of Shem) doth not answer the order which Moses observeth through all the Books of Genesis, but is quite contrary unto it. For, in the beginning of the tenth Chapter, he setteth down the Sons of Noah, in these words: Now these are the generations of the Sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, unto whom Sons were born after the Flood: then it followeth immediately; The Sons of Japheth were Gomer, &c. so as Japheth is last named among Noah's Sons, be he eldest or youngest, because he was first to be spoken of: with whom (having last named him) he proceeds and sets down his Issue, and then the Issue of his Sons: first, the Issue of Gomer, Japheth's eldest Son; and then speaks of Javan and his Sons: for of the rest of that Family he is silent. Anon after, he numbereth the Sons of Ham, of which Chush was the eldest: and then the Sons of Chush and Mizraim; and afterwards of Canaan; leaving Shem for the last, because he would not dis-join the Story of the Hebrews. But after he beginneth with Shem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, unto Abraham, and ſo to Jacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to have brought in one of the Son of Shem, in the middle of the Generations of Ham, had been againſt order; neither would Moſes have paſt over ſo ſleightly the erection of the Aſſyrian Empire in one of the Sons of Shem, if he had had any ſuch meaning: it being the Story of Shem's Sons which he moſt attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the reſt of the Sons of Chuſh, becauſe he founded the Babylonian and Aſſyrian Empire: and in the eleventh Chapter, he returns to ſpeak of the building of Babel in particular, having formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with thoſe other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinaar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, ſo alſo in the eleventh he maketh no report of Shem, till ſuch time as he had finiſhed ſo much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then he beginneth with the Iſſue of Shem, which he continueth to Abraham and Iſrael. And of Junius opinion touching Aſſur, was Calvin: to which I conceive P. Comeſtor, in hiſtoria Scholaſtica, gave an entrance, who, after he had delivered this place in ſome other ſence, he uſeth theſe words: Vel intelligendum non eſt de Aſſur, filio Sem, &c. ſed Aſſur (id eſt, Regnum Aſſyriorum) inde egreſſum eſt, quod tempore Sarug proavi Abrahami factum eſt; (which is) Or elſe it is not to be underſtood of Aſſur the Son of Sem, &c. but Aſſur (that is, the Kingdom of the Aſſyrians) came from thence (videlicet, from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of Sarug the great Grand-father of Abraham. After which he reconcileth the difference in this ſort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the firſt Erector of the Aſſyrian Empire, or the firſt Founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium; Reſpecting the beginning; but others conceive that it had beginning from Ninus, which is alſo true, Quantum ad Regni ampliationem; Regarding the inlargement of the Empire. To this I may add the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Aſſur to be the Son of Nimrod: and ſo doth Methodius, and Viterbienſis, Saint Hierom, and Cyrillus, and now laſtly, Torniellus: who (ſaith he) took upon him that name of Aſſur after he had beaten the Aſſyrians, as Scipio did of Africanus, after his Conqueſt in Africa: and that Aſſur was a common name to the Kings of Aſſyria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Pſal. 81. Eſay 10. Oſe. 5. &c. But to help the matter, he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the Son of Irari. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Archbiſhop of Mentz in the year of Chriſt 854. an ancient and Learned Writer, underſtands this place with Comeſtor, or Comeſtor with him, agreeing in ſubſtance with that Tranſlation of Junius: to which words of Moſes he giveth this ſence: De hac terra Aſſyriorum pullulavit imperium, qui ex nomine Nini, Beli filii, Ninum condiderunt, urbem magnam, &c. Out of this Land grew the Empire of the Aſſyrians, who built Ninus the great City, ſo named of Ninus the Son of Belus. On the contrary, Calvin objecteth this place of Eſay: Behold the Land of the Chaldæans, this was no People, Aſſur founded it by the inhabitants of the Wilderneſs; than which there is no one place in the Scriptures, that hath a greater diverſity in the Tranſlation and Underſtanding; inſomuch as Michael de Palatio upon Eſay (though in all elſe very diligent) paſſeth it over. But Calvin ſeemeth hereby to inferr, that becauſe Aſſur founded the State of the Chaldæans, therefore alſo Aſſur, rather than Nimrod, eſtabliſhed the Aſſyrian Empire, and built Nineve: contrary to the former tranſlation of Junius, and to his own Opinion. Now, out of the Vulgar (called Hierom's Tranſlation) it may be gathered, that Aſſur both founded and ruined this Eſtate or City of the Chaldæans, by Eſay remembred: unto which City, People, or State, he plainly telleth the Tyrians, that they cannot truſt or hope for relief thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this City of Chaldæa, and that Eſtate, an example unto thoſe Phœnicians, whom in this place he fore-telleth of their ruine: which City of Chaldæa, being of ſtrength, and carefully defended, was (notwithſtanding) by the Aſſyrians utterly waſted and deſtroyed: whereby he giveth them knowledge, and fore-telleth them, that their own City of Tyre (invincible, as themſelves thought) ſhould alſo ſoon after be overturned by the ſame Aſſyrians: as (indeed) it was by Nebuchodonoſor. And theſe be the words after Hierom: Ecce terra Chaldæorum, talis populus non fuit, Aſſur fundavit eam, in captivitatem traduxerunt robuſtos ejus, ſuffoderunt domos ejus, poſuerunt eam in ruinam (which is) Behold the Land of the Chaldæans, ſuch a People there were not (or, this was no People, after the Geneva) Aſſur (or the Aſſyrians) founded it, they carried away their ſtrong men captive, they undermined their Houſes, and ruined their City. The Septuagint expreſs it but in a part of another Verſe, in theſe words: Et in terra Chaldæorum, & hæc deſolata eſt ab Aſſyriis, quoniam murus ejus corruit, making the ſence perfect by the preced ing verſe, which altogether may be thus underſtood: If thou go over to Chittim (which is Macedon, or Greece) yet yet thou ſhalt not reſt (ſpeaking to the Tyrians) neither in the Land of the Chaldæans, for this is made deſolate by the Aſſyrians, becauſe their walls fell together to the ground. Pagninus and Vatablus convert it thus: Ecce terra Chaſdiim, iſte populus non erat illic olim; nam Aſſur fundavit eam navibus, erexerunt arces illius; contriverunt ædes ejus, poſuit eam in ruinam: which may be thus Engliſhed: Behold the Land of the Chaldæans, this People was not once therein inhabiting: for Aſſur built it a harbour for Ships, they erected the Towers thereof; and again brake down the houſes thereof, and ruinated it. Junius, in the place of Ships, ſets the word (pro Barbaris) that is, for the Barbarians: and the Geneva, by the Barbarians. But this is undoubted, that the Prophet Eſay (as may be gathered by all the ſence of the Chapter) did therein aſſure the Tyrians of their future deſtruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terrour) he maketh choice to note the calamities of thoſe places, Cities, and Regions, by whoſe trade the ſtate and greatneſs of the Tyrians was maintained; as by the Cilicians from Tharſis, from the Macedonians, and other Grecians, under the name of Cittim; alſo by the Egyptians, the Chaldæans, and the reſt. For Tyre was then the Mart Town of the World moſt renowned. And (as it appears in our Diſcourſe of Paradiſe) not the leaſt part of her chief merchandize came in by the City Ur, or Urchoa in Chaldæa, where the body or chief ſtream of Euphrates (even that ſtream which runneth through Babylon and Otris, which now falleth into Tygris) had his paſſage into the Perſian Gulf: though now it be ſtopped up. For, as we have heretofore noted, the Arabians (that deſcended from Sheba and Raamah) dwelling on the Eaſt banks of the Perſian Gulf, trading with the Tyrians (as thoſe of Eden, Charran, and Chalne did) tranſported their merchandize by the mouth of Tygris, that is, from Teredon; and of Euphrates, that is, from Ur, or Urchoa: and and then by Babylon, and thence by River and over Land, they conveyed it into Syria, and ſo to Tyre; as they do this day to Aleppo. So then Ur of the Chaldees was a Port Town, and one of thoſe Cities which had Intelligence, trade, and exchange with the Tyrians: for it ſtood by the great Lakes of Chaldæa, through w^ch^, that part of Euphrates ran, which paſſage is now ſtopt up. Ejus curſum vetuſtas abolevit (ſaith Niger.) And Pliny: Locus ubi Euphratis oſtium fuit, flumen ſalſum; Time hath worn away the channel of Euphrates: the place where the mouth thereof was, is a Bay of ſalt water. Theſe things being thus, certainly (not without good probability) we may expound the City of the Chaldees, whoſe calamities Eſay here noteth for terrour of the Tyrians, to be the City anciently called Ur; and by Hecatæus, Camerina; by Ptolemy, Urchoa; and by the Greeks, Chaldæopolis, the City of Chaldæa: which the Sons of Shem, until Abrahams time, inhabited. And whereas, in all the Tranſlations, it is ſaid, that Aſſur both founded it and ruined it: it may be underſtood, that Aſſur the Founder was the Son of Shem; and Aſſur the deſtroyers were the Aſſyrians, by whom thoſe that inhabited Ur of Chaldæa, were at length oppreſſed and brought to ruine: which thing God fore-ſeeing, commanded Abraham thence to Carran, and ſo into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatablus and Pagninus converted (by Ships) do bear that ſence, the ſame may be the better approved, becauſe it was a Port Town: and the River ſo far up as this City of Ur was in ancient time navigable, as both by Pliny and Niger appeareth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be alſo in the Hebrew Text, it is no leſs manifeſt, that the moſt barbarous Arabians of the Deſart were and are the confronting, and next People of all other unto it. For Chaldæa is now called Arachaldar, which ſignifieth Deſart Lands, becauſe it joineth to that part of Arabia ſo called: and Cicero (calling thoſe Arabians by the name of Ituræans) addeth, that they are, of all other People, the moſt Salvage; calling them, Homines omnium maximè barbaros.

So as this place of Eſay, which breedeth ſome doubt in Calvin, proveth in nothing the contrary Opinion, nor in any part weakneth the former Tranſlation of Junius, nor the Interpretation of Comeſtor and Rabanus. For though other men have not conceived (for any thing that I have read) that Aſſur is in this place diverſly taken (as for the Son of Shem, when he is ſpoken of as a Builder of Ur; and when as a Deſtroyer thereof, then for the Aſſyrian Nation) yet certainly the evidence of the truth, and agreement of circumſtances ſeem to enforce it. And ſo this Founding of the City of the Chaldees by Aſſur (into which the moſt of the Poſterity of Shem that came into Shinaar, and were ſeparate for the Idolatry of the Chuſites and Nimrodians, retired themſelves) hath nothing in it to prove the ſame Aſſur built Nineve, or that the ſame Aſſur was all one with Ninus; except we will make Aſſur, who was the Son of Shem, both an Idolater, and the Son of Belus. For (out of doubt) Ninus was the firſt notorious ſacrificer to Idols; and the firſt that ſet up a Statue or Image to be honoured as God. Now, if Aſſur muſt be of that

Race,

Race, and not of the Family of Shem, as he must be, if he founded Ninive, then all those which seek to give him the honour thereof, do him by a thousand parts more injury, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Besides, if this supposed Assur, whom they make the Founder of Ninive (and so the Son of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Ninus; then what became of him? Certainly, he was very unworthy, and obscure, and not like to be the Founder of such an Empire, and such a City, if no man have vouchsafed to leave to Posterity his expulsion thence, and how he lost that Empire again, or quitted it to Ninus: whose acts and conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) farr differing from truth. It will therefore be found best agreeing to Scripture and to Reason, and best agreeing with the Story of that Age written by prophane Authours, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the first works and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moses; and that these works being finished within the Valley of Shinaar, he looked farther abroad, and set in hand the work of Ninus, lying neer unto the same stream that Babel and Chalne did: which work his Grand-child Ninus afterward amplified and finished, as Semiramis (this Ninus his wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to pass, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundress of the City which she onely finished: so also Ninus of Ninive: Quam quidam Babylonem potuit instaurare; She might repair or renew Babylon, saith S. Augustine. For so did Nebuchodonosor vaunt himself to be the Founder of Babylon also, because he built up again some part of the wall, over-born by the fury of the River: which work of his stood till Alexander's time, whereupon he vaunted thus: Is not this great Babel which I have built?

Dan. 4. 27.

§. IV.

Of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as farr as now they are known.

BUt to return to the Story, it is plain in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transfugium, and Julius Africanus surnamed Saturne) was the establisher of the the Babylonian Monarchy, of whom there is no other thing written, than that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those four Cities before remembred; Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne; and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Assyria, and in Assyria built four more Cities (to wit) Ninive, Rehoboth, Celah, and Resen. And seeing that he spent much time in building Babel it self, and those adjoining; and that his travels were many ere he came into Shinaar: that work of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large foundation of Ninive, and the other Cities of Assyria which he builded (considered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficulty than any thing performed by his Successours in many years after: to whose undertakings time had given so great an increase of People; and the examples and patterns of his beginning, so great advancement and encouragement: in whose time (saith Glycas) all these Nations were called Meropes, à sermonis linguarum terræque divisione; By reason that the earth and the speech were then divided.

Belus, or Bel, or Jupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after he had reigned 114. years; of whose acts and undertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he spent much of his time in disburdening the low Lands of Babylon, and dryiug and making firm ground of all those great Fens and overflown Marishes which adjoined unto it. For any of his Warrs or Conquests there is no report, other than of his begun enterprise against Sabatius King of Armenia, and those parts of Scythia, which Berosus calls Scythia Saga, whose Son and Successour Barzanes became subject and Tributary to Ninus, that followed the Warr to effect, which was by his Father Belus begun.

§. V.

That we are not to marvel how so many Kingdoms could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia.

THat so many Kingdoms were erected in all those Eastern parts of the World so soon after Nimrod (as by the Story of Ninus is made manifest) the causes were threefold (namely) Opportunity, Example, and Necessity. For Opportunity, being a Princess liberal and powerfull, bestoweth on her first Entertainers many times more benefits, than either Fortune can, or Wisdom ought; by whose presence alone the understanding minds of men receive all those helps and supplies, which they either want or wish for: so as every Leader of a troop (after the division of Tongues, and dispersion of People) finding these fair offers made unto them, held the power which they possest, and and governed by discretion all those People, whom they conducted to their destined places. For, it cannot be conceived, that when the Earth was first divided, mankind straggled abroad like Beasts in a Desart; but that by agreement they disposed themselves; and undertook to inhabite all the known parts of the World, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylon and Shinaar, which had Kings, and were Peopled in Ninus his time, would not have been possest in many hundreds of years after, as then they were; neither did those that were sent, and travelled farr off (order being the true Parent of prosperous success) undertake so difficult enterprises without a Conductor or Commander. Secondly, the example of Nimrod, with whom it succeeded well, strengthened every humour that aspired. Thirdly, Necessity resolved all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, and of honest dispositions, enjoy the harvest of their own Travels; nor those which were of little strength, secure themselves against forcible violence; nor those which sought after any proportion of greatness, either possess the same in quiet, or rule and order their own Ministers and Attendants.

That these causes had wrought these effects, the undertakings and Conquests of Ninus (the Son of Belus) made it apparent; for he found every where Kings and Monarchies, what way soever his Ambition led him in the Warrs.

But Nimrod (his Grand-father) had no companion King, to us known, when he first took on him Soveraignty and sole commandment of all those the Children of Noah, which came from the East into Babylonia: though in his life-time others also raised themselves to the same estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his Son and Successour) found Sabatius King of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerfull to resist his attempts; which Sabatius I take to be the same, which Justine calls Tanais; and should conjecture, that Mizraim had been his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some errour (as Justine placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seems to me, righty accounted by the Judicious and Learned Reineccius, all one with the great Sesostris, that lived certain Ages after Ninus. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65. years, according to the common account.

See more of this, l. 2. of this first Part, cap. 2. Sect. 6.

§. VI.

Of the name of Belus, and other names affines unto it.

WHence this second King and Successor of Nimrod had the name of Bell, or Belus, question hath been made; for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of addition) given by Ninus, than assumed by Belus himself.

Cyrillus against Julian calls the Father of Ninus, Arbelus, affirming that he was the first of all men that caused himself to be called a god: which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence derived. But Bel, as many Writers have observed, signifieth the Sun in the Chaldæan Tongue; and therefore did Ninus and Semiramis give that name to their Father, that he might be honoured as the Sun, which the Babylonians worshipped as a god. And as this Title was assumed in after-times by divers others of the Chaldæan Princes and Babylonian Satrapæ: so was it used (in imitation) by the chief of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians have conceived.

To this Bel, or Belus, pertain (as in affinity) those voices of Baal, Baalim, Belphegor, Beelphagor, Belsebub, and Beelsephon. Those that that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldæan, convert the word Baal by the Latine, Princeps militiæ, Chief in the Warr; though Daniel was so called (saith Suidas) Ob honorem explicationis arcanarum rerum; In honor of his expounding secrets. Saint Hierom makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to have the same signification: and saith, that the Idol of Babylon was so called, which Ninus in memory of his Father set up to be worshipped: to which, that he might add the more honour and reverence, he made it a Sanctuary and refuge for all offenders. Hence (saith Lyranus) came Idolatry, and the first use of Images into the World. Isidore doth interpret Bel by Vetus, old, or ancient; adding, that as among the Assyrians it is taken for Saturn, and the Sun: so, in the Punick or Carthaginian Language, it signifieth God: Glycas makes it an Assyrian name properly; and Josephus a Tyrian. He also affirmeth, that the Idol which the Moabites worshipped (by them erected on the Mountain Phegor, or Peor, and called Baal) is the same which the Latines call Priapus, the god of Gardens; which also was the Opinion of Saint Hierom. But, that the word Bel, or Beel, was as much to say, as God, appeareth by the word Beelzebub, the Idol of Accaron. For Bel, or Beel soundeth (God) and Sebub (Flies (Flies or Hornets) by which name (notwithstanding) the Jews expreſs the Prince of Devils. But the Prophet Oſe teacheth us the propher ſignification of this word from the voice of God himſelf; And at that day (ſaith the Lord) thou ſhalt call me Iſhi, and ſhalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouths. For, although the name of Baal, or Bahal, be juſtly to be uſed towards God; yet in reſpect that the ſame was given to Idols, God hath hated it, and forbad it. And the uſing of the word Bel among the Chaldæans for the Sun, was not, becauſe it properly ſignifieth the Sun, but becauſe the Sun there was worſhipped as God: as alſo the Fire was; tanquam Solis particula. As for the words compounded (before remembred) as Belphegor, and Belſephon; Belſephon is expounded out of Facius; Dominus ſpeculæ, vel cuſtodiæ: The Lord of the Watch-tower, or of the Guard: the other word noteth the Idol, and the place wherein it was worſhipped. It is written Belpeor, or Baalpeor: and Peor (they ſay) is as much as Denudavit; and therefore the word joined, expreſſeth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus, the Son of Saturn: for it was uſed among the Ancients, to name the Father Saturn, the Son Jupiter, and the Grand-child Hercules. Saturni dicuntur familiarum Nobilium, Regumque qui urbes condiderunt ſeniſſimi; primogeniti eorum Joves & Junones; Hercules vero nepotes eorum fortiſſimi. The ancienteſt of Noble Families and Kings which founded Cities, are called Saturns; their firſt-born, Jupiters and Junoes; their valiant Nephews, Hercules. But this Belus (ſaith L. Vives) was famous by reaſon of his Warlike Son, Ninus, who cauſed his Father to be worſhipped as a God by the name of Jupiter Babylonius, whom the Egyptians (tranſported by Dreams of their Antiquities) make one of theirs. For Neptune (ſay they) upon Lybia the Daughter of Epaphus, begat this Jupiter Belus, who was Father to Ægyptus. They add, that this Belus, carrying a Colony to the River of Euphrates, there built a City, in which he ordained Prieſts after the Egyptian manner. But, were there any Belus the Son of Epaphus and Iſis, or of Neptune and Lybia, or (with Euſebius) of Teglonus, who after the death of Apis married Iſis (Cecrops then reigning in Athens) the ſame was not this Babylonian Belus of whom we ſpeak, but rather ſome other Belus, of whom the Egyptians ſo much vaunted.

§. VII.

Of the worſhipping of Images, begun from Belus in Babel.

AS for the Babylonians Belus, he was the moſt ancient Belus, and the Inventor of Aſtronomy, if Pliny ſay true: from whence the Egyptians might borrow both the name and doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the ſame Author affirmeth, that it did remain in his time.

Of the Sepulchre of Belus, Strabo writeth thus: Over the River, ſaith he, there are Gardens, where they ſay the ruines of Belus his Tomb, which Xerxes brake up, are yet remaining. It was a ſquare Pyramis made of Brick, a furlong high, and on every ſide it had a furlong in breadth. It appears by Cyril againſt Julian, that he obtained divine worſhip yet living: for ſo he writes of him (calling him Arbelus.) Arbelus, vir ſuperbus & arrogans, primus hominum dicitur à ſubditis Deitatis nomen accepiſſe: Perſeverârunt igitur Aſſyrii, & finitimæ illis gentes ſacrificantes ei. Arbelus, a man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the firſt of all men that was ever honoured by their ſubjects with title of Deity; (or with the name of God) the Aſſyrians therefore, and the bordering Nations have perſevered, ſacrificing to him. Even Arius alſo, whom Suidas calls Thuras, who ſucceeded next after Ninus, was made an Idol-God among them, if we credit Suidas.

Strab. lib. 13. c 3.

L. 1. cont. Julian.

After Ninus (that is, after Ninias) Thuras reigned (ſaith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the Planet Mars; a man of ſharp and fierce diſpoſition, who bidding battel to Caucaſus, of the ſtock of Japheth, ſlew him. The Aſſyrians worſhipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus far Suidas. Neither is it unlikely but that any among Idolatrous Nations were Deified in their life-times, or ſoon after: though I deny not, but that the moſt of their Images and Statuæ were firſt erected without divine worſhip, onely in memory of the glorious acts of Benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiveth; and ſo afterward the Devil crept into thoſe wooden and brazen carcaſſes, when Poſterity had loſt the memory of their firſt invention. Hereof Iſidore ſpeaketh in this manner: Quos autem Pagani Deos aſſerunt, homines fuerunt, & pro uniuſcujuſque vitæ meritis vel magnificentia, coli apud ſuos poſt mortem cœperunt: ſed (Dæmonibus perſuadentibus) quos illi pro ſua memoria honoraverunt, minores Deos exiſtimârunt: ad iſta vero magis excolenda acceſſerunt Poetarum figmenta;

They

They were men (saith he) whom the Pagans affirmed to be gods: and every one for his merits or magnificence, began after his death to be honoured of his own: But, at length (the Devils perswading) they accounted them lesser gods, whose memories they honoured: and the Fictions of the Poets made the Opinions (concerning the honour of the dead) much more superstitious.

And, that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans, and Heathen Nations, it is not Isidore alone that witnesseth; but Gregory: Gentilitas (saith he) inventrix. & caput est Imaginum; Gentilism is the inventress and ground of Images: and Ambrose; Gentes lignum adorant, tanquam imaginem Dei; The Gentiles adore wood, as it were the Image of God. Eusebius also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshipping of images, a custom borrowed of the Heathen. The like saith S. Augustine against Adimantus. Et verentur (saith Lactantius) ne Religio vana sit, si nihil videant quod adorent; They fear their Religion would be vain, should they not see what they worship.

And (out of doubt) the Scholemen shift this fearfull custom very strangely. For, seeing the very workmanship is forbidden, how can the heart of a wise Christian satisfy it self with the distinction of Doulia, and Hyperdoulia, which can imply nothing but some difference of worshipping of those Images after they are made? And it is of all things the most strange, why religious and learned men should strain their wits to defend the use of those things, which the Scriptures have not only no where warranted, but expresly in many places forbidden, and cursed the practicers thereof. Yet this doctrine of the Devil was so strongly and subtilly rooted, as neither expres the Commandment of God himself, Thou shalt not make any graven Image, nor all the threatning of Moses and the Prophets after him, could remove, weed it, or by fear, or by any perswasions lead the hearts of men from it. For, where shall we find words of greater weight, or plainer instruction than these? Take therefore good heed to your selves (for ye saw no Image in the day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb, out of the midst of the fire) that ye corrupt not your selves, and make you a graven Image, or representation of any Figure, whether it be the likeness of Male or Female.

And, besides the expres Commandment, Thou shalt make thee no graven Image, and the prohibition of many Scriptures; so it is written in the Book of Wisdom, That, the invention of Idols was the beginning of Whoredom: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neither shall they continue for ever.

And whereas the Scholemen affirm, that the Prophets spake against the Worshipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest, that Moses spake of Images of the living God, and not of Baal, and the rest of that nature, For you saw no Image (saith Moses) that day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently said of Basil; Noli aliquam in illo formam imaginari, ne circumscribas eum mente tua: Do not imagine any form to be in God, lest thou limit or circumscribe him in thy mind too. Now, if the great Basil thought it a presumption unlawfull to represent a pattern of the infinite God to our own thoughts and minds, how farr do those men presume, that put him under the greasie Pencil of a Painter, or the rusty Axe or other Instrument of a Carpenter or Carver?

For as this dishonour to the infinite and incomprehensible God, began in Babel: so did the Devil transport and spread this invention into all the Regions adjoining, and into Egypt and Greece.

The Romans, for a while, resisted the erection of these Idols and Images, refusing to set them in their Temples for 170. years; observing the Law of Numa, who thought it impiety to resemble things most beautifull, by things most base. But, Tarquinius Priscus afterwards prevailing, and following the vanity of the Grecians (a Nation of all others under the Sun most deluded by Satan) set up the Images of their gods; which (as S. Augustine witnesseth) that learned Varro both bewailed, and utterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth; Simulachra deorum venerantur, illis supplicant, genu posito illa adorant; & cum haec suspiciant, fabros, qui illa fecere, contemnunt; The Images of the gods are worshipped, those they pray unto, with bended knees those they adore; and while they so greatly admire them, they contemn the Handicraftsmen that made them: which also Sedulius the Poet in this sort scoffed at:

Aug. de Civit. l. 4. c. 31.

Heu miseri qui vana colunt, qui corde siniſtro
Religiosa sibi sculpunt simulachra, suumque
Factorem fugiunt, & quae fecere, verentur!
Quis furor est? quae tanta animos dementia ludit?
Vt volucrem, turpemque bovem, torvumque Draconem,
Semi-hominemque-canem supplex homo pronus adoret.

Ah wretched they that worship vanities,
And consecrate dumb Idols in their heart,
Who their own Maker (God on high) despise,
And fear the work of their own hands & art!

What fury? what great madneſs doth beguile
Mens minds? that man ſhould ugly ſhapes adore
Of Birds, or Bulls, or Dragons, or the vile
Half-dog-half-man on knees for aid implore.

And though this device was barbarous, and firſt, and many years practiſed by Heathen Nations onely, till the Jews were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to ſcorn the ignorant ſtupidity of his Nation: but Juſtin Martyr remembreth how the Sybils inveighed againſt Images: and Hoſpinian, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the ſouls of men to erect and adore thoſe bables. Strabo and Herodotus witneſs, that the Perſians did not erect or ſet up any Statue of their Gods. Lycurgus never taught it the Lacedæmonians, but thought it impiety to repreſent immortal natures by mortal Figures. Euſebius alſo witneſſeth, in his Sixth Book, de præparatione Evangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Serica, or among the Brackmans in India, that Images ſhould be worſhipped. The ſame do Tacitus and Crinitus report of the antient Germans. Many other Authours might be remembred, that witneſs the diſdain which the Heathen themſelves had of this childiſh Idolatry: of which Hoſpinian hath written at large in his Tract, de origine imaginum. And it was truly ſaid, Omnia mala exempla bonis initiis orta ſunt, All ill examples have ſprung from good beginnings. The Heathen, at firſt, made theſe Statuæ and Images, but in memory of ſuch remarkable men, as had deſerved beſt of their Countries and common-wealths: Effigies hominum (ſaith Pliny) non ſolebant exprimi, niſi aliqua illuſtri cauſa perpetuitatem merentium: Men are not wont to make Pictures, but of men which merited for ſome notable cauſe to be perpetually remembred. And though of the more antient Papiſts, ſome have borrowed of the Gentiles (as appears in Lactantius) that defence for Images: That Simulachra are pro elementis literarum, ut per ea diſcerent homines Deum inviſibilem cognoſcere: Images ſay they, (and ſo before them the Heathen ſaid) are inſtead of Letters, whereby men might learn to know the inviſible God: in which underſtanding, perhaps, they no otherwiſe eſteemed them than pictures indeed; yet as that of Baal, or Bel, ſet up in memory of Belus the Babylonian, became afterward the moſt reverenced Idol of the world, by which ſo many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himſelf) were miſled and caſt away: ſo thoſe very ſtocks and ſtones, and painted canvaſes (called the pictures of Chriſt, our Lady, and others) were by thouſands of ignorant people, not onely adored, but eſteemed to have life, motion, and underſtanding. On theſe ſtocks we call (ſaith the Book of Wiſdom) when we paſs through the raging waves, on theſe ſtocks more rotten than the Ship that carries us.

This Heathen invention of Images became ſo fruitfull in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of gods, that they were forced to diſtinguiſh them into degrees and orders; as Dii conſentes, ſeu majorum gentium, ſelecti, Patritii, inſigniores, dii medii: Counſelling gods, or gods of the mightieſt Nobility, ſelect gods, Patrian, gods of mark, and Common gods (which the Romans called Medioxum) dii infimi, and terreſtrial Heroes, and multitudes of other gods, of which S. Auguſtine hath made large mention, in his Book, de Civitate Dei. But (ſaith Lactantius) among all thoſe miſerable ſouls, and rotten bodies, worſhipped by men more like to their Idols, did Epimenides Cretenſis (by what good Angel moved I know not) erect in the Athenian Fields, Altars to the unknown God, which ſtood with the ſame title and dedication, even to the times of S. Paul: who made them firſt know to whom theſe Altars belonged, and opened their eyes which were capable of grace, that they might diſcern the difference betwixt that light which lighteneth every man, and the obſcure and ſtinking miſt wherein the Devil had ſo many years led and miſ-led them. And it ſufficed not that the multitude of theſe gods was ſo great in general, or that every Nation had ſome one which took particular and ſingular care of them, as Jupiter in Crete, Iſis in Egypt, in Athens, Minerva, in Samos, Juno, in Paphos, Venus, and ſo of all other parts; but every City, and almoſt every Family, had a god apart. For, as it is written in the ſecond of Kings, the men of Babel made Succoth Benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Aſhima, and the Avites made Nibhaz and Tartak, and the Sepharvaims burnt their children in the fire to Adramelech. All which, how plainly hath the Prophet Eſay derided? Men cut down Trees, rind them, burn a part of them, make ready their meat, and warm themſelves by the fire thereof, and of the reſidue he maketh a god; an Idol, and prayeth unto it: but God hath ſhut their eyes from ſight, and their heart from underſtanding. It is therefore ſafeſt for a Chriſtian, to believe the Commandments of God, ſo direct againſt Idolatry, to believe the Prophets, and to believe S. Paul, who ſpeaketh thus plainly and feelingly, My beloved, flie from Idolatry; I ſpeak as unto them which have underſtanding, judge ye what I ſay.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

Of the Warrs of Ninus: and laſtly, of his Warr againſt Zoroaſter.

UNto this Belus ſucceeded Ninus, the firſt that commanded the exerciſe of Idolatry, the firſt that injuriouſly invaded his Neighbour Princes, and the firſt that, without ſhame or fear, committed Adultery in publick. But, as of Belus there is no certain memory (as touching particulars) ſo of this Ninus (whoſe Story is gathered out of profane Authors) I find nothing ſo warrantable, but that the ſame may be diſputed, and in the greateſt part doubted. For, although that piece of Beroſus, ſet out and commented upon by Annius, hath many good things in it, and giveth great light (as Chrytæus noteth) to the underſtanding of Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Halicarnaſſeus, and others: yet, Lodovicus Vives, B. Rhenanus, and others after them, have laid open the imperfection and defects of the Fragment; proving directly, that it cannot be the ſame Beroſus which lived in Alexander's time, cited by Athenæus and Joſephus: and whoſe Statue the Athenians erected, ſaith Pliny. Yet it is from him chiefly, that many have gathered the ſucceſſion of the Babylonian and Aſſyrian Princes, even from Nimrod, to the eighteenth King Aſcatades, and to the times of Joſua. For of Metaſthenes an Hiſtorian, of the Race of the Perſian Prieſts, there are found but certain Papers; or ſome few lines of the Chaldæan and Aſſyrian Monarchies: but he afterwards, in the collection of the Perſian Kings, is not without his errours.

Athen. lib. 14. Joſeph. cont. Appian. l. 1. & 7.

Cteſias, or Cnidus (a City joining to Halicarnaſſeus) who lived together with Cyrus the younger, and with Artaxerxes Mnemon, gathered his Hiſtory out of the Perſian Records, and reacheth as farr upwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and, though in the Story of Cyrus the younger, Xenophon approveth him in ſome things, and Athenæus, Pauſanias, and Tertullian cite him; yet ſo baſe and apparent are his flatteries of the Times and Princes with whom he lived, and ſo incredible are the numbers which he finds in the Armies of Ninus, and eſpecially of Semiramis; as whatſoever his reports were, times have conſumed his Works, ſaving ſome very few excerptions lately publiſhed.

And therefore in things uncertain, ſeeing a long diſcourſe cannot be pleaſing to men of judgment, I will paſs over the acts of this third Aſſyrian, in as few words as I can expreſs them. S. Auguſtine affirms, that Ninus maſtered all Aſia, India excepted. Others ſay that he wan it all, ſave India, Bactria, and Arabia. For he made Aricus of Arabia, the companion of his Conqueſts, with whom he entred into a ſtreight league of amity, becauſe he commanded many people, and was his kinſman, and a Chuſite, and the neereſt Prince confronting Babylonia. His firſt enterprize was upon Syria, which he might eaſily ſubdue, both becauſe he invaded it on the ſudden, and becauſe it lay next him: and alſo becauſe the Arabians and their King Aricus (which bordered Syria) aſſiſted him in the Conqueſt thereof.

The King of Armenia, Barzanes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aid him in his Warr againſt Zoroaſter: for from Armenia, he bent himſelf that way toward the Eaſt; but, that ever he commanded the leſſer Aſia, I do not believe, for none of his Succeſſors had any poſſeſſion therein.

His third Warr was againſt Pharnus, King of the Medes, whom it is ſaid that he overthrew, and cruelly murthered with his ſeven Children, though others affirm, that they all died in one battel againſt him. Whether he invaded Zoroaſter before the building or amplifying of Ninive, or after, it is uncertain. It is ſaid, that he made two Expeditions into Bactria: and, that finding little or ill ſucceſs in the firſt, he returned, and ſet the work of Ninive forward: and then a ſecond time entred Bactria with 1700000 Foot, and 200000 Horſe, and 100000 ſix hundred Chariots: being encountred by Zoroaſter with four hundred thouſand. But Ninus prevailing, and Zoroaſter being ſlain, he entred farther into the Countrey, and beſieged the chief City thereof, called Bactra, or Bactrion (ſaith Stephanus) which by a paſſage found, and an aſſault given by Semiramis (the Wife of Menon) he entred and poſſeſt. Upon this occaſion Ninus both admiring her judgment and valour, together with her perſon aud external beauty, fancied her ſo ſtrongly, as (neglecting all Princely reſpects) he took her from her Huſband, whoſe eyes he threatned to thruſt out, if he refuſed to conſent. He therefore yielding to the paſſion of love in Ninus, and to the paſſion of ſorrow in himſelf, by the ſtrong perſwaſions of ſhame and hiſhonour, caſt himſelf headlong into the Water, and died.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to have been the chief Author of Magick Arts: and of the divers kinds of Magick.

§. I.

That Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first inventer of Astrologie, or of Magick: and that there were divers great Magicians of this name.

ZOroaster, King of the Bactrians, Vincentius supposeth to be Cham the Son of Noah: a fancy of little probability. For Cham was the Paternal Ancestour of Ninus, the Father of Chus, the Grand-father of Nimrod, whose Son was Belus, the Father of Ninus. It may be that Vincentius had heard of that Book which was called Scripturæ Cham, devised by some wicked Knave, and so entituled; of which Sixtus Senensis hath made the due mention.

Cassian in Collat. Col. cap. 21. It is reported by Cassianus, that Serenus Abbas gave the invention of Magick to Cham the Son of Noah: so did Comestor in his Scholastical History; which Art (saith he) with the seven Liberal Sciences he writ in fourteen Pillars: seven of which were made of Brass, to resist the defacing by the Waters of the Floud; and seven of Brick, against the injury of fire. There was also another devised Discourse, which went under the title of Prophetia Cham. Cassianus out of Serenus hath somewhat like this of Comestor. These be Cassianus words: Cham (filius Noah) qui superstitionibus istis & sacrilegis fuit artibus infectus, sciens nullum se posse super his memorialem librū in Arcam prorsus inferre, in qua erat cum patre justo, &c. Cham the (the Son of Noah) who was infected with these superstitions and sacrilegious Arts, knowing that he could not bring any Book or memorial of that nature into the Ark, wherein he was to remain with his godly Father, caused the Precepts and Rules thereof to be graven in Metal, and hard Stone.

Saint Augustine noteth that Zoroaster was said to have laught at his birth, when all other children weep; which presaged the great knowledge which afterward he attained unto; being taken for the Inventer of natural Magick and other Arts; for the Corrupter, saith Pliny and Justine. But I do not think that Zoroaster invented the doctrine of the Horoscopes, or Nativities: or first found out the nature of Herbs, Stones, and Minerals, or their Sympathetical, or Antipathetical workings; of which, I know not what King of Chaldæa is also made the Inventer. I rather think that these knowledges were far more ancient, and left by Noah to his Sons. For Abraham, who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster (as Josephus reporteth) was no less learned herein than any other in that age, if he exceeded not all men then living: differing from the wisdom of after-times in this, that he knew, and acknowledged, the true cause, and giver of life and virtue to Nature, and all natural things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, dispersed, and universal power) admired the Instruments, and did attribute proper strength to the things themselves (from which the effects were sensible) which belonged to that wisdom, Which being one, and remaining in it self, can do all things, and reneweth all. Wisd. c. 7.

Now, whether this Zoroaster (overthrown by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist, it is doubted. For Zoroaster the Magician, Ctesias calls Oxyartes, whom Pliny finds of a later time. And if Zoroaster were taken away by a Spirit (being in the midst of his Disciples) as some Authours report, then Zoroaster, slain by Ninus, was not the Magician: which is also the opinion of Scaliger.

Again, Josephus, and Cedrenus affirm, that Seth first found out the Planets, or wandring Stars, and other motions of the Heavens: for if this Art had been invented by Zoroaster, he could not have attained to any such excellency therein, in his own life-time; but being a man (as it seemeth) of singular judgment, he might add somewhat to this kind of knowledge, and leave it by writing to Posterity. Scalig. in Euseb. Joseph. l. 1. Antiq. c. 4.

But of this Zoroaster, there is much dispute: and no less jangling about the word and Art of Magick. Arnobius remembreth four, to whom the name of Zoroaster, or Zorcastres was given: which by Hermodorus and Dinon seemeth to be but a cognomen, or name of art, and and was as much to say, as Astrorum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the same that Ninus overthrew: the second, a Chaldæan, and the Astronomer of Ninus: the third was Zoroaster Pamphylius, who lived in the time of Cyrus, and his familiar: the fourth, Zoroaster Armenius, the Nephew of Hostianes, which followed Xerxes into Greece: between whom and Cyrus, there past threescore and eighteen years. Suidas remembreth a fifth, called Persomedus sapiens: and Plato speaketh of Zoroaster the Son of Oromasdes; which Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now, of what Nation the first and chief Zoroaster was, it is doubted. Pliny and Laertius make him a Persian. Gemistheus, or Pletho, Ficinus and Stenchius, make him a Chaldæan. But by those Books of one Zoroaster, found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainly, that the Author of them was a Chaldæan by Nation, though the word (Chaldæan) was as often given to the learned Priests peculiarly, as for any distinguishment of Nations. Porphyrius makes the Chaldæi and Magi divers; Picus, the same. But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldæan both by Nation and Profession, it appeareth by his Books, which (saith Picus) were written in the Chaldæan Tongue; and the Comment in the same Language. Now, that the Magi and they were not differing, it may be judged by the name of those Books of Zoroaster, which in an Epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, he saith, to be intituled, Patris Ezre Zoroastris & Melchior magorum oracula.

§. II.

Of the name of Magia; and that it was anciently far divers from Conjuring and Witchcraft.

Pic. Mir. fol. 81. NOw, for Magick it self; which Art (saith Mirandula) Pauci intelligunt, multi reprehendunt; Few understand, and many reprehend; Et sicut Canes ignotos semper allatrant; As Dogs bark at those they know not: so they condemn and hate the things they understand not: I think it not amiss (leaving Ninus for a while) to speak somewhat thereof.

It is true, that many men abhorr the very name and word (Magos) because of Simon Magus, who being indeed, not Magus, but goes (that is) familiar with evil Spirits, usurped that Title. For Magick, Conjuring, and Witchery, are farr differing Arts, whereof Pliny being ignorant, scoffeth thereat. For Nero (saith Pliny) who had the most excellent Magicians of the East, sent him by Tyridates King of Armenia, who held that Kingdom by his grace, found the Art, after long study and labour, altogether ridiculous.

Plin. l. 30. Hist. Nat. Porphyr. & Apul.

Magus is a Persian word primitively, whereby is expresst such a one as is altogether conversant in things Divine. And (as Plato affirmeth) the Art of Magick is the Art of worshipping God. To which effect Apollonius in his Epistles expounding the word (μάγος) saith, that the Persians called their gods μάγους: whence he addeth, that Magus is either ὁ θεραπεύων θεὸς, or θεραπευτὴς θεῶν (that is) that Magus is a name sometimes of him that is a God by nature; sometimes of him that is in the service of God: in which latter sence it is taken, Mat. 2. v. 1. And this is the first and highest kind: which Piccolominie calleth divine Magick: and these did the Latines newly entitle Sapientes, or Wisemen: For, the fear and worship of God is the beginning of knowledge. These Wisemen the Greeks call Philosophers: the Indians, Branchmans; which name they somewhat neerly retain to this day, calling their Priests Bramines; among the Egyptians they were tearmed Priests; with the Hebrews they were called Cabalists, Prophets, Scribes, and Pharisees: amongst the Babylonians they were differenced by the name of Chaldæans: and among the Persians, Magicians: of whom Arnobius (speaking of Hostanes, one of the ancient Magicians) useth these words: Et verum Deum merita majestate prosequitur, & Angelos ministros Dei, sed veri ejus veneration novit assistere. Idem dæmonas prodit terrenos, vagos, humanitatis inimicos; Sostenes (for so M. Felix called him, not Hostanes) ascribeth the due Majesty to the true God, and acknowledgeth that his Angels are ministers and messengers which attend the Worship of the true God. He also hath delivered that there are Devils earthly, and wandering, and enemies to man-kind.

Plato in Alcib.

Piccol. de Desiu. Prov. 1. 7, John Hug. Linschot.

In Octavio Minutii Felicis cum Arnobio p. 360.

His Majesty also, in his first Book of Demonologie, ch. 3. acknowledgeth, that in the Persian Tongue the word (Magus) imports as much a contemplator of divine and heavenly science; but unjustly so called, because the Chaldæans were ignorant of the true Divinity. And it is also right which His Majesty avoweth, that under the name of Magick, all other unlawfull Arts are comprehended, and yet doth His Majesty distinguish it from Necromancy, Witchcraft, and the rest: of all which he hath written largely, and most learnedly. For the Magick which His Majesty condemneth, is of that kind whereof the Devil is a party. Daniel in his second Chap. nameth four kinds of those Wisemen: Arioli, Magi, Malefici, and Chaldæi. Arioli the old Latine Translation calleth Sophistas: Vatablus and Pagninus, Genethliacos, or Physicos, or Philosophers, Dæmonol. l. 2. c. 1.

Philosophers, or (according to the note of Vatablus) Naturalists: Nempe sunt Magi apud Babaros, quod Philosophi apud Græcos (scilicet) divinarum humanarumque rerum scientiam profitentes; For the Magi are the same with the Barbarians, as the Philosophers are with the Grecians (that is) men that profess the knowledge of things both divine and humane. The Greek and the English call them Inchanters; Junius, Magicians; Castalion, Conjecturers: in the Syrian, they are all four by one name called Sapientes Babylonis; The Wisemen of Babel.

The second sort Vatablus, Pagnin, Junius, and our English, call Astrologers; Hierom and the Septuagint, Magicians.

The third kind are Malefici or Venefici; in Hierom, Pagnin, and the Septuagint, Witches, or Poisoners: in Junius, Præstigiatores, or Sorcerers, as in English.

That Witches are also rightly so called Venefici, or Poisoners; and that indeed there is a kind of Malefici, which, without any Art of Magick or Necromancie, use the help of the Devil to do mischief, His Majesty confirmeth in the first Chapter of his second Book: speaking also in the fifth Chapter of their practice, to mix the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Devil prepared; and at other times to make Pictures of Wax, or Clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things which the Devil by other means bringeth to pass.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldæans: who took upon them to foretell all things to come, as well natural as humane, and their events: and this they vaunted to perform by the influences of the Stars, by them observed, and understood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are, the corruptions, which have made odious the very name of Magick, having chiefly sought (as is the manner of all Impostures) to counterfeit the highest and most noble part of it, yet so as they have also crept into the inferiour degrees.

A second kind of Magick, was that part of Astrologie, which had respect to sowing and planting, and all kinds of Agriculture and Husbandry: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Starrs into those lower Elements.

Philo Judæus goeth farther, affirming, that by this part of Magick, or Astrologie, together with the motions of the Starrs, and other heavenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he lived in Chaldæa: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognovit Creatorem (saith Jo. Damascen) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. Josephus reporteth of Abraham, that he instructed the Egyptians in Arithmetick and Astronomie, who before Abraham's coming unto them knew none of these Sciences.

De vit. sanct. Glyc. Annal fol. 180.

And so doth Archangelus de Burgo, in defence of Mirandula against Garsias: Alexander & Eupolemon dicunt, quòd Abraham sanctitate & sapientiâ omnium præstantissimus, Chaldæos primùm, deinde Phœnices, demum Ægyptios Sacerdotes Astrologiam & divina docuerit; Alexander (saith he, meaning Alexander Polyhistor) and Eupolemon affirm, that Abraham, the holiest and wisest of men, did first teach the Chaldæans, then the Phenicians; lastly, the Egyptian Priests, Astrologie, and divine Knowledge.

The third kind of Magick containeth the whole Philosophy of Nature; not the brabblings of the Aristotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmost virtues, and draweth them out of Nature's hidden bosome to humane use: Virtutes in centro centri latentes; Virtues hidden in the center of the center, according to the Chymists. Of this sort were Albertus, Arnoldus de villa nova, Raymond, Bacon, and many others: and before these, in elder-times, and who better understood the power of Nature, and how to apply things that work to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyanæus, remembred by S. Hierom to Paulinus; in some mens Opinion, Numa Pompilius among the Romans: among the Indians, Thespian: among the Egyptians, Hermes: among the Babylonians, Budda: the Thracians had Zamolxis: the Hyperboreans (as is supposed) Abbaris: and the Italians, Petrus Aponensis. The Magick which these men profest, is thus defined: Magia est connexio à viro sapiente agentium per naturam cum patientibus, sibi congruenter respondentibus, ut inde opera prodeant, non sine eorum sine admiratione qui causam ignorant: Magick is the connexion of natural agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by a wise man, to the bringing forth of such effects as are wonderfull to those that know not their causes. In all these three kinds, which other men divide into four, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned; especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles he confesseth God to be the Creator of the Universal: he believeth of the * Trinity, which he could not investigate by any natural knowledge: he speaketh of Angels, and of Paradise: approveth the immortality of the Soul: teacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, and Love, discoursing of the Abstinence and Charity of the Magi: which Oracles of his, Psellus, Ficinus, Patritius, and others, have gathered and translated.

Of

Of this Zoroaster, Euseb. in the Theologie of the Phœnicians, using Zoroaster's own words: Hæc ad verbum scribit (saith Eusebius) Deus primus incorruptibilium, sempiternus, ingenitus, expers partium, sibi-ipsi simillimus, bonorum omnium auriga, munera non expectans, optimus, prudentissimus, pater juris, sine doctrina justitiam perdoctus, naturâ perfectus, sapiens, sacræ naturæ unicus inventor, &c. Thus writeth Zoroaster, word for word. God, the first incorruptible, everlasting, unbegotten, without parts, most like himself, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wisest, the father of right, having learned justice without teaching, perfect, wise by nature, the onely inventer thereof.

Sixtus Senensis, speaking of the wisdom of the Chaldæans, doth distinguish those wise men into five orders (to wit) Chascedim, or Chaldæans: Asaphim, or Magicians: Chartumim (which he translates Ariolie, or Sophists) Mechasphim, or Malefici, or Venefici, Wiches, or Poisoners; and Gazarim, Augures, or Aruspices, or Diviners. Lib. 2. fol. 26.

Chascedim were those which had the name of Chaldæans, which were Astronomers: Hi cœlorum motus diligentissimè spectârunt; These did most diligently contemplate the motions of the heavens: whom Philo, in the life of Abraham describeth.

Asaphim were in the old Latine translation called Philosophers: of the Septuagint, and of Hierom, Magicians: Qui de omnium tam divinarum quam humanarum rerum causis Philosophati sunt; Who discoursed of the causes of all things, as well divine as humane: of whom Origen makes Balaam (the Son of Beor) to be the first: but Laertius ascribeth the invention of this Art to Zoroastres the Persian. Laert. l. 1.

Chartumim, or Inchanters, the Disciples (saith S. Augustine, Pliny, and Justine) of another Zoroastres: who corrupted the admirable wisdom of the Magi, which he received from his Ancesters.

Mechasphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are those which we have spoken already out of His Majesties Book of Dæmonologia.

Gazarim, or Aruspices (after S. Hieram) which divine from the intrails of Beasts slain for sacrifices: or by Gazarim, others understand Augures, who divine by the flying, singing, or feeding of Birds.

By this distinction, we may perceive the difference between those wise men which the Kings of Babylon entertained; and that the name and profession of the Magi among the antient Persians was most honest. For as Peucer truly observeth, Præerant religioni Persicæ, ut in populo Dei Levitæ, studiisque veræ Philosophiæ diditi erant: nec quisquam Rex Persarum poterat esse, qui non antea Magorum disciplinam scientiamque percepisset; The Magi (saith he) were the chief Ministers of the Persian Religion, as the Levites among Gods people, and they were given to the studies of true Philosophy: neither could any be King of the Persians, who had not first been exercised in the mysteries and knowledge of the Magi. Peucer de Divinitat. in c. de mag. fol. 135, 136.

Sixtus Senensis, in the defence of Origen against Polychronius and Theophilus, hath two kinds of Magick, his own words are these: Et ne quem moveant præmissa Polychronii & Theophili testimonia, sciendum est duplicem esse Magiam; alteram ubique ab Origine damnatam, quæ per fœdera cum dæmonibus inita, aut verè, aut apparenter, operatur; alteram ab Origine laudatam, quæ ad practicen naturalis Philosophiæ pertinet, docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutua naturalium virtutum ad invicem agentium ac patientium; That the testimonies of Theophilus and Polychronius (saith he) may not move any man, it is to be understood that Magick is of two sorts, the one every where condemned by Origen; which worketh (whether truly or seemingly) by covenants made with devils; the other commended by Origen, which appertaineth to the practick part of natural Philosophy, teaching to work admirable things by the mutual application of natural virtues, agent and suffering reciprocally. Bibl. l. 6. fol. 424.

This Partition Hierom doth embrace in the first of his Commentaries upon Daniel, where considering of the difference which Daniel makes between these four kinds of wise Men formerly remembred, he useth this distinction: Quos nos hariolos; cæteri [illegible] (id est) incantatores interpetati sunt, videntur mihi esse qui verbis rem peragunt; Magi, qui de singulis philosophantur; Malefici, qui sanguine utuntur, & victimis, & sæpe contigunt corpora mortuorum: porro in Chaldæis Genethliacos significari puto, quos vulgo Mathematicos vocant. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem suam, eo quòd sint Philosophi Chaldæorum: & ad artis hujus scientiam, Reges quoq; & Principes ejusdem gentis omnia faciunt; unde & in nativitate domini Salvatoris, ipsi primum ortum ejus intellexerunt, & venientes sanctam Bethlehem, adoraverunt puerum, stella desuper ostendente; They, whom we call Sorcerers, and others interpret Inchanters, seem to me, such as perform things by words; Magicians, such as handle every thing philosophically; Witches, that use bloud and sacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead: further, among the Chaldæans, I take them to be signified by the name of Conjecturers upon nativities, whom the vulgar call Mathematicians. But common custom takes Magicians for Witches, who are otherwise reputed in their own Nation: for they are the Philosophers of the Chaldæans: yea, King and princes of that Nation do all that they do, according to the knowledge of this Art: whence, at the nativity of the Lord our Saviour, they first of all understood his birth, and coming unto holy Bethlehem, did worship the Child: the Starr from above shewing him unto them. By this therefore it appeareth, that there is great difference between the doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the word. For though some Writers affirm, that Magus hodie dicitur, qui ex fœdere facto utitur diaboli opera ad rem quamcunque; That he is called a Magician now-a-days, who having entred league with the Devil, useth his help to any matter: yet (as our Saviour said of Divorce) it was not so from the beginning. For the Art of Magick is of the wisdom of Nature; other Arts which undergo that title, were invented by the falshood, subtilty, and envie of the Devil. In the latter, there is no other doctrine, than the use of certain ceremonies, Per malam fidem; By an evil faith: in the former, no other ill, than the investigation of those virtues and hidden properties which God hath given to his creatures, and how fitly to apply things that work, to things that suffer. And though by the Jews those excellent Magicians, Philosophers, and Divines, which came to worship our Saviour Christ, were tearmed Mechaschephim, or Mecasphim; yet had they no other reason than common custom therein. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit; Common custom (saith S. Hierom) understandeth Witches, under the name of Magicians: And antiquity (saith Peter Martyr) by the word (Magi) understood good and wise men. Quid igitur expavescis Magi nomen formidolose, nomen Evangelio gratiosum, quod non maleficum & veneficum, sed sapientem sonat, & Sacerdotem? O thou fearfull one (saith Ficinus) why doubtest thou to use the name of Magus, a name gratious in the Gospel, which doth not signifie a Witch, or a Conjurer, but a wise man, and a Priest? For what brought this slander to that Study and Profession, but onely idle Ignorance, the Parent of causless admiration? Causa fuit mirificentia quorundam operum, quæ (re vera) opera naturalia sunt: veruntamen quia procuratione dæmonorum, naturas ipsas vel conjungentium, vel commiscentium, vel aliter ad operandum expedientium facta sunt, opera dæmonũ credebantur ab ignorantibus hæc. De operibus hujusmodi est Magia naturalis, quam Necromantiam multi impropriè vocant. The marvellousness of some works, which (indeed) are natural, hath been the cause of this slander: but because these works have been done by procurement of devils, joining the natures together, or mingling them, or howsoever fitting the natures to their working, they were thought the works of the devils by the ignorant. Among these works is natural Magick, which men call very improperly, Necromancy.

Hierom. in Daniel. Pet. Mart. Loc. Mar Ficin. parprim. fol. 573. Gul. Parisien. de Lege, cap. 14.

Mirandula in his Apologie goeth further: For by understanding (saith he) the uttermost activity of natural agents we are assisted to know the Divinity of Christ: for otherwise (to use his own words) Ignoratis terminis potentiæ, & virtutis rerum naturalium, stat nos dubitare illa eadem opera, quæ fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia; The terms or limits of natural power and virtue not understood, we must needs doubt, whether those very works which Christ did, may not be done by natural means: after which he goeth on in this sort: Ideo non hæreticè, non superstitiosè dixi, sed verissimè & Catholicè per talem Magiam adjuvari nos in cognoscenda divinitate Christi: Therefore I said not heretically, not superstitiously, but most truly and Catholickly, that by such Magick we are furthered in knowing the Divinity of Christ. And seeing the Jews and others, the enemies of Christian Religion, do impudently and impiously object, that those Miracles which Christ wrought, were not above nature, but by the exquisite knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula, a man for his years, fuller of knowledge than any that this latter Age hath brought forth, might with good reason avow, that the uttermost of Nature's works being known, the works which Christ did, and which (as himself witnesseth) no man could do, do manifestly testifie of themselves, that they were performed by that hand which held Nature herein but as a Pencil, and by a power infinitely Supreme and Divine; and thereby those that were faithless, were either converted, or put to silence. Fol. 80.

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the antient Magick is not to be condemned: though the Devil here, as in other kinds, hath sought to obtrude evil things, under the name and colour of good things.

SEeing therefore it is confessed by all of understanding, that a Magician (according to the Persian word) is no other than, Divinorum Cultor, & Interpres: A studious Observer and Expounder of Divine things: and the Art of it self (I mean the Art of Natural Magick) no other, Quàm naturalis Philosophiæ absoluta consummatio; than the absolute perfection of natural Philosophy: Certainly then, it proceeds from ignorance, and no way sorteth with with wiſe and learned men, promiſcuè, and without difference and diſtinction, to confound lawfull and praiſe-worthy knowledge with that impious, and (to uſe S. Pauls words) with thoſe beggerly rudiments, which the Devil hath ſhuffled, and by them bewitcheth and befooleth graceleſs men. For, if we condemn natural Magick, or the wiſdom of Nature, becauſe the Devil (who knows more than any man) doth alſo teach Witches and Poiſoners the harmfull parts of Herbs, Drugs, Minerals, and Excrements: then may we, by the ſame rule, condemn the Phyſician, and the Art of Healing. For the Devil alſo in the Oracles of Amphiaraus, Amphilochus, Trophonius, and the like, taught men in Dreams, what Herbs and Drugs were proper for ſuch and ſuch Diſeaſes. Now, no man of judgment is ignorant, that the Devil from the beginning hath ſought to thruſt himſelf into the ſame employment among the Miniſters and Servants of God, changing himſelf for that purpoſe into an Angel of Light. He hath led men to Idolatry as a Doctrine of Religion; he hath thruſt in his Prophets among thoſe of the true God; he hath corrupted the Art of Aſtrologie, by giving a divine power to the Stars, teaching men to eſteem them as gods, and not as inſtruments. And (as Bunting obſerveth) it is true, that judicial Aſtrologie is corrupted with many ſuperſtitions: but the abuſe of the thing takes not away the Art, conſidering that heavenly bodies (as even general experience ſheweth) have, and exerciſe their operation upon the inferiour. For the Sun and the Starr of Mars do drie; the Moon doth moiſten, and govern the Tides of the Sea. Again, the Planets, as they have ſeveral and proper names, ſo have they ſeveral and proper virtues: the Stars do alſo differ in beauty, and in magnitude; and to all the Stars hath God given alſo their proper names, which (had they not influences and virtues different) needed not: He counteth the number of the Stars, and calleth them by their names. But, into the good and profitable knowledge of the celeſtial influences, the Devil ceaſeth not to ſhuffle in his Superſtitions: and ſo to the knowledge of the ſecret virtues of Nature hath he faſtened his doctrine of Characters, Numbers, and Incantations; and taught men to believe in the ſtrength of Words and Letters (which, without Faith in God, are but Ink or common breath) thereby either to equal his own with the All-powerfull Word of God, or to diminiſh the glory of God's creating Word, by whom are all things.

Bunt. in Chro.

Pſal. 147.

Moreover, he was never ignorant, that both the wiſe and the ſimple obſerve when the Sea-birds forſake the ſhores, and flie into the Land, that commonly ſome great ſtorm followeth; that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow, betoken fair weather; that the crying of Crows, and bating of Ducks, foreſhew Rain: for they feel the air moiſtned in their quils. And it is written in Hieremy the Prophet, Even the Stork in the air knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow. Hereupon, this enemy of Man-kind, working upon theſe as upon the reſt of Gods creatures, long time abuſed the Heathen, by teaching them to obſerve the flying of Fowls, and thereby to judge of good or ill ſucceſs in the Warr: and (withall) to look into their entrails for the ſame, as if God had written the ſecrets of unſearchable providence in the Livers and Bowels of Birds and Beaſts. Again, becauſe it pleaſed God ſometimes by Dreams, not only to warn and teach his Prophets and Apoſtles, but Heathen Princes alſo; as Abimelech to reſtore Sara to Abraham; becauſe he admoniſhed Joſeph, and by a Dream informed Jacob, Laban, Pharao, Solomon, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the Eaſt, and others. For as it is remembred in Job: In Dreams and Viſions of the night, when ſleep falleth upon men, &c. then God openeth the ears, that he might cauſe man to return from his enterpriſe; therefore, I ſay, doth the Devil alſo practiſe his Divinations by dreams, or (after Pariſienſis) divinitatis imitationes, his mock-divinity. This in the end grew ſo common, as Ariſtides compiled an Ephemerides of his own Dreams: Mithridates of thoſe of his Concubines. Yea, the Romans, finding the inconvenience hereof, becauſe all Dreams (without diſtinction of caſes) were drawn to Divination, forbad the ſame by a Law, as by the words of prohibition (aut narrandis ſomniis occultam aliquam artem divinandi) it may appear. Likewiſe by the Law of God, in Deuteronomy, Chap. 13. ſeducing Dreamers were ordered to be ſlain. Yet it is to be contemned, not that Marcus Antonius was told a remedy in his Dream for two grievous diſeaſes that oppreſt him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Ptolemie's poiſoned wound; nor that which Saint Auguſtine reporteth of a Millanoiſe, whoſe Son (the Father dead) being demanded a debt already paid, was told by his Father in a Dream, where the Acquittance lay to diſcharge it: not that of Aſtyages of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reaſon of all which, for as much as the cauſe is not in our ſelves, this place denieth diſpute.

§. IV.

That Daniel's misliking Nebuchodonosor's condemning of the Magicians, doth not justifie all their practices.

BUt it may be objected, that if such Divinations as the Heathens commonly used, were to be condemned in them, who took on them very many and strange Revelations; how came it to pass, that Daniel both condemned the hasty sentence of Nebuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chaldæa, and in a sort forbad it? especially considering that such kind of people God himself commanded to be slain. To this, divers answers may be given. Deut. 13. and 18. Levit. 20. First, it seemeth that Daniel had respect to those Chaldæans, because they acknowledged that the Dream of the King, which himself had forgotten, could not be known to any man by any Art, either Natural or Diabolical: For there is none other (said the Chaldæans) that can declare it before the King, except the Gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh: and herein they confessed the power of the Ever-living God.

Secondly, it may be conjectured (and that upon good reason) that among so many learned men, some of them did not exercise themselves in any evil or unlawfull Arts, but were meerly Magicians and Naturalists: and therefore when the King commanded to kill all, Daniel perswaded the contrary, and called it a hasty judgment, which proceeded with fury without examination. And that some of those mens studies and professions were lawfull, it may be gathered by Daniel's instruction: for himself had been taught by them, and was called chief of the Inchanters: of which some were tearmed Soothsayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldæans, others Magi, or Wise-men: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel misliked and forbad the execution of that judgment, because it was unjust. For howsoever those men might deserve punishment for the practice of unlawfull Arts (though not unlawfull according to the law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltless. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the King's thought, which the Devil himself could not know. So then, in Daniel's dislike, and hindring of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute justifying of their practice and profession.

§. V.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemn the right use of them.

NOtwithstanding this mixture every where, of good with evil, of falshood with truth, of corruption with cleanness and purity: The good, The truth, The purity in every kind may well be embraced: As in the ancient worshipping of God by Sacrifice, there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forbare to offer Sacrifice to the God of all power, because the Devil, in the Image of Baal, Astaroth, Chemoth, Jupiter, Apollo, and the like, was so adored.

Neither did the abuse of Astrologie terrifie Abraham (if we may believe the most ancient and religious Historians) from observing the motions and natures of heavenly bodies; neither can it dehort wise and learned men in these days from attributing those virtues, influences, and inclinations to the Starrs and other lights of Heaven, which God hath given to those his glorious creatures. Euseb. ex Artapan. & Polybi.

The Sympathetical, and Anipathetical working of Herbs, Plants, Stones, Minerals, with their other utmost virtues, sometimes taught by the Devil, and applied by his Ministers to harmfull and uncharitable ends, can never terrifie the honest and learned Physician or Magician from the using of them to the help and comfort of Man-kind: neither can the illusions, whereby the Devil betrayeth such men as are fallen from God, make other men reject the observations of Dreams; so farr as with a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make use of them.

Lastly, the prohibition to mark flying of Fowls (as signs of good or evil success) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crows against Rain, or to any observation not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may be given. For, if we confound Arts with the abuse of them, we shall not onely condemn all honest Trades and enterchange amongst men (for there are that deceive in all Professions) but we shall in a short time bury in forgetfulness all excellent knowledg and all learning, or obscure and cover it over with a most scornfull and beggarly ignorance: and (as Pliny teacheth) we should shew our selves, Ingratos erga eos, qui labore curaque lucem nobis aperuerunt in hac luce: Unthankfull towards those, who with pains and care have discovered unto us light in this light. Deut. 18. 10.

Indeed, not only these natural knowledges are condemned by those that are ignorant; but the Mathematicks also, and Professors thereof: though those that are excellently learned learned, judge of it in this sort: In speculo Mathematico verum illud, quod in omni scibili quæritur, elucet; non modò remota similitudine, sed fulgida quadam propinquitate; In the Glass of the Mathematicks, that Truth doth shine, which is sought in every kind of knowledg; not in an obscuring, but in a neer and manifest representation.

Cusa. com. Theol. c. 9.

§. VI.

Of the divers kinds of unlawfull Magick.

IT is true, that there are many Arts, if we may so call them, which are covered with the name Magick: and esteemed abusively to be as branches of that Tree, on whose root they never grew. The first of these hath the name of Necromancy, or Goetia: and of this again there are divers kinds. The one is an Invocation at the Graves of the dead, to whom the Devil himself gives answer in stead of those that seem to appear. For certain it is, that the immortal souls of men do not inhabit the dust and dead bodies, but they give motion and understanding to the living: death being nothing else but a separation of the body and soul: and therefore the soul is not to be found in the Graves.

A second practice of those men, who pay Tribute, or are in league with Satan, is that of conjuring, or raising up Devils, of whom they hope to learn what they list. These men are so distract, as they believe, that by terrible words they make the Devil to tremble; that being once impaled in a Circle (a Circle which cannot keep out a Mouse) they therein (as they suppose) insconce themselves against that great Monster. Doubtless, they forget that the Devil is not terrified from doing ill, and all that is contrary to God and goodness, no, not by the fearfull Word of the Almighty: and that he feared not to offer to sit in Gods seat, that he made no scruple to tempt our Saviour Christ, whom himself called the Son of God. So, forgetting these proud parts of his, an unworthy wretch, will yet resolve himself, that he can draw the Devil out of Hell, and terrifie with a Phrase: whereas in very truth, the obedience which the Devils seem to use, is but thereby to possess themselves of the bodies and souls of those which raise them up; as His Majesty in his Book aforenamed hath excellently taught: That the Divels obedience is onely, secundum quid, scilicet ex pacto; respectivè, that is, upon bargain.

I cannot tell what they can do upon those simple and ignorant Devils, which inhabit Iamblicus imagination; but sure I am, the rest are apt enough to come uncalled: and always attending the cogitations of their servants and vassals, do no way need any such inforcement.

Or, it may be that these Conjurers dealt altogether with Cardans mortal Devils, following the opinion of Rabbi Avornathan and of Porphirius, who taught that these kind of Divels lived not above a thousand years: which Plutarch in his Treatise de Oraculorum defectu confirmeth, making example of the great God Pan. For, were it true, that the Divels were in awe of wicked men, or could be compelled by them, then would they alway fear those words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly mastered. But the Familiar of Simon Magus, when he had lifted him up in the air, cast him headlong out of his claws, when he was sure he should perish with the fall. If this, perhaps, were done by S. Peter's Prayers (of which S. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the same pranks at other times, upon his own accord, the Devil played with Theodotus; who transported (as Simon Magus was supposed to have been) had the same mortall fall that he had. The like success had Budas, a principal Pillar of the Manichæan Heresie, as Socrates in his Ecclesiastical History witnesseth: and for a manifest proof hereof, we see it every day, that the Devil leaves all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallows, for whom at other times he maketh himself a Pegasus, to convey them in haste to places far distant, or at least makes them so think: For those that received not the truth (saith S. Paul) God shall send them strong illusions: Of these their supposed transportations (yet agreeing with their confessions) His Majesty in the 2d Book, & the 4th Chap. of the Demonologie, hath confirmed by unanswerable reasons, that they are meerly illusive. Another sort there are, who take on them to include Spirits in Glasses & Crystals; of whom Cusanus: Fatui sunt Incantatores, qui in ungue & vitro volunt spiritum includere, quia Spiritus non clauditur corpore: They are fooliſh Inchanters, which will shut up their spirits within their nails, or in Glass: for a spirit cannot be inclosed by a body.

Lib. 1. c. 21.

There is also another art besides the aforementioned, which they call Theurgia, or White Magick; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Invocation they draw out of Heaven and communicate withall. But the administring Spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due unto their Creator; so, seeing they are most free Spirits, there is no man so absurd to think (except the Devil have corrupted his understanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heaven by threats. Wherefore let the Professours thereof cover themselves how they please by a professed purity of life, by the ministery of Infants, by fasting and abstinence in general; yet all those that tamper with immaterial substances, and abstract natures, either by Sacrifice, Vow, or Inforcement, or men of evil faith, and in the power of Satan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Devils, which willingly obey.

Other sorts there are of wicked Divinations; as by fire, called Pyromantia: by water, called Hydromantia: by the air, called Mataeotechnia, and the like.

The last, and (indeed) the worst of all other, is Fascination or Witchcraft: the Practicers whereof are no less envious and cruel, revengeful and bloudy, than the Devil himself. And these accursed creatures, having sold their souls to the Devil, work two ways; either by the Devil immediately, or by the Art of poisoning. The difference between Necromancers and Witches, His Majesty hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a sort) command; the other obey the Devil.

There is another kind of petty Witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of Beasts and Birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle lighted on his shoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the same exceeded the Art of Falconry, yet was it no more to be admired then Mahomet's Dove, which he had used to feed with Wheat out of his ear: which Dove, when it was hungry, lighted on Mahomet's shoulder, and thrust his Bill therein to find his breakfast: Mahomet perswading the rude and simple Arabians, that it was the Holy Ghost that gave him advice. And certainly, if Banks had lived in elder times, he would have shamed all the Inchanters of the World: for whosoever was most famous among them, could never master or instruct any Beast as he did his Horse.

Ælian. l. 6 Nat. Hist.

For the drawing of Serpents out of their Dens, or killing of them in the holes by Inchantments (which the Marsians, a people of Italy, practised: Colubros disrumpit Marsia cantu: inchanting Marsia makes the Snakes to burst.) That it hath been used, it appears, Psal. 58. 6. though I doubt not, but that many Impostures may be in this kind, and even by natural causes it may be done. For, there are many fumes that will either draw them out, or destroy them; as womens hair burnt, and the like. So many things may be laid in the entrance of their holes that will allure them; and therein I find no other Magick or Inchantments than to draw out a Mouse with a piece of tosted Cheese.

§. VII.

Of divers ways by which the Devil seemeth to work his wonders.

BUt to the end that we may not dote with the Manichees, who make two powers of gods: that we do not give to the Devil any other dominion than he hath (not speak of his ability, when he is the Minister of Gods vengeance; as when Egypt, according to David, was destroyed by evil Angels) he otherwise worketh but three ways. The first is, by moving the cogitation and affections of men: The second, by the exquisite knowledge of Nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And, that they cannot work what they would, G. Parisiensis giveth three causes: the first, a natural impotency: the second, their own reason dissuading them from daring overmuch, or indeed (and that which is the onely certain cause) the great mercy of the Creator, Tenens eos ligatas (saith the same Author) velut immanissimas belluas. S. Augustine was of opinion, that the Frogs which Pharaoh's Sorcerers produced, were not natural, but that the Devil (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appear to be such. For, as Varius observeth, those Frogs of the Inchanters were not found corrupted as those of Moses were, which might argue that they were not creatures indeed. Hereof, saith Saint Augustine: Nec sanè Dæmones naturas creant, sed quæ à Deo creatæ sunt commutant, ut videantur esse quod non sunt: The Devils create not any creatures, but so change those that are created by God, as they seem to be that which they be not: of which in the 83. Question he giveth the reason. Dæmon quibusdam nebulis implet omnes meatus intelligentiæ, per quos aperire lumen rationis radius mentis solet (that is) The Devil fills with certain clouds all passages of the understanding, by which the beam of the mind is wont to open the light of reason.

Sinl. parif. de univerſo p. 2. cap. 70.

Maxima vis eſt phantaſiæ ad errores.

And, as Tertullian in his Book de Anima rightly conceiveth, if the Devil can possess himself of the eyes of our minds, and blind them, it is not hard for him to dazel those of the body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth out, the Devil entreth in, beginning with the fantasie, by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the soul; for the fantasie is most apt to be abused by vain apprehensions.

Aquinas, on the contrary, held, that those Frogs were not imaginary, but such indeed as they seemed: not made Magicæ artis ludibrio, which indeed agreeth not with the Art, but (according to Thomas) Per aptam & idoneam neam agentium & patientium applicationem: By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not be deceived by that sleight of false semblance; and S. Augustine in another case like unto this (to wit) of the turning of Diomedes his companions into Birds, per activa cum passivis, inclineth rather to this opinion: though I am not perswaded that S. Augustine doth believe that of Diomedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis, a man very learned also, confirmeth. For, speaking of natural Magick, he useth these words: De hujusmodi autem operibus, & subita generatio ranarum, & pediculorum, & vermium, aliorumq; animalium quorundam: in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verùm adhibitis adjutoriis, ipsa seminanaturæ confortant, & accuunt, ita ut opus generationis tantum accelerent, ut eis qui hoc nesciunt non opus naturæ videatur (quæ tardius talia efficere consuevit) sed potentia Dæmonum, &c. to which he addeth: Qui autem in his docti sunt, talia non mirantur, sed solem Creatorem in his glorificant: In such works (saith he) the sudden generation of Frogs and Lice, and Worms, and some other creatures is: in all which, Nature alone worketh; but by means strengthening the seeds of Nature, and quickning them; in such wise, that they so hasten the work of generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant, not to be the work of Nature, which usually worketh more leisurely, but they think it done by the powers of Devils. But they who are learned in these Arts, marvel not at such working, but glorifie the Creator. Now, by these two ways the Devils do most frequently work (to wit) by knowing the uttermost of nature, and by illusion: for there is no incomprehensible or unsearchable power, but of God onely.

For, shall we say, he causeth sometimes thunders, lightnings, & tempests; and can infect the air, as well as move it or compress it; who knows not that these things are also natural? Or, may it be objected that he foretelleth things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illusion. It is true, that he sometimes doth it; but how? In elder Ages he stole his knowledge out of the Predictions of the Prophets: and foretold the death of Saul, at such time as he was in his own possession and power to dispose of. And he that hath lived from the infancy of the world to this day, and observed the success of every counsel: he that by reason of his swift motions can inform himself of all places, and preparations: he that is of counsel with all those that study and practise subversion and destruction: he that is Prince of the air, and can thence better judge, than those that inhabite the earth: if he should not sometimes, yea, if he should not very oftentimes ghess rightly of things to come (where God pleaseth not to give impediment) it were very strange. For we see, that wise and learned men do oftentimes by comparing like causes, conceive rightly of like effects before they happen: and yet, where the Devil doubteth, and would willingly keep his credit, he evermore answereth by Riddles: as Diabolus magnum habet rerum usum; quæ res multum habet momenti in quovis negotio. Aug. de Anima, cap. 26, 27, &c.

Crœsus Halym penetrans magnam subvertit opum vim:
If Crœsus over Halys go,
Great Kingdoms he shall overthrow.

Which answer may be taken either way: either for the overthrow of his own Kingdom, or of his Enemies. And thus farr we grant the Devil may proceed in Predictions, which otherwise belong to God only, as it is in Esay: Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are Gods; shew us at all times, and certainly what is to come. Solius enim divinæ intelligentiæ est, occulta nosse & revelare; It is onely proper to Gods understanding and wisdom to know and reveal hidden things.

Guil. Parisiensis de legib. c. 24.

§. VIII.

That none was ever raised from the dead by the power of the Devil: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

TO conclude, It may be objected, that the Devil hath raised from the dead: and that others by his power have done the like, as in the example given of Samuel, raised by the Witch of Endor; which, were it true, then might it indeed be affirmed, that some of the Devil's acts exceeded all the powers of Nature, false semblance, and other illusions. Justin Martyr was sometime of the opinion, that it was Samuel indeed; and so was Ambrose, Lyra, and Burgensis; from which Authorities those men borrow strength which so believe. But Martyr changed his opinion; and so did S. Augustine, who at first seemed to be indifferent: For, in his Questions upon the Old and New Testament, he accounteth it detestable to think it was Samuel which appeared: and these be his words elsewhere to the same effect: In requie sunt animæ piorum à corpore separatæ, impiorum autem pœnas luunt, donec istarum ad vitam æternam, illarum verò ad æternam mortem quæ secunda dicitur, corpora reviviscant; The souls of the godly separated from their bodies, are at rest, but those of the wicked suffer punishment, till the bodies of the just rise to eternal life, and of the wicked to an eternal and second death.

And

And (besides S. Augustine) Justin Martyr, Helarius, Tertullian, Athanasius, Chrysostom, and others, believed firmly, and taught it: that the souls of men, being once separate from their bodies, did not wander on the earth at all: Credere debemus (saith Cyril) quum à corporibus sanctorum animæ abierint, tanquam in manus charissimi patris bonitati divinæ commendari; We must believe, when the souls of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be commended to the divine Goodness, as into the hands of a most dear Father. If then they be in Heaven, the power of the Devil cannot stretch so high: if in Hell, Ab inferno nulla est redemptio; From Hell there is no redemption. For, there are but two habitations after death: Unum (saith Augustine) in igne æterno; alterum in regno æterno; The one in eternal fire; the other in Gods eternal Kingdom. And though it be written in Jure Pontificio, that many there are who believe, that the dead have again appeared to the living; yet the Gloss upon the same Text finds it ridiculous: Credunt, & male, quia sunt Phantasmata (saith the Gloss) They believe, and they believe amiss, because they be but Phantasmes, or apparitions. For, whereas any such voice hath been heard, saying, I am the Soul of such a one: Hæc oratio à fraude atque deceptione diabolica est; That speech is framed by the fraud and deception of the Devil, saith Chrysostom. Likewise of the same, saith Tertullian: Absit ut animam cujuslibet sancti, nedum Prophetæ, à dæmonio credamus extractam; God forbid that we should think that the Soul of any holy man, much less of a Prophet, should be drawn up again by a Devil.

It is true, that the Scriptures call that apparition, Samuel; so do they the wooden Images, Cherubims: and false brazen gods are gods, and the like. And whereas these of the contrary opinion build upon that place of the 26. of Ecclesiasticus (a Book not numbred among the Canonical Scriptures, as S. Augustine himself in this Treatise, if it be his, De cura pro mortuis agenda, confesseth) yet Syracides, following the literal sence and phrase of the Scriptures, proveth nothing at all: For, though the Devil would willingly perswade, that the souls (yea, even of just men) were in his power; yet so farr is it from the promises of the Scriptures, and from Gods just and mereifull nature, and so contrary to all divine reason, as S. Augustine (or whosoever wrote that Book before cited) might rightly tearm it a detestable opinion so to think. For, if God had so absolutely forsaken Saul, that he refused to answer him, either by Dreams, by Urim, or by his Prophets: it were sottish to conceive, that he would permit the Devil, or a wicked Witch, to raise a Prophet from the dead in Saul's respect; it being also contrary to his divine Law, to ask counsel of the dead: as in Deut. 18. and elsewhere. Therefore it was the Devil, and not the Soul of a dead body, that gave answer and advice.

But because Helias and Helizeus had raised some from the dead by the power of God; those Devils which Saint Augustine calleth Ludificatores animantium sibi subjectorum; Mockers of their own vassals, casting before their eyes a semblance of humane bodies, and framing sounds to their ears, like the voices of men, do also perswade their graceless and accursed attendants, that themselves both possess, and have power over, the souls of men. Eludit Diabolus aciem tum spectantium, tum etiam cogitantium, saith L. Vives; The Devil begnileth the sense both of the beholders, and of those that so imagine. These then are the bounds of the Devil's power, whom, if we will not fear, we must fear to sin. For, when he is not the instrument of God's vengeance, he can touch no man that makes not himself his voluntary vassal: Potest ad malum invitare, non potest trahere, saith S. Augustine; He can allure, but he cannot enforce to evil. Such as think otherwise, may go into the number remembred by Lucretius:

Nam veluti pueri trepidant, atque omnia cæcis
In tenebris metuunt: sic nos in luce timemus.

We fear by light, as children in the dark.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus, and of his Wife Semiramis, and of other her Acts.

§. I.

Of the magnificent building of Ninive by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

BUt to come back to Ninus, the amplifier and finisher of Ninive: whether he performed it before or after the overthrow of Zoroaster, it is uncertain. As for the City it self, it is agreed by all profane Writers, and by the Scriptures, that it exceeded all other in circuit, and answerable magnificence. For it had in compass 440. stadia, or furlongs; the walls whereof were an hundred foot upright, and had such a breadth, as three Chariots might pass on the Rampire in front: these walls were garnished with 1500. Towers, which gave exceeding beauty to the rest, and strength, no less admirable for the nature of those times.

But this City (built in the Plains of Assyria, and on the banks of Tygris, and in the region of Eden) was founded long before Ninus time; and (as antient Historians report, and more lately, Nauclerus) had the name of Campsor, at such time as Ninus amplified the same, and gave it a wall, and called it after his own name.

Herod. l. 1. Justin. l. 1. Diod. l. 2. and. 3.

For these works of Babylon and Ninive begun by Nimrod in Chaldæa, and in Assyria, Ninus and Semiramis made perfect. Ninus finished Ninive, Semiramis Babylon: wherein she sought to exceed her husband by far. Indeed, in the first Age, when Princes were moderate, they neither thought how to invade others, nor feared to be invaded: labouring to build Towns and Villages, for the use of themselves and their people, without either Walls or Towers; and how they might discharge the earth of Woods, Briars, Bushments, and Waters, to make it more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis living in that Age, when Ambition was strong in youth: and purposing to follow the Conquest which her husband had undertaken, gave that beauty and strength to Babylon which it had.

§. II.

Of the end of Ninus; and the beginning of Semiramis Reign.

THis she did after the death of her husband Ninus; who, after he had mastered Bactria, and subjected unto his Empire all those Regions between it and the Mediterranean Sea and Hellespont (Asia the less excepted), and finished the work of Ninive; he left the world in the year thereof 2019. after he had reigned 25. years. Plutarch reporteth, that Semiramis desired her husband Ninus, that he would grant unto her the absolute soveraign power for one day. Diod. Siculus, out of Athenæus, and others, speaks of five days. In which time (moved either with desire of Rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Menon, who perished for her) she caused Ninus her husband to be slain. But this seemeth rather a scandal cast on her by the Greeks, than that it had any truth.

Howsoever Ninus came to his end, Semiramis took on her, after his death, the sole Rule of the Assyrian Empire: of which Ninus was said to be the first Monarch, because he changed his seat from Babylon in Chaldæa, to Ninive in Assyria. Justine reports, that Semiramis (the better to invest her self, and in her beginning without murmure or offence to take on her so great a charge) presented her self to the people in person of her Son Ninias, or Zameis, who bare her external form and proportion without any sensible difference.

Ælian. lib. 7. ex Dione.

This report I take also to be feigned, for which many arguments might be made. But as she ruled long, so she performed all those memorable Acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that Letter which she sent to the King of India (her last challenge and undertaken conquest) by her own name. And were it true that her Son Ninias had such a stature at his fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was very very personable) could be taken for him; yet it is very unlikely that she could have held the Empire from him 42. years after by any such subtilty (for so long she reigned after the death of her husband:) but it may be true, that Ninias, or Zameis (being wholly given to his pleasures, as it is written of him) was well pleased with his mothers prosperous government and undertakings.

§. III.

Of Semiramis Parentage and Education, and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

SOme Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to have been of base Parentage, calling her after the name of her Country, a Syrian. Berosus calls her after the name of her City wherein she was born, Semiramis Ascalonitis, of Ascalon, the antient City and Metropolis of the Philistims. Others report her to be the Daughter of Derceta, a Curtizan of Ascalon, exceeding beautifull. Others say, that this Derceta or Dercetis, the mother of Semiramis, was sometimes a Recluse, and had profest a holy and a religious life; to whom there was a Temple dedicated, seated on the bank of a Lake adjoining to Ascalon; and afterward falling in love with a goodly young man, she was by him made with child, which (for fear of extreme punishment) she conveyed away, and caused the same to be hidden among the high Reeds which grew on the banks of the Lake: in which (while the child was left to the mercy of wilde Beasts) the same was fed by certain Birds, which used to feed upon, or neer those Waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the Harlot that fostered Romulus. For some one or other adjoining to this Lake, had the charge and fosteridge of this child, who being perchance but some base and obscure creature, the mother might thereby hope the better to cover her dishonour and breach of Vow; notwithstanding which, she was cast from the top of her Temple into the Lake adjoining, and (as the Poets have feigned) changed by Venus into a Fish, all but her face, which still held the same beauty and humane shape. It is thought, that from this Derceta, the invention of that Idol of the Philistims (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a Mans face, and a Fishes body; into whose Temple when the Ark of God was brought, the Idol fell twice to the ground: and at the second fall there remained only the trunk of Dagon, the head being broken off: For so S. Hierom hath converted that place. Vatablus, Pagninus, and Junius, write it by Dagon onely, which signifieth a Fish, and so it onely appeared: the head thereof by the second fall being sundred from the body.

For my self, I rather think, that this Dagon of the Philistims, was an Idol representing Triton, one of those imaginary Sea-gods under Neptune. For this City being maritimate (as all those of the Philistims were, and so were the best of Phœnicia) used all their devotions to Neptune, and the rest of the petty gods which attended him.

§. IV.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbability of her vices.

BUt for her Pedigree, I leave it to Assyrian Heralds; and for her vicious life, I ascribe the report thereof to the envious and lying Grecians. For delicacy & ease do more often accompany licentiousness in men and women, than labour and hazzard do. And if the one half be true which is reported of this Lady, then there never lived any Prince or Princess more worthy of Fame than Semiramis was, both for the works she did at Babylon, and elsewhere, and for the Warrs she made with glorious success: all but her last enterprise of India, from whence both Strabo and Arianus report, that she never returned: and that of all her most powerfull Army, there survived but onely twenty persons; the rest, being either drowned in the River of Indus, dead of the Famine, or slain by the Sword of Staurobates. But, as the multitude which went out are more than reason hath numbred; so were those that returned, less than could have escaped of such an Army, as consisted of four Millions and upwards. For these numbers, which she levied by her Lievtenant Dercetæus (saith Suidas) did consist of Foot-men three Millions; of Horse-men one Million; of Chariots, armed with hooks on each side, one hundred thousand; of those which fought upon Camels as many; of Camels for burthen, two hundred thousand; of raw Hides for all uses, three hundred thousand; of Gallies with brazen heads, three thousand, by which she might transport over Indus at once, three hundred thousand souldiers: which Gallies were furnished with Syrians, Phœnicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. The incredible and impossible numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nourish (had every Man and Beast but fed on grass) are taken from the Autherity of Cteſias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivolous reports: ſo Diodorus himſelf hath nothing of certainty, but from Xerxes Expedition into Greece and afterwards; whoſe Army (though the ſame was farr inferiour to that of Semiramis) yet it had weight enough to over-load the belief of any reaſonable man. For all Authours conſent, that Xerxes tranſported into Greece, an army of 1700000. and gathered together (therein to paſs the Helleſpont) three thouſand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the ſeveral Provinces whence thoſe Gallies were taken, hath collected the number.

But of what multitude ſoever the Army of Semiramis conſiſted, the ſame being broken, and overthrown by Staurobates, upon the banks of Indus, Canticum cantavit extremum; She ſang her laſt ſong; and (as Antiquity hath feigned) was changed by the gods into a Dove (the Bird of Venus) whence it came, that the Babylonians gave a Dove in their Enſigns.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus built by Semiramis; and of the Pyramides of Egypt.

AMong all her other memorable and more than magnificent works (beſides the wall of the City of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this City, invironed with a wall carried fourſquare of great heighth and beauty, having on each ſquare, certain brazen Gates curiouſly engraven. In the Core of the ſquare, ſhe raiſed a Tower of a furlong high, which is half a quarter of a mile; and upon it again (taking a Baſis of a leſs circuit) ſhe ſet a ſecond Tower; and ſo eight in all, one above another, upon the top whereof the Chaldæan Prieſts made the Obſervation of the Starrs; becauſe this Tower over-topped the ordinary clouds.

By beholding the ruines of this Tower, have many Travellers been deceived; who ſuppoſe that they have ſeen a part of Nimrod's Tower, when it was but the foundation of this Temple of Bel (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod.) There were burnt in this Temple, one hundred thouſand talents of Frankincenſe every year (ſaith Herodotus.) This Temple did Nebuchodonoſor adorn with the ſpoils of Hieruſalem, and of the Temple of Solomon: all which veſſels and ornaments Cyrus re-delivered. This Temple Xerxes evened with the ſoil; which Alexander is ſaid to have repaired, by the perſwaſions of the Chaldæans. I deny not that it might have been in his deſire ſo to do; but he enjoyed but a few years after Babylon taken, and therefore could not perform any ſuch work. The Egyptians (ſaith Proclus) inhabiting a low and level ground, and given to the ſame ſuperſtition of the Stars that the Chaldæans were, erected in imitation, and for the ſame ſervice and uſe, the Pyramides by Memphis, which were conſpicuæ undique navigantibus, ſaith Pliny. Of theſe Pyramides, Bellonius, a carefull obſerver of Rarities (who being in Egypt, mounted by ſteps to the top of the higheſt) maketh this report: Le meilleur archer qui ſeroit a ſa ſommite, & tirant une fleche in l' air, a peine pouroit l' envoyer hors de ſa baſe q' elle ne ſe tombaſt ſur les degrez; The beſt Archer ſtanding on the top of one of theſe Pyramides, and ſhooting an arrow from thence into the air, as farr as he can, with great difficulty ſhall be able ſo to force the ſame, but that it will fall upon ſome of the degrees or ſteps.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD:

Intreating of the TIMES, from the Birth of Abraham, to the Destruction of Solomon's Temple.

THE SECOND BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the Time of the Birth of Abraham: and the use of this Question, for the ordering of the Story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of some of the Successours of Semiramis: with a brief transition to the Question, about the time of the Birth of Abraham.

AFter the death of Semiramis, Ninias, or Zameis, succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Berosus Annianus bestows the conquest of Bactria, and the overthrow of Zoroaster; contrary to Diodorus, Justine, Orosius, and all other approved Writers. For Ninias being esteemed no man of Warr at all, but altogether feminine, and subjected to ease and delicacy, there is no probability in that opinion. Now, because there was nothing performed by this Ninias of any moment, other than that out of jealousie he every year changed his Provincial Governours, and built Colleges for the Chaldæan Priests, his Astronomers: nor by Arius his successour, whom Suidas calleth Thuras; but that he reduced again the Bactrians and Caspians, revolted (as it seemeth) in Ninias his time: nor of Aralius, the successour of Arius; but that he added sumptuosity, invented Jewels of Gold and Stone, and some Engines for the Warr: I will, for this present, pass them over, and a while follow Abraham, whose ways are warrantable (till we meet these Assyrians again in this Story) by whom, and by whose issues, we shall best give date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham living at once with Ninus, Ninias, Semiramis, Arius, Aralius, and Xerxes, or Balanius. For, otherwise, if we seek to prove things certain by the uncertain, and judge of those times, which the Scriptures set us down without errour, by the reigns of the Assyrian Princes; we shall but patch up the Story at adventure, and leave it in the same confusion, in which, to this day, it hath remained. For, where the Scriptures do not help us, Mirum non est in rebus antiquis, Historiam non constare; No marvel if then in things very antient, History want assurance. Plutarch. in Thes.

The better therefore to find out, in what Age of the World, and how long, these Assyrian Kings reigned, as also for other good causes, we must first assure the time of Abraham's braham's Birth, and in what year the ſame happened after the Floud. Now, ſince all agree that the three and fourtieth year of Ninus, was the birth-year of Abraham; by proving directly out of the Scriptures, in what year after the Floud, the birth of Abraham happened, we ſhall thereby ſet all the reſt in ſquare and order. But of this time there is much jangling between thoſe Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the moſt part making 292. or 293. years; others 352. years between Abraham's Birth and the Floud: a matter often diſputed, but never concluded.

Archilothus de temporibus (as we find him in Annius) makes but 250. years from the Floud to Ninus: then ſeeing that Abraham was born in the three and fourtieth year of Ninus, according to Euſebius and Saint Auguſtine, it followeth, by the addition of thoſe two numbers, that the year of Abraham's Birth, was in the year after the Floud 293. or, as the moſt part of all Chronologers gather, the year 292.

Now, ſince I do here enter into that never reſolved Queſtion, and Labyrinth of times, it behoveth me to give Reaſon for my own Opinion: and with ſo much the greater care and circumſpection, becauſe I walk aſide, and in a way apart from the multitude; yet not alone, and without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather chooſe to endure the wounds of thoſe darts, which Envie caſteth at Novelty, than to go on ſafely and ſleepily in the eaſie ways of ancient miſtakings: ſeeing to [illegible] learned in many errours, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diverſity.

§. II.

A Propoſal of Reaſons or Arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was born in the year 292. after the Floud, and not in year 352.

THoſe who ſeek to prove this account of 292. years, between the general Floud and Abraham's Birth, ground themſelves; firſt, on theſe words of the Scripture: So Terah lived 70. years, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: Secondly, upon the Opinion of Joſephus, Saint Auguſtine, Beda, Iſidore, and many of the ancient Hebrews before them: Authorities (while they are ſlightly looked over) ſeeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture laſt remembred, the later Chronologers gather theſe arguments. Firſt, out of the words as they lie; That Terah, at 70. years begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: and that Abraham being the firſt named, Abraham being the worthieſt, Abraham being the Son of the Promiſe, ought in this reſpect to be counted the eldeſt Son of Terah, and ſo neceſſarily born in the ſeventieth year of his life. Secondly, it was of Abraham that Moſes had reſpect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heir of the Bleſſing; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the ſcope of this Chapter, was to ſet down the Genealogie of Chriſt, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nahor and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, that if Abraham were not the eldeſt Son, then there can be no certainty of his age, and ſo are all future times made doubtfull. For it cannot then be proved, that Abraham was born more aſſuredly in the 130. year of Terah his age, than in the 131, 132, &c. Moſes having no where ſet down preciſely that Abraham went into Canaan that very year, in which his father died.

Fourthly, it is thought improbable, that Terah begat Abraham at 130. years: ſeeing Abraham himſelf thought it a wonder to be made a father at 100. years.

§. III.

The Anſwer to the Objections propoſed, ſhewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Meſopotamia into Canaan; and it, after his fathers death.

TO anſwer all which Objections, it is very eaſie, the way being prepared thereto by divers learned Divines long ſince, and to which I will adde ſomewhat of mine own, according to the ſmall talent which God hath given me. Now, for as much as the ſtate of the Queſtion cannot well be ſcanned, unleſs the time of Abraham's journy into Canaan be firſt conſidered of; before I deſcend unto the particular examination of theſe Arguments, I will make bold with order and method ſo far, as to ſearch into a ſtrange tradition concerning his travels, that ſerveth as a ground for this Opinion, and a bulwark againſt all that can be ſaid to the contrary.

But it is conceived, that Abraham made two journeys into Canaan: the later after his fathers death, the former preſently upon his calling; which he performed without delay, not ſtaying for his fathers death at Haran: a conjecture drawn from a place in the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, where it is written,

Heb. 11. 8. By faith Abraham (when he was called) obeyed God, to go out into a place which he should afterward receive for inheritance: and he went out, not knowing whither he went. This Supposition (if it be granted) serves very well to uphold the opinion that can ill stand without it. Let us therefore see whether we may give credit to the Supposition it self.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charran, or Haran, after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proved, without the admission of any distinction, by these words of Saint Acts 7. 4. Stephen: And after his father was dead, God brought him into this land, where ye now dwell, that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Against which place, so direct and plain, what force hath any mans fancy or supposition, perswading, that Abraham made two journeys into Canaan; one before Terahs death, and another after: no such thing being found in Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability or reason to induce it? For, if any man out of this place before alleged can pick any argument, proving, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan, and Heb. 11. 8. then returned unto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I think it reason, that he be believed in the rest. But, that he performed the Commandment of God after his Fathers death, leaving Ur & Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves are true. For after his Father was dead (saith Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double journey into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembred the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abrahams coming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For, if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Jews, his adversaries, too great an occasion both of scandalizing himself, and the Gospel of Christ. Indeed, we shall find small reason to make us think, that Abraham passed and re-passed those ways, more often than he was enforced so to do, if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisom journey, than the strength of his faith in Gods promises: In which, if any thing would have brought him to despair, he had more cause than ever man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborn Nations: a Nation of valiant and resolved Idolaters. He was besieged with famine at his first arrival, and driven to flie into Egypt for relief. His wife was old, and he had no Son to inherit the Promise, And when God had given him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him up to himself for sacrifice; all which discomforts he patiently and constantly underwent.

Secondly, let us consider the ways themselves, which Abraham had to pass over; the length whereof was 300. English miles; and through Countreys of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himself over the great River of Euphrates, to travel through the dangerous & barren Desarts of Palmyrena, and to climb over the great and high mountains of Libanus, Hermon, or Gilead: and whether these were easie walks for Abraham to march twice over, containing, as aforesaid, 300. miles in length, let every reasonable man judge. For, if he travelled it twice; then was his journey in all, 1800. miles from Ur to Haran; and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disprove this fancy; the manner of Abrahams departing from Haran hath more proof (that he had not animum revertendi, not any thought of looking backward) than any mans bare conjecture, be he of what antiquity or authority soever. For thus it is written of him, Then Abraham took Gen. 12. 7. Sara his wife, and Lot his brothers Son, and all their substance that they possest, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the land of Canaan, and to the land of Canaan they came. Now, if Abraham brought all with him that was dear unto him; his wife and kinsmen, and his, and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walk it back again for his pleasure, in so warm, dangerous, and barren a Countrey as that was: or, if he could have been thereto moved, it is more like that he would have then returned, when he was yet unsettled, and prest with extreme famine at his first arrival. For had his father been then alive, he might have hoped from him to receive more assured comfort and relief, than among the Egyptians, to whom he was a meer stranger, both in Religion and Nation.

What the cause might be of Abraham's return to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures have sent him back thither, about the time of his fathers death: so they, perhaps, if they were urged, could say little else, than that without such a second voyage, their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should do well to make plain, if it be not over-troublesome. They say, that Abraham was in Haran at his father's death, or some time after, being then, by their account, 135. years old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that he left quite undone the business, which, as we read, was within four four or five years after that time, his greateſt,

Gen. 24. or (as may ſeem) his onely care? Did not he bind with a very ſolemn oath, his principal ſervant, in whom he repoſed moſt confidence, to travel into thoſe parts, and ſeek out a Wife for Iſaac his Son? and doth it not appear by all circumſtances, that neither he nor his ſervant were ſo well acquainted in Meſopotamia, that they could particularly deſign any one woman, as a fit match for Iſaac? Surely, if Abraham had been there in perſon ſo lately, as within four or five years before, he would not have forgotten a matter of ſuch importance; but would have truſted his own judgment, in chooſing a woman, fit for her piety, virtue, and other deſirable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his onely Son, who was then five and thirty years old; before which age, moſt of the Patriarchs after the Floud had begotten children; rather than have left all at random to the conſideration of a ſervant, that neither knew any, nor was known of any, in that Countrey. But, let it be ſuppoſed (if it may be believed) that either Abraham forgot his buſineſs when he was there, or that ſomewhat happened, which no man can deviſe;
Gen. 24. 35, 36, &c What might be the reaſon, that Abraham's man, in doing his Maſters errand, was fain to lay open the whole Story of his Maſters proſperity, telling it as news, that Sarah had born to him a Son in her old age? If Abraham himſelf, a more certain Author, had ſo lately been among them, would not all this have been an idle tale? It were needleſs to ſtand long upon a thing ſo evident. Whether it were lawfull for Abraham to have returned back to Haran, would, perhaps, be a queſtion hardly anſwerable; conſidering how averſe he was from permitting his ſon to be carried thither, even though a Wife of his own kinred could
Gen. 24. 6. & 8. not have been obtained without his perſonal preſence. Jacob indeed was ſent thither by
Gen. 28. his Parents, to take a Wife of his own linage; not without Gods eſpecial approbation, by whoſe bleſſing he proſpered in that journey; yet he lived there as a ſervant; ſuffered many injuries; and finally, was driven to convey himſelf from thence by flight. For although it be not a ſentence written, yet out of all written Examples it may be obſerved, that God alloweth not in his ſervants any deſire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken, and tranſplanted them. That brief ſaying, Remember Lot's Wife, contains much matter. Let us conſider Meſopotamia, from whence Abraham was taken, and Egypt, out of which the whole Nation of the Iſraelites were delivered: we ſhall find, that no bleſſing iſſued from either of them, to the Poſterity of the Hebrews. When Hezechias was viſited with an honourable Embaſſie from Babel, it ſeems 2 King. 20. that he conceived great pleaſure in his mind, and thought it a piece of his proſperity; but the Prophecy which thereupon he heard by Eſay, made him to know, that the counſel of God was not agreeable to ſuch thoughts; which more plainly appeared in a following generation, when by the Waters of Babylon Pſal. 137. they ſat down and wept. Concerning Egypt 1 King. 14. 25. and we read, that Seſac and Neco, Kings of Egypt, 2 King. 23. brought calamity upon Iſrael: alſo that their v. 29. confidence in the Egyptian ſuccours, was the cauſe of their deſtruction. Where they were forbidden to return into Egypt, I do not remember, nor can readily find; but it is found Deut. 17. in Deuteronomy, that God had ſaid, They v. 16. ſhould no more return that way; which is given, as the reaſon, why their King might not cauſe the people to return to Egypt, for the multiplying of his Horſes. Whether the Lord had laid any ſuch injunction upon Abraham of not returning to Meſopotamia, I cannot ſay; many things do argue it probably: That he never returned, all circumſtances do (to my underſtanding) both ſtrongly and neceſſarily conclude.

But, becauſe this double paſſage of Abraham is but an imagination; and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can perſwade thoſe of judgment or underſtanding: I take it ſufficient, that S. Stephen hath directly taught us, that Abraham left Haran, his father being dead. And for the reſt, when they ſhew any one Scripture to prove it, I will believe as they do. For all the travels of Abraham are preciſely ſet down in the Scriptures: as firſt from Ur, or Camerina in Chaldæa to Haran, or Charran: and then from Haran (after his fathers death) to Sichem; from Sichem he removed to a mountain between Bethel and Haie: thence into Egypt; from Egypt he returned thither again, where Lot and he parted, becauſe their flocks and heards of Cattel were more then could be fed in that part: from thence the ſecond time he removed to Mamre, neer Hebron: and thence, having purſued Amraphel, and reſcued Lot, he after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumæa under Abimelec: and after, neer unto it at Berſabe, at which time he was ready to offer up his Son Iſaac on the mountain Moriah. But this fiction of his retreat to Haran, or Charran, appeareth not in any one Story, either divine or humane. Now, if it may be ſuppoſed, that Abraham had made any former journey into Canaan, as Levita his Cabala hath feined, it ſhould in reaſon be therewithall be believed, that he would in thoſe his first travels have provided himself of some certain seat, or place of abiding: and not have come a second time with his Wife, kinsmen, family, goods, and Cattel, not knowing whereon to rest himself. But Abraham, when he came from Charran, passed through the North part of Canaan, thence to Sichem, Gen. 12. 6. and the plain of Moriah; where, finding no place to inhabit, he departed thence to Bethel, and Haie: and so from Nation to Nation, to discover and find out some fit habitation: from whence again, as it is written in Genesis the eleventh, He went forth, going and journeying towards the South: and always unsettled. By reason of which wandering to and fro, some say, the Egyptians gave him and his the name of Hebræi.

Mont. in Cald. Further, to prove that he had not formerly beeen in the Countrey, we may note, that ere he came into Bethel and Haie, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God appeared unto him, saying, Unto thy seed will I give this Land, shewing it him, as unto a stranger therein, and as a Land to him unknown. For, Abraham, without any other provident care for himself, believed in the Word of the living God: neither sending before, nor comming first to discover it; but being arrived, he received a second Promise from God, that he would give those Countreys unto him and his seed to inhabite and inherite.

Lastly, what should move any man to think, that Moses would have omitted any such double journey of Abraham's, seeing he setteth down all his passages elsewhere, long and short? as when he moved from Sichem, and seated between Haie and Bethel, the distance being but 20. miles: and when he moved thence to the Valley of Mamre, being but 24. miles; and when he left Mamre, and sat down at Gerar, being less than six miles; No, Moses past over all the times of the first Age with the greater brevity, to hasten him to the Story of Abraham: shutting up all between the Creation and the Floud in six Chapters; which Age lasted 1656. years: but he bestoweth on the Story of Abraham, fourteen Chapters, beginning with his Birth in the eleventh, and ending with his Death in the five & twentieth; and this time endured but 175. years. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moses forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abraham's travels, or other actions: or that he would set down those small removes of five miles, and omit those of three hundred. For such a journey in going and coming would have ministred some variety of matter, or accident, worthy the inserting and adding to Abraham's Story.

§. IV.

The Answer to another of the Objections proposed, shewing, that it was not unlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth year.

NOw, touching the Objection, where it is said, that it was very unlikey that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth year, seeing Abraham himself thought it a wonder to have a Son at an hundred; this is hardly worth the answering. This wonder is indeed mis-cast, and mistaken: Abraham having respect onely to Sarah his Wife, when he spake of their many years. For, when the Angel said unto Abraham in his Tent door at Mamre; Loe, Sarah thy Wife shall have a Son, it followeth in the next Verse, Now, Abraham and Sarah were old, and stricken in age, and it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women: therefore Sarah laughed, &c.

So then, in that it is said it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, and not on Abraham. For Abraham by his second wife Keturah, had many Sons after Sarahs death, as Zimron, Jockshan, Medan, Ishbak, and Shuah: and the eldest of these was born 37. years after Isaac; and the youngest 40. years after. What strangeness then, that Terah, being 130. years old, should beget Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from this supposed despair of Abraham at 100. years? For Sarah died in the year of the world 2145. and Isaac was born in the year 2109. and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109. out of 2145. there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham begat 5. sons 36. years after this supposed wonder, and when Abraham was 137. years old; it is not strange, that his father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Booz, Obed, and Jesse, who lived so many years and Ages after Abraham, begat Sons at 100. years, or neer it, it cannot be marvelled at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130. and Abraham others at the same age, and seven years after.

§. V.

The Answer to two more of the Objections: shewing that we may have certainty of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest Son; and that there was great cause, why in the Story of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

IT follows now, to speak something to the Objection, which brings Abrahams age altogether together in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldeſt Son of Terah, and born when Terah was 70. years old. For Abraham's age being made uncertain, all ſucceding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this Propoſition, That we cannot be certain of Abraham his age, unleſs we make him the eldeſt Son, is falſe. For it is plain in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205. which was the year of his death; then was Abraham 75. And if you aſk, how I can judge of times, either preceding or ſucceeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I anſwer, That S. Stephen hath told us, that Abraham's departure followed the death of his father Terah; and Terah died at 205. ſo as the 75. year of Abraham was the 205. year of Terah; which known, there can be no errour in the account of times ſucceeding. Now, to come to the Objection, where it is ſaid, That Moſes had no reſpect unto Nahor and Haran, becauſe they were out of the Church, but to Abraham onely, with whom God eſtabliſhed the Covenant, and of whom Chriſt deſcended according to the fleſh, &c. I anſwer, that Moſes, for many great and neceſſary cauſes had reſpect of Nahor and Haran. For the ſucceſſion of Gods Church is not witneſſed by Abraham alone, but by the iſſues of Nahor and Haran, were they Idolaters, or otherwiſe. For Nahor was the father of Bethuel, and Bethuel of Rebecca, the mother of Iſrael; and Haran was the Parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcah; and Sarah was mother to Iſaac, and Grandmother to Jacob: Milcah alſo, the wife of Nahor, and mother of Bethuel, was Jacobs great Grandmother; and the age of Sarah, the Daughter of Haran, is eſpecially noted, in that it pleaſed God to give her a Son at 90. years, and when by nature ſhe could not have conceived. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themſelves, yet, becauſe both Nahor and Abraham married the Daughters of their brother Haran; and becauſe Iſaac married Rebecca the grand-child of Nahor; and Jacob, Lea, and Rachel, the Daughters of Laban, the grand-child alſo of Nahor; is was not ſuperfluous in Moſes to give light of thoſe mens times and ages. And though ſometime they worſhipped ſtrange gods, as it is, Joſ. 24. 2. yet I ſee no cauſe to think, that they ſtill continued Idolaters. For they believed and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leaving their natural Countrey and City of Ur in Chaldæa, as Abraham did, and removed thence all, except Haran, who died before his father Terah, ere they left Chaldæa; but Lot, his Son, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the ſiſter of Lot, Abraham married. Nahor alſo, who remained at Charran, gave his Sons daughters to Iſaac, & Jacob, his own kinſmen: he himſelf having alſo married in his own Family; not thinking it pleaſing unto God, to mix themſelves with ſtrangers and Idolaters. And that theſe men at length believed in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For, when Laban had ſeen the ſervant of Abraham ſtanding at the Well beſide Charran, he invited him to his Fathers houſe in this maner, Come in, thou bleſſed of Jehovah, &c. And when this ſervant of Abraham's demanded an anſwer as touching Rebecca, then anſwered Laban and Bethuel, and ſaid, This thing is proceeded of Jehovah: meaning, that it was the will of the true God it ſhould be ſo; wherein he acknowledged Gods providence. Likewiſe in the following verſe, it is written; Take, go, that ſhe may be thy Maſters Sons wife, even as Jehovah hath ſaid. This their often uſing of the name of Jehovah, which is the proper name of the true God, is a ſign that they had the knowledge of him. Gen. 24. 31. Gen. 24. 50.

Now, although it be the opinion of Chryſoſtom, and ſome late Writers, as Cajetan, Oleaſter, Muſculus, Calvin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, becauſe he retained certain Idols, or houſhold-gods, which Rachel ſtole from him; yet, that he believed in the true God, it cannot be denied. For he acknowledgeth the God of Abraham and of Nahor, and he called Abrahams ſervant, bleſſed of Jehovah, as aforeſaid. So as, for my ſelf, I dare not avow, that theſe men were out of the Church, who, ſure I am, were not out of the Faith.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham firſt of the three brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldeſt; together with divers reaſons, proving that Abraham was not the eldeſt Son of Terah.

TO the main Objection; which I anſwer laſt, becauſe it ſeemeth of moſt ſtrength, by which, thoſe that ſtrive to ſhorten the times, endeavour to prove that Abraham was the eldeſt Son of Terah, and born in the 70. year of Terah's life; grounding themſelves firſt and chiefly on this place of the Scripture; And Terah lived ſeventy years, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: To this I ſay, that although Abraham in this verſe be firſt named, yet the ſame is no proof at all that he was the eldeſt and firſt-born Son of Terah. For it is no neceſſary conſequent, that the firſt named in Scriptures was therefore Gen. 11. 26 eldest in bloud and birth; neither doth it appear, that it pleased God to make especial choice of the first Sons in nature and time: for Seth was not the first-born of Adam; nor Isaac of Abraham; nor Jacob of Isaac; nor Juda and Joseph of Jacob; nor David the eldest of Jesse; nor Solomon of David; as is formerly remembred.

But it is written of Noah: Noah was 500. years old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Japhet: shewing, that at the 500. year of his age, he began to beget the first of those three Sons. For, according to S. Augustine, speaking generally, Nec attendendus est in his ordo nativitatis, sed significatio futuræ dignitatis: in qua excelluit Abraham: The order of nativity is not here to be respected, but the signification of the future dignity; in which Abraham was preferred. And therefore, as in the order of the Sons of Noah, so is it here; where it is said, That Terah lived 70. years, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: For it was late ere Terah began to beget Sons, himself being begotten by his father Nahor, at 29. as other his Ancestors were at 30. The like also hapned to Noah; for whereas Adam begat Seth at 133. Enosh Kenan at 90. Kenan Mahalaleel at 70. Mahalaleel Jared at 60. Noah was yet 500. years old when he began to beget the first of his three Sons, as aforesaid. And Saint Augustine, in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the Opinion, that Abraham was the youngest of Terah's Sons, than otherwise: though for his excellency he was worthily named first. His own words are these: Fieri enim ut potuit posterior sit generatus Abraham: sed merito excellentiæ, qua in Scripturis valde commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus. It might be, saith he, that Abraham was begotten later; but was first named, in regard of his excellency, for which in Scripture he is much commended. So as the naming first or last, proveth nothing who was first or last born; either in those issues of Noah, or in these of Terah: Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touching his election or spiritual blessing; for Moses nameth first the children of the promise, and the eldest and first in Gods favour. Pietas ergo, vel ipsa potius electio divina, quæ comitem secum trahit pietatem, & Dei timorẽ, primas partes dat Semo in liberis Noa, & Abrahamo in liberis Thare: Piety, saith he, or rather divine election, which doth evermore draw with it, or after it, Piety, and the fear of God, gave place and precedency to Sem among the children of Noah, and to Abraham among those of Thare.

Aug quæst. super Gen. 25.

For the rest, it is manifest, that Abraham entred Canaan in the 75. year of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Ishmael, when Abraham had lived 86. years. It was at Gerar (the south border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had consumed 100 years. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham rose out, when he rescued Lot, & overthrew Amraphel; and he had then but the age of 83. years: and it is as manifest, that he parted from Haran after his father Terah was dead. But, if Terah begat Abraham at 70. years old, then must Abraham have been 135. years when he first set his foot in Canaan, seeing Terah must be dead ere he parted, and so 70. added to 135. make 205. the true age of Terah; which is contrary to all those places of Scripture before remembred. For he entred at 75. he rescued Lot at 83. he had Ismael at 86. he had Isaac at 100. proved by the former places.

Gen. 14.

Moreover, if Abraham were the eldest Son of Terah, and born in the 70. year of his age: then had Terah lived till Isaac had been 35. years old, and Ishmael 49. both which must then have been born in Mesopotamia, and therein fostered to that age: unless we should either deny credit to S. Stephen, who saith, that Abraham departed from Mesopotamia after his fathers death: or else believe the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrator, who in his Cronologia antoptica, saith it was about his fathers death; because the Greek word μετὰ may be translated by the Latine sub, as well as by post: which, though elswhere it may be, yet cannot be so in this place. For it were most improperly spoken, to say, that those things were done about Terah's death, which were 60. years before. Wherefore, supposing Abraham to have been born in the 70. year of Terah; we must give those times and places of birth to Abraham's children, which no Authority will warrant; For Abraham had no children in Ur of Chaldæa, nor in Haran, nor in ten years after his arrival into Canaan. For the year of Terah's death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the year of the World, 2083. and the year of Ishmael's birth was the Worlds year, 2094. which maketh ten years difference. And that Isaac was born in Canaan, and was to be offered upon the mountain Moriah therein, 39. miles from Bersabe, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three Angels first of all appear'd to Abraham in the vally of Mamre, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot be, that any of Abrahams Sons were born in Mesopotamia; nor while Terah lived; nor in less than ten years after Terah's death; and then consequently was not Abraham the eldest Son of Terah, nor born in the 70. year of Terah's age.

Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75. if Terah had begotten him at 70. then then had Terah lived but 145. for 70. and 75. make 145. which muſt alſo have been the full age of Terah; but Terah lived 205. years, and therefore was not Abraham born in the 70. year of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifeſt, that Haran was the elder, if not the eldeſt brother of Abraham; for Sarah, or Iſcah, wanted but ten years of Abraham's age: Iſaac being born when Abraham was 100. and Sarah 90. years old.

It followeth then, that if Abraham had been the elder brother of Haran, Haran muſt have begotten Sarah at nine years old: for granting that Haran was born but one year after Abraham, and Sarah within ten years as old as Abraham, then of neceſſity muſt Haran beget her, when he had lived but nine years; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And, that Iſcah was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth; both names, ſaith he, bearing the ſame ſignification; and names of principality. Again, to what end was the word Iſcah of Jiſhcah inſerted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? For, to ſpeak of any thing ſuperfluous, it is not uſed in Gods Book: and if Iſcah had not belonged to the Story, it had been but an idle name, to no purpoſe remembred.

Now, if it had been true (as thoſe of the contrary opinion affirm) that Moſes had no reſpect of Nahor and Haran, who were notwithſtanding the Parents of Bethuel and Rebecca, the mother of Iſrael, and of Chriſt: what regard then had Moſes of Iſcah in this place, were ſhe not Sarah, but otherwiſe an idle name, of whom there is nothing elſe firſt or laſt?

The age alſo of Lot diſproveth the elderſhip of Abraham; for Lot was called an old man, when Abraham was but 83. years old: And if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham, and Haran were father to Lot, Sarah, and Milcah; Abraham marrying one of Haran's Daughters, and Nahor the other, Sarah alſo being within ten years as old as Abraham; it may appear to every reaſonable man (not obſtinate and prejudicate) that Haran was the eldeſt Son of Terah, and not Abraham; who alſo died firſt, and before his father left Ur in Chaldæa. Alſo Lyra reaſoneth againſt this opinion of Abraham's elderſhip, upon the ſame place of Geneſis; drawing arguments from the age of Sarah, who was but ten years younger than Abraham himſelf. Lyra his words are theſe: Si igitur Haran fuit junior ipſa Abraham, ſequitur quòd non habebat decem annos quando genuit Saram: imò nec octo, &c. and afterward, & ideò melius videtur dicendum, quod Abraham fuit ultimò natus de tribus filiis Thare, tamen nominatur primò, propter ejus dignitatem: & ponendus erat caput ſtirpis & generationis ſequentis: & quia primò facta eſt ei repromiſſio expreſſa de Chriſto, ſicut ſupra dictum eſt de Sem, &c. If therefore (ſaith Lyra) Haran was younger than Abraham himſelf, it followeth, that he was not ten years old when he begat Sarah: And therefore it ſeemeth better to be ſaid, that Abraham was the laſt born of the three Sons of Thare, nevertheleſs, he is named firſt for his dignity, both becauſe he was to be ordained head of the ſtock and generation following, and becauſe the Promiſe of Chriſt was firſt made unto him, as before it is ſaid of Sem.

A Concluſion of this Diſpute, noting the Authours on both ſides; with an Admonition, that they which ſhorten the times, make all antient Stories the more unprobable.

IT therefore agreeth with the Scriptures, with Nature, Time, and Reaſon, that Haran was the eldeſt Son of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was born in the 130. year of Terah's life, and not in the 70. year. For Abraham departing Charran after Terah died, according to S. Stephen, and that journey by Abraham performed, when he was 75. years old; theſe two numbers added, make 205. years, the full age of Terah: ſeeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entred Canaan. For my ſelf, I have no other end herein, than to manifeſt the Worlds ſtory. I reverence the judgments of the Fathers: but I know they were miſtaken in particulars. Saint Auguſtine was doubtfull, and coud not determine this controverſie. For, whatſoever is borrowed out of his ſixteenth Book de Civitate Dei, cap. 15. the ſame may be anſwered out of himſelf in his five and twentieth Queſtion upon Geneſis. But S. Auguſtine herein followed Joſephus and Iſidor; and Beda followed S. Auguſtine. And it was out of a fooliſh pride and vanity, that the Hebrews and Joſephus ſought to make Abraham the firſt born: as if God had had reſpect to the eldeſt in nature. So did Joſephus, together with Nicholas Damaſcenus (thinking thereby to glorifie the Jewiſh Nation) make Abraham a King, entitling Sarah by the name of Queen Sarah; and ſaid, that Abraham was followed with 318. Captains, of which every one had an infinite multitude under him; trecentos & octodecim præfectos habuit, quorum ſingulis infinita multitudo parebat. And that Pharaoh invading him with a great Army, took from him his Wife Sarah: Such Fables argue that Josephus is not to be believed, but with discreet reservations.

This account of times, allowing no more than 292. years from the Floud to Abraham, is upheld by many of the Hebrews. But how should we value the opinion of such Chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod? Surely, if their judgment in such matters were worthy to be regarded, it would have apeared in setting down the succession of the Persian Kings under whom they lived, whose History was not so far remote in time, as these Antiquities, nor wanting the light of many good Writers. Yet grosly have they erred therein, and so familiar are their mistakings in all things of like nature, that we seldom find their opinion rehearsed without the confutation treading on the heels of it. They of the Roman Religion, are also generally on the same side; it being a thing usual among them, to maintain whatsoever they have been formerly known to hold and believe. Contrariwise, of the more antient, Theodoret, and some following him; of later times, Beroaldus, Peucer, Calvin, Junius, Beza, Broughton, Doct. Gibbons, and Moore, with divers of the Protestants, hold Abraham to have been born in the 130. year of his father Terah. From these (as in a case not concerning any point in Religion) divers of the same Religion, and those, nevertheless, good Authours, as Bucholcerus, Chitræus, Functius and others, are very averse herein, especially Josephus Scaliger with his Sethus Calvisius, proclaiming Beroaldus an arch-heretick in Chronology, and condemning this opinion of his as poisonous. Contrariwise, Augustinus Torniellus, a Priest of the Congregation of S. Paul, a judicious, diligent, and free Writer, whose Annals are newly set forth, very earnestly defends the opinion, which I have already delivered; not alleging Beroaldus, nor any Protestant Writer, as being, perhaps, unwilling to owe thanks to Hereticks. For my self, I do neither mislike the contrary opinion, because commonly those of the Romish Religion labour to uphold it; nor favour this later account of times, because many notable men of the Protestant Writers have approved it; but for the truth it self. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testimonies of Scripture, I will add thus much more to the rest. First, it is apparent to all men of judgment, that the best approved Historians, divine, and prophane, labour to investigate the truth of times, thereby to approve the Stories, and fore-past actions of the World; and not the truth of Histories to approve the times by. Let us then make judgment to our selves, which of those two accounts give the best reputation to the Story of the Scriptures; teaching the Worlds new plantation, and the continuance of Gods Church: either that of Josephus, and those which follow him; who makes but 292. years, or thereabouts, between the Floud and Birth of Abraham: or this other account, which make 352. years between the one and the other: the one making Abraham to be the first-born of Thare, in the 70. year of his life; the other a younger Son of Thare, and born when he had lived 130. years. And, if we look over all, and do not hastily satisfie our understanding with the first things offered, and thereby being satiated do slothfully and drowsily sit down; we shall find it more agreeable, rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some Editions, make it above 1072. years between the Floud and Abraham's Birth; than to take away any part of those 352. years given. For, if we advisedly consider the state and continuance of the World, such as it was in Abraham's time, yea, before Abraham was born, we shall find, that it were very ill done of us, by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times overdeeply between Abraham and the Floud: because in cutting them too neer the quick, the reputation of the whole Story might, perchance, bleed thereby, were not the testimony of the Scriptures supreme, so as no objection can approach it: and that we did not follow withall this Precept of S. Augustine, That whersoever any one place in the Scriptures may be conceived disagreeing to the whole, the same is, by ignorance of interpretation, mis-understood. For, in Abraham's time, all the then known parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings. Egypt had many magnificent Cities; and so had Palæstina, and all the bordering Countries, yea, all that part of the World besides, as far as India; and those not built with sticks, but of hewn stone, and defended with walls and rampires; which magnificence needed a Parent of more antiquity, than those other men have supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest, and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to beget doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and marvels? giving also strength thereby to common cavillers, and to those mens apish brains, who onely bend their wits to find impossibilities, and monsters, in the Story of the World and Man-kind.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

A Computation of the times of the Assyrians, and others, grounded upon the times noted in the Story of Abraham.

An mundi 2008. dil. 352. natus Abraham, Euſ. Aug. de Civit. Dei, l. 16. c. 17.

IN this ſort therefore, for the reaſons before alleged, I conclude, that from the general Floud, to the birth of Abraham, 352. years were conſumed; and taking the Aſſyrian Hiſtory with us, the ſame number of years were ſpent from the Floud to the 43. year of Ninus: in which 43. year of Ninus, Abraham was born; which hapned in the year of the World, 2009.

Now, of this time of 352. years, we muſt give one part as well to the increaſe of thoſe people which came into Shinaar, as to thoſe that ſtayed in the Eaſt, to wit, 30. years to Chus, ere he begat Seba; of which, though the Scriptures are ſilent, yet, becauſe thoſe of the ſame time had that age when they begat their firſt Sons, we may the more ſafely give the like allowance to theſe. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg Regu at 30. Regu Serug at 32. Now, after Seba, Chus begat Havilah, Sabta, Raama and Sabtecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was born, as it appeareth, Gen. 10. which S. Auguſtine approveth. Giving then 30. years more to Raama ere he begat Sheba, and five years to the five elder brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered, that 65. years were conſumed ere Nimrod himſelf was born; and that Raama had that age before any of his Sons were begotten, it may be gathered by example and compariſon: for Peleg the fourth from Noah, as Raama was, begat Reu in the ſame year of his life.

Aug. de Civit. Dei.

Gen. 11. 18

Let us then allow 60. years more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brought forth, or elſe we ſhall hardly find people to build Babel; for ſure we are, that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: becauſe it diſpleaſed God. Theſe two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125. The reſt of the time of 131. (in which year they arrived in Shinaar, whereof there are ſix years remaining) we may give them for their travels from the Eaſt; becauſe they were peſtered with women, children and cattel: and, as ſome ancient Writers have conceived, and Becanus of later times, they kept always the mountain ſides, for fear of a ſecond floud. Now, if we take this number of 131. out of 352. there remains 221. of which number, Beroſus beſtoweth 65. on Belus, and 42. on Ninus before Abraham born: both which, S. Auguſtine approveth: which two numbers taken again out of 221. there remaineth 114. years of the 352. from the Floud to Abraham's birth; which number of 114. neceſſity beſtoweth on Nimrod.

An à ſalute humani generis ab aquis ceſſiſſimo primo cœpit regnum Babylonium ſub noſtro Saturno patre Jovis Beli, qui imperavit annis 65. Beroſus.

And if it be objected, that this time given to Nimrod is over-long; ſure, if we compare the age of Nimrod with the reſt of the ſame deſcent from Noah, it will rather appear over ſhort. For Nimrod, by this account, lived in all but 179. years, whereof he reigned 112. whereas Sale, who was the Son of Arphaxad, the Son of Sem, lived 403. years: and of the ſame age of the World was Nimrod the Son of Chus, the Son of Cham.

Now, after Abraham was born,
Ninus reigned 9. years, which added to 43. make 52.
Ninus dieth, and leaveth Semiramis his Succeſſour.

Semiramis governed the Empire of Babylonia and Aſſyria 42. years, and died in the 52. year complete of Abraham's life. Of the World, 2017. Of the Floud, 961.

Ninias, or Zameis ſucceeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. years; in the ſecond year of whoſe reign, Abraham left Meſopotamia. 2059 mundi. 403. à dil. 2083. 417. 2093. 437.

When Abraham was 85. years old, he reſcued his Nephew Lot, and overthrew by ſurpriſe Amraphel, King of Shinaar, or Babylonia. Ninias reigned 38. years, and Abraham came into Canaan but 23. years after Semiramis died: which was the 75. year of his age; ſo that Amraphel may ſeem to have been this Ninias, the Son of Ninus, and Semiramis, whoſe 23. years, as aforeſaid, being the 75. year of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might have received this overthrow in the 85. year of Abraham, and the 33. year of his own reign: after which he reigned five years, which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reaſons to the contrary, urging that this Amraphel could not be Ninias, are not eaſily anſwered. Howbeit, for the times of the Aſſyrian Kings, that they are to be ordered as we have ſet down, according to the times noted by Moſes in the Story of Abraham, it is moſt certain; unleſs we will either derogate from the truth of Moſes his computation, which were impiety, or account the whole Hiſtory of Ninus and Semiramis to be but a fiction; which were to condemn all antient Hiſtorians for Fablers.

That Amraphel, one of the four Kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have been Ninias the Son of Ninus.

AND now, touching this Amraphel, whom Moſes makes King of Shinaar, or Babylonia, in the 85. year of Abraham's life, that is, in the 33. year of the reign of Ninias Zameis the King of the Assyrians, the Son of Ninus, and Semiramis, it is hard to affirm what he was, and how he could be at this time King of Babylonia: Ninias Zameis then reigning there. To this doubt, the answer which first offereth it self as most probable, is that which hath been already noted, that this Ninias, or Zameis, was no other than our Amraphel; who invaded Traconitis, or Basan, and overthew those five Kings of Pentapolis, or the Valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell us, that Amraphel was King of Shinaar, which is Babylonia; and the times before accounted make him to be the successor of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85. year of Abraham's life, wherein he rescu'd Lot, slew Chedorlaomer, and overthrew the rest. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarch; for Chedorlaomer commanded in chief, though Amraphel be first named by Moses in the first Verse of the fourteenth Chapter of Genesis. For the Kings of the Valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or the five Cities, were the vassals of Chedorlaomer, and not of Amraphel; as it is written, Gen. 14. 4. Twelve years were they subject to Chedorlaomer, but in the thirteenth year they rebelled, and in the fourteenth year came Chedorlaomer, and the Kings that were with him; and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principal in this enterprise, who was then King of Elam which is Persia: Now, Persia being seated over Tygris, and to the East of Amraphel's Countrey; and the other two Kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being seated to the West of Shinaar, or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it self, seemeth at this time to have had no great scope or large Dominion. For, had Amraphel been so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis, whom he succeeded, he should not have needed the assistance of three or four Kings for this Expedition. But though Chedolaomer were the first and greatest of those four Kings (as it is manifest that he was: For these little Kings of Sodome, Gomora, &c. were his vassals, and not Amraphel's) yet this makes not the conjecture less probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninias. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Assyria had now (as we shall shew more plainly in that which followeth) received a down-right fall at the time of this Warr: though not long before it commanded all the Kingdoms between India and the Phœnician Sea; to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

Of Arioch, another of the four Kings, and that Ellas, whereof he is said to have been King, lies between Cœlosyria and Arabia Petræa.

NOw, the two other Kings joined with Amraphel and Chedorlaomer, were Arioch and Tidal; the one King of Ellassar, the other of the Nations. For Ellassar, Aquila, and Hierom, write Pontus: so Tostatus thinketh that it should be Hellespont: which opinion Pererius favoureth. But this is onely to defend the Latine translation. For as Pontus, so is Hellespont farr distant, and out of the way to send any Armies into Arabia Petræa, or into Idumæa; which Countries these four Kings chiefly invaded: Besides that, it is certain, that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had never any dominion in Asia the less. For at such time as the Assyrians feared the invasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the less as Commanders; but used all the art they had, to invite Cræsus to their assistance; perswading him, that nothing could be more dangerous for himself, and the other Kings of those parts, than the success of the Medes against the Assyrians. But examine the enterprise, what it was. These Gen. 14. Kings (saith the Text) made warr with Bera, Kingdom of Sodom, Birsha King of Gomora, Shinab King of Admath, and Shemebar King of Zeboim, and the King of Bela, which is Zoar. All which five Kings had not so much ground as Middlesex; being such a kind of Reguli, as Josua found in the Land long after: namely, Lords of Cities and small Teritories adjoining; of which Canaan had three and thirty, all slain or hanged by Josua. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are said also to have invaded, be imagined to have been at that time of any great power; and therefore to call in Kings from Pontus, or Hellespont, had manifested a great impotence and weakness in the Kings of Babylon and Persia. Xenophon.

And though it be alleged for an Example, that divers Kings farr off, came to assist Pompey against Cæsar; yet these same examples, without like occasions and circumstances, do neither lead nor teach. For there was no cause to fear the greatness of these petty Kings, or of the other Countries: But the eyes of the World were fixed on Cæsar; and his undertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no less doubtfull than fearfull: But the whole Countrey by these four Kings mastered in their passage, was afterward given to the half Tribe of Manasse, Manasse, Gad, and Reuben; a narrow Valley of ground, lying between Jordan and the Mountains of Seir; inclosed by the River of Arnon on the South side, and by Lybanus on the North, consisting of two small Provinces of Traconitis, or Basan, and the Region of the Moabites; a conquest farr unvaluable, and little answering to the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus and Semiramis, who subjected all the great Kings of that part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Hellespont, or any other part of Asia the less. But as the Vulgar, and Aquila, convert Ellassar by Pontus: So Symmachus makes Arioch, a King of the Scythians, a King indeed, as farr fetched to join with the Assyrians in this Warr, as the World had any at that time.

The Septuagint do not change the word of Ellassar at all, but as they keep the word Ararat, on the Mountains whereof the Ark did rest; so do they in this place retain the word Ellassar, being doubtfull to give it a wrong interpretation. And Pererius himself remembreth other opinions farr more probable than this of Pontus, or Hellespont: yet he dares not avow his liking of them, becaus the Latine Translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Urbibus, a Græcian Cosmographer, findeth the City of Ellas in the border of Cœlosyria: and Saint Hierom calleth Ellas the City of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now, although the same be seated by Stephanus in Cœlosyria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was King; who formerly joined with Ninus in all his Conquests, being of the same Family, and descended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Arius was by the Hebrew written Arioch; and afterward again Aretas; as in the Machabees: the Kings of Arabia holding that name even to the time of S. Paul, who was sought to be betrayed by the Lievetenant of Aretas, commanding in Damascus. They were Princes, for the most part, confederate and depending upon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that we find in Daniel; that in the time of Nebuchodonosor, one Arioch was General of his Army, and the principal Commander under him, who was a King of Kings: which makes it plain, that Arioch here spoken of, the Son of that Arioch, Confederate of Ninus, was no King of Pontus, nor of Scythia, Regions farr removed from the Assyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch, who commanded under Nebuchodonosor, is mentioned in Judith, by the name of King of the Elymeans; who are a Nation of Persians, bordering Assyria, according to Stephanus, though Pliny sets it between the Sea-coast and Media: and if any brother of the Arabian Kings, or other of that House (known by the name of Arius, Arioch, Areta, or Aretas) had the Government of that Persian Province, called Elymais (as it seemeth they had, by the places of Daniel and Judith) yet the same was in Nebuchodonosor's time. But this Arioch here spoken of, may with more reason be taken for the King of Arabia, the Son of Arius, the Confederate of Ninus, whose Sons held league, as their fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that side towards the West unto Babylonia, and Chaldæa; and in amity with them from the beginning, and of their own House and Bloud; which Diod. Siculus also confirmeth.

§. XI.

Of Tidal, another of the four Kings.

THe fourth King by Abraham overthrown, was Tidal, King of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Gojim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mixt People; Calvin of Runnagates without habitation. Pererius out of Strabo, finds that Galilæa was inhabited by divers Nations, which were a mixt People: namely, of Egyptians, Arabians, and Phœnicians. Nam tales sunt qui Galilæam habitant; Such are the Inhabitants of Galile, saith Strabo; and therefore was Tidal called King of these Nations, as they suppose. And so it may be; but the authority of Strabo is nothing in this Question. For Galilæa was not Peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For, when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanite was then in the Land, howsoever they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not. But there are many petty Kingdoms adjoining to Phœnicia and Palæstina; as Palmyrena, Butanea, Laodicene, Apamena, Chalcidice, Cassiotis, Chalibonitis, and all these do also join themselves to Mesopotamia on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselves together under Tidal, I take to be the probablest conjecture.

§. XII.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer, the chief of the four kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia; and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

LAstly, whereas it is conceived that Chederlaomer was the Assyrian Emperor, and that Amraphel was but a Satrape, Viceroy, or Provincial Governour of Babylonia, and that the other Kings named, were such also, I cannot agree with Pererius in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assur and Shinaar, to call the Assyrian a King of Elam: those Kings being in the Scriptures evermore called by the name of Chaldæa, Shinaar, Babylonia, or Assyria; but never by Elam: and Chedorlaomer, or Kedarlaomer was so called of Kidor, from Cidarim, which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale: for so Q. Curtius calleth the garment which the Persian Kings ware on their heads.

Neither do I believe, that the Assyrian, or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatness at the time of this invasion; and my reasons are these: First, example and experience teach us, that those things which are set up hastily, or forced violently, do not long last. Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not to over-look what it self had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetual. For his Empire died at once with himself: all whose chief Commanders became Kings after him. Tamberlain conquered Asia and India, with a storm-like, and terrible success: but to prevalent fury, God hath adjoined a short life; and whatsoever things Nature her self worketh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his Victories perished with him, if not before.

Ninus, being the first whom the madness of boundless dominion transported, invaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious over them: a man violent, insolent and cruel. Semiramis taking the opportunity, and being more proud, adventurous, and ambitious than her Paramour; enlarged the Babylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein, with buildings un-exampled. But her Son, having changed Nature and and Condition with his Mother, proved no less feminine than she was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continual smart, put the Patient in mind how to cure the one, and revenge the other: so those Kings adjoining (whose subjection and calamities incident, were but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not sleep, when the advantage was offered by such a successour. For, In regno Babylonico hic parum resplendu-it; This king shined little (saith Nanclerus of Ninias) in the Babylonian Kingdom. And likely it is, that the necks of mortal men, having been never before galled with the yeak of forein dominion, nor having ever had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of living in slavery; no long descent having as yet invested the Assyrian with a right; nor any other title being for him pretended, than a strong hand; the fooliſh and effeminate Son of a tyrannous and hated father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his vassals, with a powerless mastering, and a mind less industrious than his father and mother had used before him. And he that was so much given over to licentious idleness, as to suffer his mother to reign 42. years, and thereof the greatest part after he came to mans estate: witnessed thereby to the World, that he so much preferred ease before honour, and bodily pleasures before greatness, as he neither endeavoured to gain what he could not govern, nor to keep what he could not without contentious peril enjoy.

These considerations being joined to the Story of Amraphel, delivered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel King of Shinaar was rather an inferiour to the King of Persia, than either his superiour, or equal; make it seem probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, and restrained again to Babylonia.

For conclusion, I will add these two arguments confirming the former: First, that at such time as it pleased God to impose that great travel upon Abraham, from Ur in Chaldæa to Charran, and then to Canaan, a passage of 700. miles, or little less, with women, children, and carriages; the Countries through which he wandred were then settled, and in peace. For it was the 23. year of Ninias, when Abraham obeying the voice of God, took this great journey in hand: in which time of 23. years after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour Princes had recovered their liberty and former estates. For Semiramis Army of four millions, with her self, utterly consumed in India, and all her armies and engins of war, at the same time lost, gave an occasion and opportunity even to the poorest souls and weakest hearted of the World, to repurchase their former liberty. Strab. l. 15.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and antientest Historians, that Arius the Son of Ninias, or Amraphel, invaded the Bactrians, and Caspians, and again subjected them: which which needed not, if they had not been revolted from Ninias, after Ninus death. And as Arioch recovered one part, so did Baleus, or Balaneus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest revolted, to their former obedience. Of whom it is said, that he conquered from Egypt to India; and therefore was called Xerxes, id est, Victor & triumphator, A conqueror and triumpher; which undertakings had been no other than the effects of madness, had not those Countries freed themselves from the Babylonian subjection. Now, if we shall make any doubt thereof, that is, of the conquest of Arius and Xerxes, both which lived after Ninus and Ninias, we may as well think the rest of Ninus and Semiramis to be but feined; but if we grant this conquest, then it is true, that while Ninias or Amraphel ruled, the Assyrian Empire was torn asunder, according to that which had been gathered out of Moses, as before remembred.

§. XIII.

That it is not unprobable that the four kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselves; and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came; which if so, we need not say, that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

THe consent of all Writers, whose works have come to my perusal, agreeing as they do, that these four Kings, Amraphel of Shinaar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and their fellows, were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they are, or seem intituled; doth almost inforce us to think, that the history must so be understood, as I have delivered. But, if in this place, as often elsewhere in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be set for People of those Lands, or if (as Hierom hath it) Chedorlaomer was King of the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is, of People, either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundry Regions; then may we otherwise conceive of this History: removing thereby some difficulties, which men, perhaps, have been unwilling to find, because they could not find how to resolve them. For, as it had been a strange conjecture, to think that Arioch was drawn to assist the Persian against the Sodomite, as far as from Pontus, where it is very unlikely that Chedorlaomer was known, and almost impossible, that the vale of Siddim should have been once named: so in true estimation, it is a thing of great improbability, that Chedorlaomer, if he were King of Persia alone, should pass through so great a part of the World, as the countries of Assyria, Chaldæa, Mesopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia, and Canaan, to subdue those five Towns, whose very names how they should come to his ear, being disjoined by so many great Naions of different Languages, a wise man could hardly conjecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia, together with the Babylonian himself, yea, the Kingdom of Ellasar and that of Tidal, so far off removed, were become his dependences; what reason can we find that might have induced him to hearken after Sodom and Gomorrah? and when he should have sought the establishment of his new gotten Empire, by rooting out the Posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharnus of Media, and Zoroaster of Bactria) then to employ the forces of Amraphel, and those other Kings, against five petty Towns, leaving Tyrus and Sidon, and the great City Damasco, with many other places of much importance, and far neerer unto him, unsubdued? Now, as these doubts, which may be alleged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement: so are the objections to be made against his conquest of these five Cities, when they had revolted, as forcible; yea, and more, as being grounded upon the Text it self. For first, what madness had it been in that small Province, to rebel against so powerfull a Monarch? Or if it were so, that they dwelling far from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, than that he should come or send to reclaim them; was it not more than madness in them, when his terrible Army approached, still to entertain hope of evasion; yea, to make resistance (being themselves a dissolute, and therefore unwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations between Euphrates, yea, between themselves and the River Indus? Likewise, on the part of Chedorlaomer, we should find no great wisdom, if he, knowing the weakness of this People, had raised such a world of men against them: whom by any Lievtenant, with small forces, he might have subdued. For the perpetual inheritance of that little Countrey, was not sufficient to countervail one Months charges of so huge an Army. How small then must his valour have been, who with so mighty preparations effected no more than the wasting of that Valley, wherein he left the Cities standing, taking no one of them; but returned well contented with a few prisoners, and the pillage of the Countrey, although he had broken their Army in the field? Now, the Scriptures do not of this invasion (supposed so great) make any fearfull matter:

matter; but compoſe the two Armies as equally matcht, ſaying, they were four Kings againſt five; yea, if the place be literally
Gen. 14. 17 expounded, we ſhall find that Abraham ſlew all theſe Kings; of which great ſlaughter no Hiſtory makes mention: Neither will the reign of Ninias, who lived four or five years longer, permit that he ſhould have died ſo ſoon; neither would Hiſtories have forgotten the manner of his death, if he had ſo ſtrangely periſhed in Syria. Whereby it appears, that theſe four Kings were not the ſame that they are commonly thought; nor their forces ſo great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well be true, that theſe Kings were ſuch as many others, who in that age carried the ſame title; Lords and Commanders every one of his own company, which he carried forth as a Colony, ſeeking place where to ſettle himſelf and them, as was the uſual manner of thoſe times.

Neither is it improbable, that Chedorlaomer leading a troup of Perſians, Amraphel ſome people out of Shinaar, and Tidal others gathered out of ſundry places, might conſort together, and make the weakeſt of the Countrey which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whoſoever will conſider the beginning of the firſt Book of Thucydides, with the manner of diſcoveries, conqueſts and plantations, in the infancy of Greece; or the manner of the Saracens invading Africa and Spain, with almoſt as many Kings as ſeveral Armies; or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new diſcoveries, paſſages, and conqueſts in the Weſt-Indies; may eaſily perceive, that it was neither unuſual for the leaders of Colonies to receive title from the people whom they conducted; nor to make aliances together, and break them again, diſturbing ſometimes one the other, ſometimes helping in purſuit of a conqueſt. That Amraphel and his aſſociates were ſuch manner of Commanders, it may ſeem the more likely, by the ſlothfull quality of Ninias then reigning in Aſſyria; whoſe unmanlike temper was ſuch, as might well give occaſion to ſuch undertaking ſpirits, as wanted the employments whereunto they were accuſtomed in the reign of Semiramis, rather to ſeek adventures abroad, than to remain at home unregarded, whilſt others, more unworthy than themſelves, were advanced. If the conſent of the whole ſtream of Writers upon this place, make this conjecture diſagreeable to the Text, to the authority whereof all humane reaſon muſt ſubſcribe, then we may hold our ſelves to the former conjecture, Amraphel was Ninias; and that the power of his Anceſtors being by his ſloth decayed, he might well be inferiour to the Perſian Chedorlaomer: or if this do not ſatisfie, we may ſay that Amraphel was an under-king, or Satrapa of Shinaar, under Ninias; who may be ſuppoſed to have had his Imperial ſeat in his fathers City, Ninive; and to have preferred it before Shinaar and Babylon the City of his mother, whom he hated as an uſurper of his right. But, if it were poſſible that in a caſe not concerning any mans Salvation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great pains, all might erre; then can I think that the opinion, that thoſe four Kings were Leaders of Colonies, ſent out of the Countries named in the Text, and not Kings of the Countries themſelves, is moſt conſonant, both to the condition of thoſe times, and to the Scripture. And hereto add, that Chedorlaomer ſeems rather called a Perſian King, than King of Perſia: And that Arioch (whoſe Kingdom undoubtedly was between Syria and Arabia) having been a man of action, or being a worthy mans Son, was very well pleaſed to give paſſage and aſſiſtance to theſe Captains or petty Kings. Theſe, and ſuch like things here to urge, were but with circumſtances to adorn a ſuppoſition, which either may ſtand without them, or if it muſt fall, is unworthy to have coſt beſtowed upon it; eſpecially conſidering, that it is not my intent to employ any more time in making it good, but to leave it wholly to the Reader's pleaſure, to follow any of theſe opinions, or any other, if he find any that ſhall ſeem better than theſe. But of what countries or people ſoever theſe four were Kings, this Expedition is the onely publick action that we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to this Story, and of his Sons, and of his Nephews, Eſau and Jacob, as they are regiſtred by Moſes, becauſe it is not our purpoſe, either to ſtand upon things generally known to all Chriſtians, nor to repeat what hath been elſe-where already ſpoken, nor to prevent our ſelves in things that may hereafter in due place be remembred, we paſs them here in ſilence. And becauſe in the Story of Abraham and his Poſterity, there is much mention of Egypt: by which it appears, that even in the time of Abraham, it was a ſettled and flouriſhing Kingdom; it will not be amiſs in the next place to ſpeak ſomewhat of the Antiquities and firſt Kings thereof.

Of the Kings of Egypt, from the firſt Peopling of it after the Floud, to the time of the delivery of the Iſraelites from thence.

§. I.

A Brief of the names and times of the firſt Kings of Egypt; with a note of the cauſes of difficulty in reſolving of the truth in theſe points.

SOon after the confuſion at Babel (as it ſeems) Cham, with many of his iſſue and followers (having doubtleſs known the fertility of Egypt before the Floud) came thither and took poſſeſſion of the Countrey; in which they built many Cities; and began the Kingdom one hundred ninety one years after the Deluge. The antient Governours of this Kingdom, till ſuch time as Iſrael departed Egypt, are ſhewn in the Table following.

The Table, and eſpecially the Chronologie, is to be confirmed by probabilities and conjectures, becauſe in ſuch obſcurity, manifeſt and reſtleſs truth cannot be found. For Saint Auguſtine, a man of exceeding great judgement, and incomparable diligence, who had ſought into all Antiquities, and had read the Books of Varro, which now are loſt, yet omitted the ſucceſſion of the Egyptian kings, which he would not have done, if they had not been more uncertain than the Sicyonians, whom he remembreth, than whom doubtleſs they were more glorious. One great occaſion of this obſcurity in the Egyptian Story, war the ambition of the Prieſts; who, to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many leaſings, and recounted unto ſtrangers the names of many Kings, that never reigned. What ground they had for theſe reports of ſuppoſed Kings, it ſhall appear anon. Sure it is, That the magnificent Works, and royal Buildings in Egypt, ſuch as are never found but in States that have greatly flouriſhed, witneſs that their Princes were of marvelous greatneſs, and that the reports of the Prieſts were not altogether falſe. A ſecond cauſe of our ignorance in the Egyptian Hiſtory, was the too much credulity of ſome good Authours, who believing the manifold and contrary reports of ſundry Egyptians, and publiſhing in their own names ſuch as pleaſed them beſt, have confirmed them, and, as it were, inforced them upon us by their Authority. A third and general cauſe of more than Egyptian darkneſs in all antient Hiſtories, is the Edition of many Authors, by John Annius, of whom (if to the cenſures of ſundry very learned, I may add mine) I think thus; that Annius having ſeen ſome fragments of thoſe Writers, and added unto them what he would, may be credited, as an avoucher of true Hiſtories, where approved Writers confirm him; but otherwiſe is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it cometh to paſs, that the account of Authours, either in the Chronologie, or Genealogie of the Egyptian Kings, runs three altogether different ways. The Chriſtian Writers, ſuch as are antient, for the moſt part, follow Euſebius: Many late Writers follow the Edition of Annius his Authours; The profane Hiſtories follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and ſuch others.

§. II.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynaſties, and otherwiſe, it appears that Cham's reign in Egypt began in the year after the Floud, 191.

TOreconcile theſe, or gather out of them the times of the antient Kings about whom is moſt controverſie, the beſt mean is by help of the Dynaſties; of whoſe continuance, there is little or no diſagreement. The account of the Dynaſties (beſides the authority of approved Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the moſt part, if not altogether, with the Hiſtories of the Aſſyrians, Trojans, Italians, &c. and others. The beginning of the 16. Dynaſtie, is joined by general conſent, with 43. year of Ninus; in which Abraham was born. The twelve firſt Dynaſties laſted each of them ſeven years, under the twelve which were call'd the greater gods: ſo that all the years of their continuance were 84. The 13. Dynaſtie endured 14. years; the fourteenth, 26. the fifteenth, 37. Theſe three laſt, are ſaid to have been under the three younger gods. So the fifteen firſt Dynaſties laſted 161. years. As I do not therefore believe that the continuance of theſe Dynaſties, was ſuch as hath been mentioned, becauſe Annius in ſuch wiſe limits out their time: ſo I cannot reject the account upon this onely reaſon, that Annius hath it ſo; conſidering, that both hitherto, it hath paſſed as currant, and is greatly ſtrengthened by many good reaſons. For, whereas Euſebius placeth the beginning of the ſixteenth Dynaſtie, in the year of Abraham's birth, as aforeſaid, the reckoning is eaſily caſt; by which the ſumm of 161. years, which, according to our account, were ſpent in the fifteen former, being ſubducted out of the ſumm of 352. years, which were between the Floud and Abraham's birth, ſhew that the beginning of the firſt Dynaſtie, which was the beginning of Chams reign in Egypt, was in the year 191. As alſo by other probabilities the ſame may appear: For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of man-kind which came into Shinaar, arrived at Babel, Anno à Diluvio 131. In building the Tower were conſumed 40. years, as Glycas recordeth; whoſe report I have elſwhere confirmed with divers probabilities. That Cham was long in paſſing with his company, their Wives, Children, Cattel, and Subſtance through all Syria then deſolate, and full of Boggs, Foreſts, and Bryers (which the Deluge, and want of culture, in one hundred ſeventy one years had brought upon it) no reaſonable man will doubt. To this his paſſage therefore, and the ſeating of himſelf in Egypt, we allow twenty years; and theſe ſumms being added together, to wit, one hundred thirty one years after the Floud, before they arrive at Babel, fourty years for their ſtay there, and twenty for Cham's paſſage into Egypt, and ſettling there, make up the ſumm of 191. years; at which time we find that Cham began his reign in Egypt, in the beginning of the firſt Dynaſtie. And to this ſumm of 191. years, if we add the 161. years of the 15. firſt Dynaſties, as they are numbred in common account, we ſhall fall right with the year of Abraham's birth, which was An. Dil. 352. And hereto omitting many other reaſons, which might be brought to prove that theſe firſt Dynaſties muſt needs have been very ſhort, and not containing in the whole ſumm of their ſeveral times above 161. years; Let it ſuffice, that had they laſted longer, then either muſt Egypt have been peopled as ſoon as Babel after the Floud, or the Dynaſties (as Mercator thinks) muſt have been before the Floud. That the arival at Babel, was many years before the plantation of Egypt after the Floud, enough hath been ſaid to prove; and that the Dynaſties were not before the Floud, the number of the long-lived generations between Adam and the Floud, which was leſs than the number of the Dynaſties, may ſufficiently witneſs. Or, if we will think, that one life might (perhaps) be divided into many Dynaſties, then may this have been as well after the Floud, as before; conſidering that the Sons of Noah did not in every Countrie erect ſuch form of Policy, as had been uſed in the ſame ere the Deluge; but ſuch as the diſpoſition of the people, the authority and power of the Conductor, together with many other circumſtances, did induce or enforce them to.

§. III.

That theſe Dynaſties were not divers Families of Kings, but rather Succeſſions of Regents, oft-times many under one King.

THE ſhort continuance of the Dynaſties, doth ſhew that they were not ſeveral races of kings, as the vaunting Egyptians were wont to ſtile them. What they were, it cannot certainly be warranted. For in reſtitutions of decayed Antiquities, it is more eaſie to deny than to affirm. But this may be ſaid, partly upon good circumſtance, partly upon the ſureſt proof, That it was the manner of the Egyptian Kings, to put the Government of the Country into the hands of ſome truſty Counſellor, onely reſerving the Soveraignty to themſelves, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Maſters of the Palace, and as the Turk doth to the chief Viſier. This is confirmed, firſt, by the number of the Dynaſties, whereof many are under Cham, and more than one under Oſiris, or Mizraim; and muſt therefore have been ſucceſſions, not of Kings, but rather of Counſellours, and Regents. Secondly, by cuſtom of ſuch

Princes

Princes borderers to Egypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures, of whom Abimelech the Philistim, in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol, Captain of his Host; though in taking Abraham's Wife, and in his private carriage, he followed his own pleasure. Likewise of Abimelech, the Son of Gideon, it was said: Is not he the Son of Jerubbaal? and Zebul is his Officer? Also Ishbosheth, the Son of Saul, feared Abner the Captain of the Host. Yea, David himself hating Joab for his cruelty, did not punish him in regard of his greatness, which was such, as was feared even of Hadad the Edomite, living then in Egypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appears by the Scriptures: therefore likely, both by his own idleness and pleasure, to have laid the burthen of the Government upon others; and upon jealousie, the companion of unworthiness, to have changed his Lievtenants often. Above all other proofs is the advancement of Joseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Joseph; Onely in the Kings Throne will I be above thee: behold, I have set thee over all the Land of Egypt. William Archbishop of Tyre, who flourished about the year of our Lord, one thousand one hundred eighty, affirms that the like, or very same, form of Government by Viceroys, was in his time practised in Egypt, having there been in use (as he believed) ever since the time of Joseph. He plainly shews, that the Soldans of Egypt were not Lords of the Countrey, however they have been so deem'd; but that they acknowledg'd and humbly performed the duty of subjects unto the Caliphe; who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not onely of civil Government, but the power of making Warr and Peace, with the whole Office and Authority royal, into the Soldans hands. He that shall read in William of Tyre, the state of the Caliphe, or Meulene Edhadech, with the form of his Court, shall plainly behold the Image of the antient Pharaoh, ruling by a Lievtenant, as great in authority as Joseph was, though far inferiour in Wisdom.

Will. Tyr. de bell. Sacro. l. 19. c. 17, 18, 19. & 20.

Lib. 19. c. 22.

To think that many names of such Regents, or Lievtenants, as Joseph was, have crept into the List of the Egyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Joseph's brethren call him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Countrie; besides, it is not unlikely, that the vain-glorious Egyptian Priests would as easily report him a King to posterity, as ignorant men & strangers deem him such, under whose hand all dispatches of importance, and royal managing of the State had passed, whilest that the King himself, intending his quiet, had given his Office to another. How strangers have mistaken in this kind, the example already cited of Joseph's brethren, doth sufficiently witness. The reports of Priests do appear in Diodorus, and Herodotus; each of whom, citing their relations, as good Authority, say; Diodorus, and Sesostris was the nineteenth King after Menas; Herodotus, that he was the 332. after Menas; which could not have been, if Menas had been Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, That the Dynasties were not so many Races of Kings, but successions of Regents, appointed by the Kings of so many sundry Linages or sorts of men. Now, by whatsoever means a Dynastie, or Regencie continued; whether in one Family, as being made an hereditary Office; or in one order of men, as held by faction: sure it is, that was the Kings gift and free choice, that gave the Office. But the Crown royal always passed by descent, and not by election; which (besides consent of Authours) the Scriptures also prove. For whereas Joseph bought all the Land of Egypt for Pharaoh, if the Crown had passed by election, then should Pharaoh's children hereby, either have been inthralled amongst the rest of the people, to the next successor: or enjoying their fathers Land, though not his Estate, have been more mighty than the King: as Land-lords of all Egypt, and the King himself their Tenant. Likewise we find in Exod. 12. that God smote the first-born of Pharaoh, that was to sit on his Throne. And in Esay, it is said of Pharaoh, I am the Son of the antient King.

§. IV.

Of Cham, and his Son Mizraim, or Osiris.

THat the succession of Kings began, and continued in such wise as the Table hath shewed from Cham to Chencres, now it followeth to shew. Egypt is called in the Scripture the Land of Ham. That this name is not given to it, because the Posterity of Cham did reign there, but for that himself did first plant it, we may gather by many circumstances. For I think it is no where found, that the Countries of Chush, Put, or Canaan, as well as Egypt, were called the Land of Ham. Further, it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Osiris calleth himself the eldest Son of Cham, saying, Mihi pater Saturnus deorum omnium junior: also, Sum Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulchro & generoso ortum; which must needs be understood of Cham; for this Saturnus Ægyptius was Cham:

Psa 78. 51 105. 23. 27. 106. 22.

as it is said, that on the Monument of Ninus was an Inscription, wherin Cham was called Saturnus Ægyptius. Likewise the Temple of Hammon, not farr from Egypt, doth testifie, that Ham resided in those parts: And S. Hierom, in quæstionibus Hebraicis, saith, that the Egyptians themselves did in his days, call their Countrey Ham; as in four several places in the Psalms this Countrey is called the Land of Cham. And Ortelius, noting out of Plutarch in Osiride, that in the sacrifices of the Egyptians this Countrey of Egypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamia, ut puto (saith he) à Chamo Noes filio, to which also he addeth out of Isidore. Ægyptum usque hodie Ægyptiorum lingua Kam vocari; that Egypt unto this day in the tongue of the Egyptians is called Kam. For the beginning and continuance of Cham's reign, the same reasons may suffice to be alleged, which I have already given in proof of the time spent in the 15. first Dynasties: Neither is it strange, that the reign of Cham should last so long as 161. years; considering that Sem lived 600. Arphachshad and Shelah each above 400. But strange it had been, if one Saltis created by Manetho, had in those long-lived generations reigned there 19. years, and with Baon, Apachnas, Apochis, and others of the same brood, obscured the fame and glory of Osiris, Orus, and Sesostris. Reineccius in Histor. Julia, placeth Mizraim next, otherwise called Osiris, according to Diodorus; who, saith he, was the Son of Hammon: Krentzhemius saith, that Mizraim and Osiris, are words of neer affinity and sound in the Hebrew tongue. Howsoever it be, we know that Mizraim the Son of Cham, was Lord of Egypt, and Reineccius, citing good authority in this case, affirmeth that Egypt is now called by the naturals in their own language, Mezre. Neither do I see cause of doubt whether Osiris were the same with Mizraim. It is more necessary, and hard to shew manifestly, how long Mizraim, or Osiris, reigned. For whereas the year of his death is no where precisely set down, we must be fain to follow probabilities. That he is not vainly said by Annius his Berosus, to have begun his reign at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynastie of the Thebæi began, it appeareth, first, by the authority of Eusebius, who avoucheth as much; next, by Diodorus, who saith, that he inhabited Thebes; which habitation of Osiris there, that it might be cause of that Dynastie, I can well believe; assenting so farr to Reineccius, who thinks the Dynasties were named onely, according to the several seats of the Kings.

§. V.

Of the time when Osiris reign ended; and that Jacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus the Son of Osiris.

THe death of Osiris, when it was, none can certainly affirm. The onely conjecture that I know is made thus: Lehabim the Son of Mizraim, called Hercules Lybius, made war in Italy, to revenge his fathers death on the associates of Typhon, in the 41. year of Baleus King of Assyria; before which year he had made many great wars in Egypt, Phœnicia, Tygris, Phrygia, Crete, Lybia, & Spain; and having ended his Egyptian Wars, left the Kingdom to Orus. Thus farr Berosus, or Authours following Berosus. That Orus, last of all the gods (as they were stiled) held the Kingdom of Isis, Diodorus Siculus plainly saith; and Plutarch as much, to which all Histories agree. Krentzhemius hereupon inferrs, that six years may be allowed to the Wars, which Hercules made in so many countries, after the Egyptian Wars were ended: so should the death of Osiris have been the 34. of Baleus, when himself had reigned 297. years. I think that Krentzhemius was a greater Scholar than Souldier. For surely, in those days, when commerce was not such as now, but all Navigation made by coasting, a farr longer time would have been required, to the subduing of so many Countries. An allowance of more time, though it would alter his computation, yet would it well agree with his intent; which was (doubtless) to find the truth. If according to his account the death of Osiris had been the 34. of Baleus, then must Israel have come into Egypt but 7. years before the death of Osiris; and have lived there in the reign of Typhon: A thing not easily believed. For it was the same King who advanced Joseph, bad him send for his father, and gave him leave to go into Canaan, to the performance of his fathers Funeral; as may easily be gathered out of the Book of Genesis. Whereas therefore the reign of Osiris cannot be extended by any possible allowance in account of times, beyond the 7. year of Israel's coming into Egypt, we must needs cut off 23. years from that number, which Krentzhemius conjectures his reign to have continued; namely, seven which he should have lived after Jacob's coming into Egypt; nine, in which Joseph had there flourished, ere his fathers coming; and other seven, in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Osiris, yet before Joseph's advancement.

Neither will this disagree with the time of Hercules Lybius his Wars. For the War which Hercules

Hercules made in Italy, is ſaid to have indured ten years: After which proportion, we may well give not only ſix years, as Krentzhemius doth, but 23. more to ſo many Wars, in ſo many, and ſo farr diſtant countries, as are named before; yea, by this proportion, we may attribute unto Orus the 13. years, which paſſed between the time of Joſeph's being ſold into Egypt, unto his advancement, conſidering that Potiphar, who bought him, and whoſe daughter he may ſeem to have married, continued all that while chief Steward unto Pharaoh; a thing not likely to have been, if ſo violent alterations had hapned the whileſt in Egypt, as the tyrannous uſurpation of Typhon muſt needs have brought in. If citing ſome fragment of a loſt old Authour, I ſhould confidently ſay, that Potiphar, for his faithfulneſs to Orus the Son of Oſiris, was by him, in the beginning of his reign, made his chief Steward; at which time, buying Joſeph, and finding him a juſt man, and one under whoſe hand all things did proſper, he rather committed his eſtate into Joſeph's hands, than unto any of his Egyptian followers (many of whom he had found either falſ-hearted, or weak and unlucky in the troubleſom days of Typhon) I know not what could be objected againſt this. Perhaps, I might proceed further, and ſay, That when the ſaying of Joſeph pleaſed Pharaoh, and all his ſervants; then Potiphar, Prieſt of On, being chief Officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledg in Joſeph, the antient graces of God, and his injurious impriſonment: whereupon he gave him his Daughter to Wife; and being old, reſigned his Office of chief Steward unto him, who afterward, in regard of Potiphar, did favour the Prieſts, when he bought the Lands of all other Egyptians. This might appear to ſome a tale not unlike the Friarly book of Aſenath, Potiphar's Daughter; but, unto ſuch as conſider that God works uſually by means; and that Potiphar was the Steward of that King, under whom Jacob died; it would ſeem a matter more probable, had it an Author of ſufficient credit to avouch it. Concerning the Wars of Hercules, in which, by this reckoning, he ſhould have ſpent 42. years after he left Egypt, ere he began in Italy, it is a circumſtance which (the length of his Italian Wars conſidered, and his former enterpriſes and atchievments proportioned to them) doth not make againſt us, but for us: or, if it were againſt us, yet could it not ſo weaken our ſuppoſition, as theſe probabilities collected out of the indiſputable truth of Scripture do confirm it. Nevertheleſs, I freely grant, that all theſe proofs are no other, than ſuch as may be gathered out of Authours, not well agreeing, nor to be reconciled in ſuch obſcurity, otherwiſe than by likelihoods, anſwerable to the holy Text.

§. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules, Ægyptus, Orus, and the two Seſoſtres, ſucceſſively reigning after Mizraim; and of divers Errors about the former Seſoſtres.

CONcerning the reign of Typhon, and of Hercules, I find none that preciſely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelocrator giveth three years to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is ſo peremptory without proof, as if his own word were ſufficient authority, in many points very queſtionable; alleging no witneſs, but as it were, ſaying, Teſte me ipſo; yet herein we may think him to ſpeak probably, for as much as the learned Krentzhemius affirmeth, that Hercules did very ſoon undertake his fathers revenge; and was not long in performing it: and that leaving Egypt to his brother, he followed other Warrs in the ſame quarrel, as hath been ſhewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzhemius doth) out of Beroſus, that Hercules reigned after Typhon; yet, ſeeing Aventinus, a follower of Beroſus, hath it ſo, I will alſo believe it. That in the reign of Typhon and Hercules, 7. years were ſpent, howſoever divided between them, I gather out of Krentzhemius onely, who placeth the beginning of Orus ſeven years after the death of Oſiris; forgetting to ſet down his reaſons, which in a matter ſo probable, I think he wanted not. Now, whereas he alloweth 90. years of the 18. Dynaſtie to Oſiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus; it ſeems that the reign of Orus laſted 115. years. From the death of Orus, to the departure of Iſrael out of Egypt, there paſſed 122. years by our account; who (according to Beroaldus and others) think that Abraham was born in the 130. year of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus: From the end of the Floud to the birth of Abraham 352

From that time to the	vocation of Abraham	75
	departure out of Egypt	430

which ſumm divers other ways may be collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Egypt, there do remain (as is aforeſaid) onely 122. years from the death of Orus; we are now to conſider, how many of them are to be allowed uno Seſoſtri, or Seſonchoſis, who is placed next unto Orus, by authority of the Scholiaſtes Apollonii; not without good probability. For this great King or Conquerour, querour, is by many Hiſtories recorded to have over-run a great part of Aſia; to have built a fleet of Ships on the Red Sea: and ſo to have entred into India: likewiſe with another fleet on the middle Earth Seas, to have paſſed into Europe, and ſubdued many Nations. This is he (as Reineccius judgeth) whom Juſtine, erring in account of his time, calleth Vexoris; For Juſtine placeth Vexoris in Ages before Ninus; whereby it would follow that Seſoſtris, if he were Vexoris, was more antient then was Oſiris (otherwiſe Mizraim) a thing altogether unlikely. Certain it is, that after the departure of Iſrael out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Egypt into Aſia) till the father-in-law of Solomon, Pharaoh Vaphres, took Gerar, and gave it to his Daughter (as we may read more at large in the holy Hiſtory of the Bible) after which time, Seſac oppreſſed Rehoboam, and Necho ſought paſſage through the Land of Iſrael, when he made his Expedition againſt the Chaldæans. Of King Vaphres, and Necho, it is out of queſtion, that neither of them was the great King Seſoſtris. Of Seſac, it is doubted by ſome, for as much as he came into Judæa with a great Army. Reineccius propounding the doubt, leaveth it undecided; unleſs it be ſufficient proof of his own opinion, that he himſelf placeth Seſoſtris next to Orus, following the Scoliaſtes Apollonii. But further anſwer may be made, to ſhew that they were not one. For, as Juſtine witneſſeth, Seſoſtris, otherwiſe Vexoris, made War on people far removed, abſtaining from his neighbours. Seſac came up purpoſely againſt Hieruſalem. Seſoſtris, as Diodorus witneſſeth, had but 24000. Horſe, Seſac had 60000. Seſoſtris had 8020. Chariots, Seſac 1200. Seſoſtris made his Expedition for no private purpoſe, but to get a great name: Seſac, as moſt agree, had no other purpoſe than to ſuccour Jeroboam, and give him countenance in his new reign; whom he had favoured even againſt Solomon: therefore Seſoſtris muſt needs have reigned whileſt Iſrael abode in Egypt.

Whereas Krentzhemius collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menas, or Menis, was next to Orus; becauſe thoſe Hiſtorians affirm that he reigned next after the gods; it moveth me nothing. For Oſiris did ſucceed thoſe fifteen gods; namely, the twelve greater, and three leſſer; himſelf alſo (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Menas. Which name, as alſo Menæus, and Menis, were titles of Dignity; though miſtaken by ſome, as proper names. Krentzhemius doth very probably gather, that Menus was Mercurius Ter-maximus, the Hebrew word Meni ſignifying an Arithmetician; which name Ter-maximus might well be attributed to Oſiris, who was a great Conqueror, Philoſopher, and Benefactor to mankind, by giving good Laws, and teaching profitable Arts. In proweſs and great undertakings, Seſoſtris was no whit inferiour to Oſiris: For he ſought victory not for gain, but honour onely; and being well contented, that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and ſubmitted themſeves to his will and royal diſpoſition, leaving them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Egypt. Soon upon his return, he was endangered by a great Treaſon, the houſe in which he was, being by his own brother purpoſely fired; which nevertheleſs, he is ſaid to have eſcap'd, and to have reigned in all 30. years; after wch time, he choſe rather to die than to live; becauſe he fell blind. Both Herodotus and Diodorus affirm, that Seſoſtris left a Son, whoſe name was Pheron, or Pherones; who afterwards took the name of Seſoſtris, but was nothing like to his father in glory; for he ſhortly fell blind. The cauſe of his blindneſs, Herodotus attributes to his aſſaulting the River Nilus with a Javelin; which tale Diodorus having likewiſe heard, yet reports as a fable, ſaying, that perhaps he took the diſeaſe naturally from his father. How long this man reigned, it is no where expreſſed; yet, for as much as Orus the ſecond (otherwiſe Buſiris) who ſucceeded him, began 14. years after that this Seſoſtris had been King, it muſt needs be that this reigned 14. years at leaſt. That Buſiris began not untill theſe 14. years at leaſt were expired, the very account of time from the firſt Buſiris, to the departure of Iſrael out of Egypt, plainly ſhews, being almoſt generally agreed upon, to have been 75. years. That none came between Seſoſtris the ſecond, and Buſiris, or Orus the ſecond, it ſtands onely upon probabilities, which are theſe: After Seſoſtris had reigned ſome while, he fell blind; after certain years, he recovered his ſight, as is ſaid, which may have been true, but is more like to have been a Fable; ſurely the manner of his recovery, as it is ſet down, is very fabulous; namely, that by looking upon a woman, or waſhing his eyes with her water, who had onely known her own huſband, he got his ſight again. As the time of his reign, before his blindneſs, and when he was well again (if ever he were) may have taken up a good part of 14. years: ſo his works, which were great, do much more ſtrongly argue, that his reign was not very ſhort. His works are largely ſet down by Herodotus and Diodorus; a part of which may ſeem to have been the finiſhing of that which his father had begun, about the channels and sluces of Nilus; whom, I think, he rather frighted (as his father had done) with Spades and Shovels, than with Darts and Javelins; and by his diligent over-sight of that work, was like enough to lose both his eye-sight and his peoples love; whom his father had very busily employed in excessive labour about it.

Of Busiris, the first oppressor of the Israelites; and of his successour, Queen Thermutis that took up Moses out of the Water.

And herein (if I may presume to conjecture) Busiris, who was afterwards King, is like to have dealt with him, as Jeroboam did with the Son of Solomon. For that Busiris himself was much addicted to magnificent works, it well appeared by the drudgery wherewith he wearied the children of Israel in his buildings: If therefore he were employed by the great Sesostris, as Jeroboam was by Solomon, in the oversight of those businesses, he had good opportunity to work his greatness with the King by industry; and afterward with the people, by incensing them against their new King, as Jeroboam did. For what the multitude will endure at one Princes hands, they will not at anothers; unless he have either an equal spirit, or a surer foundation. If moreover he sought to derive all the pain and labour of publick works from the Egyptians to the Israelites: he surely did that to his own people which was very plausible; who (as appears in Exodus) were nothing slack in fulfilling the Kings cruelty. Now, that Orus the second, or Busiris, was the King that first oppressed Israel, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew children, which (saith Cedrenus) lasted ten Moneths: it is a common opinion of many great and most learned Writers; who also think that hereupon grew the Fable of Busiris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Exod. 1. that the King who knew not Joseph, was a King of a new Family. That Busiris was of a new Family, Reineccius doth shew; who also thinks him an Author of the bloudy Edict. Nevertheless, true it is, that Busiris, according to all mens computation, began his reign five years after the birth of Moses; before whose birth it is most manifest, that the Law was made, and much more, that the persecution began; which Bunting thinks to have lasted 87. yesrs, ere the departure out of Egypt. Let us therefore consider, besides the blindness of Sesostris the second, how great the power of the Regents or Vice-roys in Egypt was; and how great confidence the King did put in them, seeing Joseph ruled with such full power, that he bought all Egypt, and all the Egyptians for bread; giving at the same time, the best of the Land to his own father and brethen for nothing; seeing also that when the Egyptians cried out upon Pharaoh for bread, Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go to Joseph, what he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger born, lately fetcht out of prison, a King well able to have governed himself, would give such trust, and soveraign authority; it is not unlikely that a blind Prince should do it to a man of especial reputation. For God often prospers, not onely the good (such as Joseph was) but wicked men also, as his instruments against the day of wrath. Therefore, perhaps, the King did (as many have done) resign his Kingdom to him, though his reign was not accounted to have begun till the death of Sesostris. But whether Busiris did usurp the Kingdom, or protection of the Land by violence; or whether the blind King resigned it, keeping the Title; or whether Busiris were onely Regent whilest the King lived, and afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) King himself; it might well be said that Pharaoh's Daughter took up Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel; seeing he both at that time was King in effect, and shotty after, King in deed and title both. It were not absurd for us to say, that the blind King Sesostris the second oppressed Israel: But, for as much as it may seem that the wicked Tyrant shewed his evil nature, even when he first arose; I think it more likely, that Busiris did it, using at first the power of a King, and shortly after the stile. Thus of the 122. years which passed between the beginning of Sesostris his reign, and the departure of Israel out of Egypt, 47. being spent; the 75. which remain, are to be accounted to Busiris, or Orus the second, and his children. Busiris himself reigned 30. years, according to Eusebius; whom very many judicious Authours herein approve. After him his daughter, who took Moses out of the Water, is said, by all that I have read, to have reigned 12. years. Her name was Thermutis Pharis, or Muthis, according to Cedrenus: Eusebius calls her Acencris; and out of Artabanus his History, Meris: Joseph calls her both Accenchre, and Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panario, saith, that she was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis the Daughter of Amenoph, the Son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made, and much spoken; for the Scriptures call her not

Pharaoh's

Pharaoh's Son's Daughter, but Pharaoh's Daughter. Amenophis indeed, is set next before Busiris, or Orus the second, by Eusebius and others; but whether he were a King, or onely a Regent, I cannot conjecture. For Herodotus, Diodorus, and the antient Historians, name the Son of Sesostris, Pheron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis; and his Daughter by the Egyptians called rather the Neece or Grand-child, than the Daughter of Pharaoh, because of the glory of Sesostris, and the dis-reputation of his Son. If so, and if that Busiris, or Orus the second, marrying her, pretended any title by her, then is our conjecture strengthened, and then was she both Daughter, Grand-child, and Wife unto Pharaoh; and surviving him, Queen of the Land, 12. years. But if she were Daughter of Orus the second, and sister of Athoris, or Rathoris, as many think, to whose conjecture I will not oppose mine, then may it seem, that either her brethren were degenerate, or too young to rule, when her father died.

§. VIII.

Of the two brethren of Queen Thermutis; and what King it was, under whom Moses was born; and who it was that perished in the Red Sea.

SHe had two brethren; the one was Rathoris, or Athoris, who succeeded her; the other Telegonus, who is onely named by Eusebius; but his linage and off-spring described by Reineccius. Rathoris, after his sisters death, reigned nine years; after whom Chencres, thought to be his Son, reigned ten years, and then perished in the Red Sea. During the reign of Chencres, Eusebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus upon Io; of which History elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Chencres (whom some call Acencheres, but all, or most do stile Θεόμαχον, a fighter against God) Acherres reigned 8. years; and then Cherres 15. This descent seems from Father to Son. In the 11. year of Cherres, it is said by Eusebius, that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Egypt, built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not unlikely; viz. That Egypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid upon it, and the destruction of her King and Army in the Red Sea; else could it not have had two reigning in it at once; the latter of whom, or his Posterity, seems to have taken all from Cherres, the Grand-child of Chencres. For whereas Armais is said to have reigned four years after Cherres; and Armesis one after Armais: these two Kings are by Eusebius and others, accounted as one, and his reign said to have been five years. His name is called Armeus, otherwise Danaus; and his Pedigree thus described by Reineccius in Histor. Julia.

Telegonus:
Epaphus:
Lybia, who had

Agenor, Belus, and Busiris.

Ægyptus or Rameſſes, who gave name to the Country, having expell'd his brother Danaus, reigned, and begat Lynceus, married to Hypermneſtra.

Danaus or Armeus, expelled by his brother Ægyptus, after he had reigned five years, became King of Argos in Greece: was father to Hypermneſtra.

How it might come to pass, that the Nephews Sons of Epaphus should have occupied the Kingdom after Cherres, it is hard to say; considering that Epaphus himself is reported by Eusebius, to have been born in the time of Chencres. But for as much as the History of Epaphus his birth, is diversly related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the father of Danaus and Ægyptus, otherwise called Armeus and Rameſſes, was equally distant from Busiris, or Orus the second, with Cherres the Grand-child of Chencres. And that the Posterity of Telegonus did marry very young, it appears by the History of these two brethren, Danaus and Ægyptus; of whom the former had fifty Daughters, the latter fifty Sons; perhaps, or rather questionless, by divers women; yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth: Howsoever it were, the general consent of Writers is, that Armeus, or Danaus, did succeed Cherres; and (according to Eusebius, and good Authours approving him) reigned five years. Rameſſes followed, who reigned 68. years. This Rameſſes, or Ægyptus, is that Armeſeſmiamum, or Armeſeſmiamus, under whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that follows Mercator, Moses was born; and the cruel Edict made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reign seems to me the chief, if not the only ground of Mercator's opinion. For, whereas the Lord said to Moses, Go, return to Egypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee: Mercator hereupon conceives, that it was one and the same King under whom Moses was born, and under whom he slew the Egyptian at the 40. year of his age; and fled into the wilderness,

neſs, and there abode for fear: all which circumſtances could agree with none, but this Rameſſes, who reigned ſo long; wherefore, deſirous rather to hold a true Paradox, than a common Errour, he placeth one Aliſfragmuthoſis (whoſe name is found in the Liſt of Egyptian Kings, but the time uncertain wherein he reigned) in an Age 112. or 113. years, more antient than others left him in: and ſo continuing the Catalogue of his Succeſſours from Themoſis (whom Euſebius calls Amaſis) downwards, with no other variation of the length of each mans reign, than is the difference between Manetho and Euſebius, he finds Moſes born under Armeſeſmiamum, and Iſrael delivered in the days of his Son Amenophis. The very name of Aliſfragmuthoſis ſeems to him with little alteration to ſound like Phararates, of which name one was thought to have flouriſhed, either as a King, or a wiſe Man, about the time of Iſaac. For (ſaith he) from Aliſfragmuthoſis to Phragmuthoſis, Pharmuthoſis, or Phararates, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent Learning and Induſtry; and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable Works: yet my aſſent herein is with-held from him by theſe Reaſons. Firſt, I ſee all other Writers agree, that Chencres was King, who was drowned in the Red Sea. Secondly, the place, Exod. 4. All are dead, &c. may better be underſtood of Buſiris, and all his children, than of one King alone. Thirdly, S. Cyril in his firſt Book againſt Julian the Apoſtate, ſaith, that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moſes was 120. years old, which was this Armeſeſmiamum, being then King of Egypt. After Rameſſes, Amenophis reigned 19. years; who is thought by Mercator, and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that periſhed in the Red Sea; of which our Opinion being alreay laid open, I think it moſt expedient to referr the Kings enſuing to their own times (which a Chronological Table ſhall lay open) and here to ſpeak of that great deliverance of Iſrael out of Egypt; which for many great conſiderations depending thereupon, we may not lightly over-paſs.

CHAP. III.

Of the delivery of Iſrael out of Egypt.

§. I.

Of the time of Moſes Birth, and how long the Iſraelites were oppreſſed in Egypt.

TRue it is, that the Hiſtory it ſelf is generally and well known; yet concerning the time of Moſes his Birth, who was the excellent and famous Inſtrument of this, and other great Works of the Higheſt, the different opinions are very near as many, as the men that have written of that Argument.

L. Vives, in his Annotations upon S. Auguſtine, cites very many of their conjectures: as that of Porphyrie out of Sanchoniato, that Moſes lived in the time of Semiramis: But, if he did mean the firſt Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit; for beſides that the ſame is contrary to all Stories, divine and humane; while that Semiramis lived, ſhe commanded Syria, and all the parts the parts thereof abſolutely; neither were the Ammonites, or Moabites, or Edomites, while ſhe ruled, in rerum natura.

A ſecond Opinion he remembreth out of Appion, taken from Ptolemy, a Prieſt of Mendes, who ſaith, that Moſes was born while Inachus did rule the Argives, and Ameſtes in Egypt.

The third Opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greek Hiſtory, the firſt Book; that Moſes was born while Apis the third King ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Aſſyrius, who, though he cite ſome Authorities, that Moſes lived after the Trojan war, is himſelf of opinion, that Moſes was farr more antient, proving it by many arguments.

Fifthly, he ſetteth down the teſtimony of Numinius the Philoſopher, who took Muſæus and Moſes to be one; confirming the ſame out of Artapanas, who confeſſeth that Moſes was called Muſæus by the Grecians; and who farther delivereth, that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the Daughter of Egypt; the ſame which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus)

Thermothes. Eusebius also affirmeth, that by Eupolemus, in his first Book, de Bono, Moses, vir Deo conjunctissimus, is called Musæus Judæorum. Eusebius, in his Chronologie, finds that Moses was born while Amenophis ruled Egypt. The antient Manethon calls that Pharaoh, which lived at Moses birth, Thumosis, or Thmesis: the same, perchance, which Appion the Grammarian will have to be Amosis, and else-where Amenophis, the father of Sethosis: to whom Lysimachus, and Cornelius Tacitus, gave the name of Focchoris. To me it seems most probable, that while Saphrus, called also Spherus, or Iphereus, governed Assyria; Orthopolis, Sicyonia; and Criasus the Argives; that then (Sesostris the second ruling in Egypt) Moses was born. For, if we believe Saint Augustine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moses led Israel out of Egypt. Eduxit Moses ex Ægypto populum Dei novissimo tempore Cecropis Athenienſium Regis; Moses (saith he) led the people of God out of Egypt, about the end of Cecrops time, King of the Athenians. In this sort therefore is the time of Moses birth, and of his departure out of Egypt best proved, Saint Augustine affirms (as before remembred) that Moses was born, Saphrus governing Assyria; and that he left Egypt about the end of Cecrops time. Now, Saphrus ruled twenty years; his succeſſour Mamelus thirty years; Sparetus after him fourty years: in whose fourth year Cecrops began to govern in Attica: Ascatades followed Sparetus, and held the Empire one and fourty years. So as Moses being born while Saphrus ruled Assyria; Orthopolis Sicyonia, and Criasus Argos (for these three Kings lived at once at his birth, saith Saint Augustine, as Cecrops did when he departed Egypt) it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth year of the Assyrian Saphrus; for take one yeare remaining of twenty (for so long Saphrus reigned) to which add the thirty years of Mamelus, and the fourty years of Sparetus, these make seventy one, with which there were wasted three years of Cecrops his fifty years: then take nine years out of the reign of Ascatades, who was Sparetus succeſſor, those nine years added to seventy one, make eighty, at which age Moses left Egypt; and add these nine years to the three years of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remain but four years of Cecrops his fifty, and so it falleth right with S. Augustine's words, affirming, that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Moses led the people of Israel out of Egypt.

Now, the time in which the Hebrews were oppreſſed in Egypt, seemeth to have had beginning some eight or nine years before the birth of Moses, and fifty four years, or rather more, after Joseph; between whose death, and the birth of Moses, there were consumed sixty four years, some of which time, and eighty years after, they lived in great servitude and misery. For, as it is written in Exodus: They set task-masters over them, to keep them under with burthens; and they built the Cities Pithom and Rameses, &c. And by cruelty, they caused the children of Israel to serve, and made them weary of their lives, by sore labour in Clay and Brick, and in all work of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid upon them by a mastering power, and strong hand, they endured to the time by the wisdome of God appointed; even from fifty four years, or not much more, after the death of Joseph, who left the World when when it had lasted 2370. to the eighth year of Moses, and untill he wrought his miracles in the field of Zoan, which he performed in the Worlds age 2514. towards the end thereof, according to Codoman, or after our account, 2513. And because those things which we deliver of Egypt, may the better be understood, I think it necessary to speak a few words of the principal place therein named in this Discourse.

§. II.

Of divers Cities and Places in Egypt, mentioned in this Story, or else-where in the Scriptures.

THis City, which the Hebrews call Zoan, was built seven years after Hebron. Ezekiel calleth it Taphnes, and so doth Hieremy; the Septuagint, Tanais; Josephus, Protaidis, after the name of an Egyptian Queen; Antonius gives it the name of Thanis; Hegesippus, Thamna; and William Tyrius, Tapius. It adjoyneth to the Land of Gosen, and is the same, wherein Hieremy the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching against the Egyptian and Jewish Idolatry.

Num. 33. Ezech. 30. Hier. 2. 43. 44. 46. Joseph. l. 1. c. 9. Tir. de Bel. sac. l. 19. c. 23.

Zoan, or Taphnes, was, in Moses time, the Metropolis of the lower Egypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly resided; and not unlikely to be the same City, where Abraham in his time found him. But Eusebius out of Artapanus affirmeth, that Abraham did read Astronomy in Heliopolis, or On, to Pharetates King of Egypt. Alex. Polyhistor, out of Eupolemus, hath it otherwise, saying, that Abraham instructed the Egyptian Priests, and not the King; both which authorities Eusebius citeth. The Septuagint and the Vulgar Edition, Euseb. de prep. Evang. l. 9. c. 4. Gen. 12. 15 Isa. 19, 11. Edition, for Zoan, write Heliopolis. Pagnin, Vatablus, Junius, and our English call it On; and Ptolemie, Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the fronier of the lower Egypt, toward the South; the other somewhat lower on the Easter-most branch of Nilus, falling into the Sea at Pelusium. And it may be, that Heliopolis, to the South of the River Trojan, was the same which Vatablus and our English call Aven. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certain knowledge; the same which Pomp. Mela and Plinie call Solis oppidum; Tyrius in the Holy Warr, Malbec; the Arabians, Bahalbeth; and Simeon Sethi, Fons Solis. Of this Heliopolis, or On, was Potiphar Priest, or Prince, whose Daughter Joseph married. In the Territory adjoining, Jacob inhabited, while he lived in Egypt. In the confines of this City, Onias, the High Priest of the Jews, built a Temple, dedicated to the Eternal God; not much inferiour to that of Hierusalem (Ptolemy Philopater, then governing in Egypt) which stood in the time of Vespasian, 333. years after the foundation by Onias, whom Josephus falsly reporteth herein, to have fulfilled a Prophecie of Esay, Chap. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terræ Egypti; In that day shall the Altar of the Lord be in the midst of the Land of Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanes, at the time of the building tyrannizing over the Jews, gave the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Egypt. Lastly, there it was that our Saviour Christ Jesus remained, while Joseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: near which (saith Brochard) the Fountain is still found, called Jesus Well, whose streams do afterward water the Gardens of Balsamum, no where else found in Egypt. And hereof see more in Brochard, in his Description of Egypt.

Esay 19. 13. Ezech. 34. Hos. 9. 6. There is also in that City of Noph, remembred by Esay and Ezechiel, the same which Hosea the Prophet calleth Moph; which later name it took from a Mountain adjoining, so called; which Mountain Herodotus remembreth. And this is that great City, which was called Memphis; and so the Septuagint write it. It is known to the Arabians by the name of Mazar. The Chaldæans name it Alchabyr; and Tudalensis Mizraim.

Lib. 2.

G. Tyr. l. 20. c. 17. l. 2. c. 5. Pelusium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Junius, and our English, write Sin; the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus, Lebna; is not the same with Damiata, as Gul. Tyrius witnesseth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Pelusium was called Belbeis. Belbeis (saith Tyrius) quæ olim dicta est Pelusium; Belbeis that in times past was called Pelusium.

The City of No, the Septuagint call Diospolis. Of which name there are two or three in Egypt. Hierom converts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future. Ezech. 30. 15, 16.

Bubastus (for so Hierome and Zeigler do write it) is the same which the Hebrews call Pibeseth. Ezech. 30. 17.

To make the Story more perceivable, I have added a Description of the Land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembred in the Scripture: as of Taphnes, or Zoan, Heliopolis, or Bethsemes, Balsephon, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses passage through the Desarts of Arabia the Stony. For all Story, without the knowledge of the places wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure, so it no way enricheth the knowledge and understanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing serve to retain, what we read, in our memories, so well as these Pictures and Descriptions do. In which respect I am driven to digress in many places, and to interpose some such Discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent; taking for my authority, after many others more antient, that great learned man, Arias Montanus; who, in his Preface to the Story of the Holy Land, hath these words: Si enim absque locorum observatione res gestæ narrentur, aut sine Topographiæ cognitione Historiæ legantur, adeo confusa atque perturbata erunt omnia, ut ex iis nihil non obscurum, nihil non difficile elici possit; If narration (saith he) be made of those things which are performed, without the observation of the places wherein they were done; or if Histories be read without Topographical knowledge; all things will appear so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby understand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficulty.

§. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites young children in Egypt; and of Moses his preservation and Education.

But to return to the Story it self. It appeareth, that notwithstanding the labour and slavery which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: In so much as Pharaoh, considering the danger of discontented poverty, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perillous they might be to his estate, by suggestion of the Devil, resolved to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrews, as soon as they ſhould be born. To which end he ſent for Sephora and Thura, women the moſt famous and expert amongſt them, Quæ præerant (ſaith Comeſtor) multitudini obſtetricum, who had command given them over all Mid-wives; by whom (as it ſeemeth) he gave order to all the reſt for the execution of his Edict. For, to have called all the Mid-wives of Egypt together, had been a ſtrange Parliament. Now, whether theſe two (before named) were of the Hebrews, or of the Egyptians, it is diverſly diſputed. S. Auguſtine calls them Hebrews, becauſe it is written Exodus 1. The King of Egypt commanded the Mid-wives of the Hebrew women, &c. But Joſephus, Abulenſis, and Pererius believe them to be Egyptians. Whoſoever they were, when it pleaſed God to fruſtrate the execution of that ſecret murther, to the end the World might witneſs both the wickedneſs of the Egyptians, and the juſt cauſe, thereby made manifeſt, of his future indignation and revenge: Pharaoh finding theſe Women filled with piety, and the fear of God, commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publickly, or howſoever, to deſtroy all the male Hebrew children born within his Dominions.

Verſ. 16. Joſeph. ant. l. 2. c. 5. Abul. & Perer. in Exod.

Now, beſides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrews, the greateſt part of whom he might have aſſured, by affording them the juſtice which every King oweth to his vaſſals, and the reſt he might have employed, or ſent away, at his pleaſure; Joſephus giveth another cauſe of his rage againſt them, namely, That it was prophetically delivered him by an Egyptian Prieſt, that among the Hebrews there ſhould be born a child, who growing to mans eſtate, ſhould becom a plague and terror to his whole Nation. To prevent which (and preſuming that he could reſiſt the Ordinance of God, by a mean, contrary to the Laws of Heaven and of Nature) he ſtretched out his bloudy and mercileſs hand to the execution of his former intent. The ſame prevention Herod long after practiſed, when fearing the ſpiritual Kingdom of Chriſt, as if it ſhould have been temporal, he cauſed all the male children at that time born, to be ſlaughtered. And that Pharaoh had ſome kind of foreknowledg of the future ſucceſs, it may be gathered by his own words, in the tenth Verſe of the fifth of Exodus: Come, let us work wiſely with them, leſt they multiply; and it come to paſs, that if there be Warr, they join themſelves alſo unto our enemies, and fight againſt us, and get them out of the Land. But we ſee, and time hath told it us from the beginning, how God derideth the wiſdom of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they rely on the inventions of their own moſt feeble, and altogether darkened, underſtanding. For even by the hands of the dearly beloved daughter of this Tyrant, was that great Prophet and Miniſter of Gods marvellous works taken out of Nilus, being thereinto turned off, in an Ark of Reeds, a ſucking and powerleſs Infant. And this Princeſs having beheld the child his form and beauty, though but yet in the blouth, ſo pierced her compaſſion, as ſhe did not onely preſerve it, and cauſe it to be foſtered; but commanded that it ſhould be eſteemed as her own, and with equal care to the Son of a King nouriſhed. And for memory that it was her deed, ſhe called the child Moſes, as it were, extractus, or ereptus, taken out, to wit, out of the Water; or after Joſephus and Glycas, Moy, a voice expreſſing Water, and Hiſes, as much as to ſay, as that which is drawn out of Water, or thence taken. Clemens Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moſes was circumciſed before he was put into the Ark of Reeds, and that Amram his father had named him Joachim. In his youth he was carefully bred, by the care, and at the charge, of Pharaohs Daughter, and by men of the moſt underſtanding, taught and inſtructed: Quem regio more educavit, præfeſtis ei ſapientibus Ægyptiorum Magiſtris, à quibus erudiretur, ſaith Baſil; unto whom ſhe gave Princely education, appointing over him wiſe Maſters of the Egyptians for his inſtructers. Thereby (ſay Joſephus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Egyptians; which alſo the Martyr Stephen in the ſeventh of the Acts confirmeth; And Moſes was learned in all the wiſdom of the Egyptians. Which Wiſdom or Sapience, ſuch as it was, or at leaſt ſo much thereof as Six. Senenſis hath gathered, we have added, between the death of Moſes, and the reign of Joſua.

§. IV.

Of Moſes his flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certain antient Hiſtorians of his war in Æthiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo his judgment of his Paſtoral life; and that of Pererius of the Books of Geneſis and Job.

WHen Moſes was grown to mans eſtate, Joſephus and Euſebius, out of Artapanus, tell us of ten years Warr that he made againſt the Æthiopians; of the beſieging of Seba, afterward, by Cambyſes, called Meroe; and how he recovered the City by the favour vour of Tharbis, a Daughter of Æthiopia, whom he took to Wife. So hath Comeſtor a pretty tale of Moſes, how after the end of that Warr, Tharbis reſiſting his return into Egypt, Moſes, moſt ſkilful in Aſtronomy, cauſed two Images to be engraven in two precious Stones, whereof the one increaſed memory; the other cauſed forgetfulneſs: Theſe he ſet in two Rings; whereof he gave the one, to wit, that of oblivion, to his Wife Tharbis, reſerving the other of memory for himſelf; which Ring of forgetfulneſs, after ſhe had a while worn, ſhe began to neglect the love ſhe bare her Huſband: and ſo Moſes, without danger, returned into Egypt. But leaving theſe fancies to the Authours of them: It is true, that about the fourtieth year of Moſes age, when he beheld an Egyptian offering violence to one of the the oppreſſed Hebrews, moved by compaſſion, in reſpect of his brother, and ſtirred up by diſdain againſt the other, in the contention he ſlew the Egyptian. Soon after which fact, finding a diſpoſition in ſome of his own Nation to accuſe him, for whoſe defence, he had thus greatly endangered his own life: by the ordinance and advice of God, whoſe choſen ſervant he was, he fled into Arabia Petræa, the next bordering Countrey to Egypt; where wandering all alone, as a man left and forſaken, in a place unknown unto him, as among a Nation of barbarous ſtrangers; and who in future times, were the irreconcileable enemies of the Hebrews: it pleaſed God (working the greateſt things by the weakeſt worldly means) to make the watering of a few ſheep, and the aſſiſting of the Daughter of Raguel the Madianite, an occaſion whereby to provide him a Wife of one of thoſe, and a father-in-law, that fed him, and ſuſtained him in a Countrey neareſt Egypt, fitteſt to return from; neceſſary to be known, becauſe interjacent between Egypt and Judæa, through which he was to lead the Iſraelites; and wherein God held him, till the occaſion which God preſented beſt ſerved. And laſtly, where the glory of the world ſhined leaſt, amidſt mountainous Deſarts, there the glory of God, which ſhineth moſt, covered him over, and appeared unto him, not finding him as a Kings Son, or an adopted child of great Pharaoh's Daughter, but as a meek and humble Shepherd, ſitting at a mountains foot, a keeper and commander of thoſe poor Beaſts onely.

In that part of Arabia near Madian, he conſumed 40. years; and though (as Philo in the Story of Moſes life obſerveth) he did not neglect the care of thoſe flocks, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Paſtoral knowledge; yet in that ſolitary Deſart, he enjoyed himſelf: and being ſeparate from the preaſs of the world, and the troubleſome affairs thereof, he gave himſelf to contemplation, and to make perfect in himſelf all thoſe knowledges, whereof his younger years had gathered the grounds and principles: the ſame Authour alſo judging that his Paſtoral life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principality, which he afterward obtained. Eſt enim (ſaith Plato) ars Paſtoralis, quaſi præludium ad regnum, hoc eſt, ad regimen hominum, gregis manſuetiſſimi. Quemadmodum bellicoſa ingenia præexercent ſe in venationibus, experientia in feris, quod poſtea in militia, & bello perfectura ſunt; brutis præbentibus materiam exercitii, tam belli quàm pacis tempore. At verò præfectura manſueti pecoris, habet quiddam ſimile cum regno in ſubditis; ideoque Reges cognominantur Paſtores populorum, non contumeliæ, ſed honoris gratia; The art of keeping Sheep is, as it were, an introductory exerciſe unto a Kingdom, namely, the rules over men, the moſt gentle flock: Even as warlike natures do before-hand exerciſe themſelves in hunting, practiſing on wild beaſts thoſe things which after they will accompliſh in warfare: thoſe brute beaſts affording matter, wherein to train themſelves, both in time of war and of peace. But the government of gentle cattel, hath a kind of reſemblance unto a Kingly rule over ſubjects; therefore Kings are ſtiled Sheepherds of the people, not in way of reproach, but for their honour.

That Moſes, in the time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Book of Job, as Pererius ſuppoſeth, I cannot judge of it, becauſe it is thought, that Job was at that time living. Neither dare I ſubſcribe to Pererius opinion, That Moſes, while he lived in that part of Arabia, wrote the Book of Geneſis; although I cannot deny the reaſon of Pererius conjecture, That by the example of Jobs patience he might ſtrengthen the oppreſſed Hebrews: and by the promiſes of God to Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, put them in aſſurance of their delivery from the Egyptian ſlavery, and of the Land of reſt, and plenty, promiſed. Perer in c. 3. Exod.

Of his calling back into Egypt by the Angel of God, and the marvels and wonders which he performed, thereby to perſwade Pharaoh, that he was the meſſenger of the moſt High, the particulars are written in the firſt fourteen Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needleſs. But for the firſt, it is to be noted, that when Moſes deſired to be taught of God, by what name he ſhould make him known, and by whom he was ſent; Exod. c. 3. v. 13, 14, & 15.

he received from God ſo much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and ever-being Nature. Out of which he delivered him in the firſt part of his Anſwer, a name to be conſidered of by the wiſeſt; and in his ſecond, to be underſtood by all. For, there is nothing that is, or hath being of it ſelf, but the Eternal: which truly is, which is above all, which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed every moment; their ſubſtance waſteth, and is repaired by nutriment; never continuing at one ſtay, nor being the ſame ſo long as while one may ſay, Now. Likewiſe, whatſoever is conſumed in the longeſt continuance of time, the ſame, in every ſhorteſt piece of time ſuffereth decay; neither doth any thing abide in one ſtate. Una eſt Dei, & ſola natura quæ verè eſt: id enim quod ſubſiſtit, non habet aliundè, ſed ſuum eſt. Cætera quæ creata ſunt, etiamſi videntur eſſe, non ſunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & poteſt rurſum non eſſe, quod non fuit; It is the one and onely nature of God, which truly is: for he hath his being of himſelf, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they ſeem to be, yet they are not; for ſometimes they were not; and that which hath not been, may again want being. And with this, in reſpect of the divine Nature, the ſaying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: Tota rerum natura umbra eſt, aut inanis, aut fallax; The whole nature of things is but a ſhadow, either empty or deceitfull: in compariſon of whom (ſaith Eſay) all Nations are nothing, leſs than nothing, and meer vanity.

Hier. ad Dam.

Cap. 40. v. 13.

Of the ten Plagues wherewith the Egyptians were ſtrucken, the firſt was by changiug the Rivers into bloud; God puniſhing them by thoſe waters, into which their forefathers had thrown, and in which they had drowned, the innocent children of the Hebrews. To which this place of the Revelation may be fitly applied: And I heard the Angel of the water ſay, Lord, thou art juſt, which art, and which waſt; and holy, becauſe thou haſt judged theſe things; for they ſhed the bloud of thy Saints and Prophets, and therefore haſt thou given them bloud to drink.

Cap. 16. v. 5.

The reſt of the Plagues by Froggs, Lice, Flies, or ſtinging Waſps; by the death of their Cattel; by leprous Scabs; by Hail and Fire; by Graſhoppers; by Darkneſs; after which, Pharaoh forbad Moſes his preſence: moved the hardened heart of the unbelieving King, no longer than the pain and peril laſted; till ſuch time as his own firſt-born, and the firſt-born of all his Nation periſhed. He then, while he feared his own life (a time wherein we remember God perforce) ſtood upon no condition; whereas before, he firſt yielded but to the departure of the men; then of the men, women, and children, reſerving their beſtial; but he was now content for the preſent, that the Iſraelits ſhould not onely depart with all their own, but with a part of the Silver, Gold, and Jewels of his own people: of which (the fear being paſt) he ſuddenly repented him, as his purſuit after them proved. For, when every one of the Hebrews had (according to direction from Moſes received) ſlain a Lamb, without ſpot or blemiſh, for the Paſſover (a Sacrament of the moſt clean and unſpotted Saviour) and with the bloud thereof coloured the poſt and lintern of the doors; the Angel of God in the night ſmote every firſt-born of Egypt, from the Son of the King, to that of the Beggar and Slave: the children of the Iſraelites excepted. At which terrible judgment of God, Pharaoh being more than ever amazed, yielded, as before is ſaid, to their departure. The Egyptians (ſaith Epiphanius) did, in after-times, imitate this colouring with bloud, which the Iſraelites uſed after the Paſſover; aſcribing an exceeding virtue to the Red Colour: and therefore they did not onely mark their Sheep and Cattel, but their Trees bearing Fruit, to preſerve them from lightning, and other harms.

§. V.

Of Pharaoh's purſuit of the Iſraelites; and of their paſſage towards the Red Sea, ſo farr as Succoth.

NOw, when the people were removed, and on their way (his heart being hardned by God) he bethought him as well of the honour loſt, as of the ſhame remaining after ſo many Calamities and Plagues, in ſuffering them to depart with the ſpoils of his people, and in deſpight of himſelf. And having before this time great Companies of Souldiers in readineſs, he conſulted with himſelf, what way the Iſraelites were like to take. He knew that the ſhorteſt and faireſt paſſage was through the Countrey of the Philiſtims. But becauſe theſe people were very ſtrong, and a warlike Nation, and (in all probability) of his Allies, he ſuſpected that Moſes meant to find ſome other out-let, to wit, through the Deſart of Etham; and there, becauſe the Countrey was exceeding mountainous, and of hard acceſs, and that Moſes was peſtered with multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel, he thought it impoſſible for the Iſraelites to eſcape him that that way. In the mean while, having gathered together all the Chariots of Egypt, and six hundred of his own, and Captains over them; he determined to set upon them in the plains of Gosen, which way soever they turned themselves. For it was the antient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed with broad and sharp hooks on both sides, in fashion like the Mowers Sythe. Which kind of fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Britains used against the Romans, while they made the Warr for the conquest of this Land. Of this Army of Pharaoh, Josephus affirmeth, that it consisted of 50000. Horse, and 20000. Foot; which, were it true, then it cannot be doubted, but that Pharaoh intended long before to assail the Hebrews at their departure, or to destroy them in Gosen; and refused them passage, till such time as he had prepared an Army to set on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, he doubted two things, either that the Hebrews might join themselves to his enemies within the Land; or, being so multiplied, as they were, might leave his service, and get themselves thence at their pleasure. But the plagues which God grieved him withall, enforced him, at this time, to give an assent to their departure; perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwise, and Josephus partial in this affair, yet, by the words of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Egypt, which could not be done in haste. For Moses made but three days march, ere Pharaoh was at his heels; and yet the last day, he went on 16. miles: which in so hot a Countrey, and to drive their Cattel and Sheep with them, pestered with a world of Women and Children, was a march witnessing the dread of a powerfull Enemy at hand. Now, as Moses well knew that he went out with a mighty hand, and that God guided his understanding in all his enterprizes; so he lay not still in the ditch, crying for help, but using the understanding which God had given him, he left nothing unperformed becoming a wise man, and a valiant and skilfull Conductor; as by all his actions and counsels, from this day to his death, well appeared.

Exod. 14. 7.

When Moses perceived that Pharaoh was enraged against him, and commanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his presence: after that he had warned Israel of the Passover, he appointed a general Assembly, or Rendez-vous of all the Hebrews at Rameses, in the Territory of Gosen; a City standing indifferent to receive from all parts of the Countrey, the dispersed Hebrews; and gave commandment, that every Family should bring with them such store as they had of Dough, and Paste, not staying to make it into Bread; knowing then that Pharaoh was on foot, and on his way towards them. Which done, and having considered the great strength of Pharaoh's Horse-men and Chariots, of which kind of defence Moses was utterly unprovided (though, as it is written, the Israelites went up armed) he marched from Rameses East-ward, towards the Desarts of Etham, and encamped at Succoth; which he performed on the fifteenth day of the Moneth Abib; which Moneth, from that time forward, they were commanded to account as the first Moneth of the year. Whereas in former times they had been accustomed to begin their year in some other Moneth, following the manner of the Egyptians, and were now re-called by Moses to the rule of their fore-fathers, it is uncertain. Certain it is, that they had, and retained another beginning of their Politick year, which was not now abrogated, but rather, by some solemnities thereunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in use. Wherefore in referring things done, or happening among them, unto the beginning, middest, or ending of the year; that distinction of the Sacred and the Politick year is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of days in every Moneth, and the whole form of their year, like enough it is, that Moses himself in fourty years space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was given in trust; but that any rule of framing their Kalendar was made publick, before the captivity of Babylon, I do not find. Now, because time and motion begin together, it will not, I think, be any great breach of order, to shew here, at their first setting forth, what was the form of the Hebrew year; with the difference between them and other Nations, in ordering the account of time.

The Territory of Gosen was afterward called Rameses after the name of this City, as appeareth in Gen. 47. & Numb. 33. Exod. 13.

Ant. l. 1. c. 4.

VE Adar, was an intercalary Moneth, added ſome years unto the other twelve, to make the Solary and Lunary year agree; which (beſides the general inconvenience that would otherwiſe have riſen, by caſting the Moneths of Summer into the Winter ſeaſon, to the great confuſion of all account) was more neceſſarily to be regarded of the Hebrews, becauſe of the divine Precept. For God appointed eſpecial Feaſts to be celebrated preciſely in ſuch a Moneth of the year, and withall on a ſet day, both of the Moon, and of the Moneth: as the Feaſt of the Firſt-fruits, the new Moons, and the like; which could not have ſo been kept, if either the day of the Moon had fallen in ſome other part of the Moneth, or the Moneth it ſelf been found far diſtant from his place in the ſeaſon of the year.

Deut. 16.

Other Nations, the better to obſerve their Solemnities in the due time, and to aſcertain all reckonings and remembrances (which is the principal commodity of time that is, the meaſure of endurance) were driven in like manner to make their years unequal, by adding ſometimes, and ſometimes abating one or more days, as the errour committed in foregoing years required. The errour grew at firſt, by not knowing what number of days made up a compleat year. For though by the continual courſe of the Sun, cauſing Summer and Winter duly to ſucceed each other, it is plain enough, even to the moſt ſavage of all people, when a year hath paſſed over them; yet the neceſſity of ordinary occurrences, that are to be numbred by a ſhorter tally, makes this long meaſure of whole years inſufficient for the ſmaller ſort of more daily affairs. Therefore men obſerved the Monethly conſpicuous revolution of the Moon, by which they divided the the year into twelve parts, ſubdividing the Moneth into 29. days and nights, and thoſe again into their quarters and hours. But as the marks of time are ſenſibly and eaſily diſcerned; ſo the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the underſtanding. Twelve revolutions of the Moon, containing leſs time by 11. days, or thereabout, than the yearly courſe of the Sun through the Zodiak, in the ſpace of ſixteen years, every Moneth was found in the quite contrary part of the year, to that wherein it was placed at the firſt. This cauſed them to add ſome days to the year, making it to conſiſt of twelve Moneths, and as many days more, as they thought would make the courſes of the Sun and Moon to agree. But herein were committed many new errours. For neither did the Sun determine his yearly revolution by any ſet number of whole days; neither did the Moon change always at one hour; but the very minutes and leſſer fractions were to be obſerved by him, that would ſeek to reduce their motions (which motions alſo were not ſtill alike) into any certain rule.

30. & 19.

Here lay much Wiſdom, and deep Art, which could not ſoon be brought to perfection. Yet, as making an eſtimate at random, the Athenians held the year to contain thee hundred and ſixty days; wherein moſt of the Greeks concurred with them. That three hundred and ſixty days filled up the Grecian year (beſides many collateral proofs) it is manifeſt by that which Pliny directly affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in the honour of Demetrius Phalereus, which were (ſaith he) 360. whileſt as yet the year exceeded not that number of days. By this account, neither did any certain age of the Moon begin or end their Moneths; neither could their Moneths continue many years in their own places; but muſt needs be ſhifted by little and little, from Winter to Summer, and from Summer to Winter, as the days forgotten to be inſerted into the Almanack by men, but not forgotten by the ſuperiour bodies in their courſes, ſhould occupy their own rooms in their due turns. Now, becauſe the ſolemnity of the Olympian games was to be held at the full Moon, and withall, on the fifteenth day of the Moneth Hecatombæon (which anſwereth in a manner to our June) they were careſull to take order, that this Moneth might ever begin with the new Moon; which they effected by adding ſome two days to the laſt Moneth of every year; thoſe games being held once in four years. This intercalation ſufficed not to make the matter even; which cauſed them ſomtimes to omit one day in the fourth year, which was the ſecond of the Moneth Bædromion (agreeing nearly with our Auguſt) ſometimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to inſert another for it in their fourth Lunary year, accounting by the Moon, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithſtanding, their Moneth of June would every year have grown colder and colder, had they not ſought to keep all upright, by intercalating in each other Olympiad, that is, each eighth year, one whole Moneth, which they called the ſecond Poſideon, or December; which was the device of Harpalus, who alſo taught them to make one Month of 29. days, another of 30. days, & ſo ſucceſſively through the whole year. Thus, with much labour, they kept their year, as near as they could, unto the high way of the Planets; but theſe marks, which they obſerved, were found at length to be deceitfull guides. For it was not poſſible ſo to faſhion this eighth years intercalation, that it ſhould not deceive them in 11. hours and 18. minutes at the leaſt, or ſome ways in 34. hours and 10. miuutes, or 36. and 41. minutes; which differences, would in few Ages, have bred much confuſion. The firſt that introduced a good method, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who, not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth years intercalation, deviſed a Cycle of 19. years, wherein the Moon, having 235. times run out her circuit, met with the Sun in the ſame place, & on the ſame day of the year; as in the 19. year before paſt ſhe had done. This invention of Meton, was entertained with great applauſe, and paſſing from Greece to Rome, was there inſerted into the Kalendar in Golden Letters, being called, The Golden Number, which name it retaineth unto this day. Hereby were avoided the great and uncertain intercalations that formerly had been uſed; for by the intercalation of ſeven Months, in the 19. years, all was ſo even, that no ſenſible difference could be found. Yet that error which in one year could not be perceiv'd, was very apparent in a few of thoſe Cycles; the new Moons anticipating in one Cycle 7. hours, and ſome minutes, of the preciſe rule. Therefore Calippus deviſed a new Cycle, containing four of Metons, that is to ſay, 76. years; and afterwards, Hipparchus, a noble Aſtrologer, framed another, containing four of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding ſome errour in the former Obſervations, which they diligently corrected. The laſt reformation of the Kalendar, was that which Julius Cæſar made, who, by advice of the beſt Mathematicians, then to be found, examining the courſes of thoſe heavenly bodies, reduced the year unto the form which is now in uſe with us, containing 365. days and 6. hours, which hours in four years, make up one whole day, that is intercalated every fourth year, the 24. of February. The correction of the Julian year by Pope Gregory the 13. Anno Dom. 1582. is not as yet entertained by general conſent; it was indeed but as a Note added unto the Work of Cæſar; yet a Note of great importance. For whereas it was obſerved, that the Sun, which at the time of the Nicene Council, An. Dom. 234. entred the Æquinoctial on the 21. day of March, was in the year 1583. ten days ſooner found, in that time Pope Gregory ſtrook out of the Kalendar ten days, following the 4. of October; ſo that in ſtead of the fifth day, was written the fifteenth; by which means the movable Feaſts depending on the Sun's entrance into Aries, were again celebrated in ſuch time, as at the Nicene Council they had been. And the better to prevent the like alterations, it was by the Council of Trent ordained, that from thence forward, in every hundred year, the Leap-day ſhould be omitted, excepting ſtill the fourth hundred; becauſe the Sun doth not in his yearly courſe take up full ſix hours above the 365. days; but faileth ſo may minutes, as in 400. years make about three whole days.

But the Cycle of 29. years, which the Hebrews uſed, was ſuch as neither did need any nice curioſity of hours, minutes, and other leſſer fractions to help it; neither did in ſumming up the days of the whole year, neglect the days of the Moon, confounding one Month with another. For with them it fel out ſo, that always the Kalends, or firſt day of the Moneth, was at the new Moon; and becauſe that day was Feſtival, they were very carefull, as well to obſerve the ſhort year of the Moon, paſſing through all the 12. Signs in one Moneth, as that longer of the Sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. Firſt, therefore they gave it to Niſan, their firſt Moneth, which is about our March, or April, 30. days; to Jar, their ſecond Moneth 29. days; and ſo ſucceſſively 30. to one, 29. to another. Hereby it came to paſs, that every two Moneths of theirs contain'd ſomewhat evenly two revolutions of the Moon, allowing 29. days 12 hours, and odd minutes, from change to change. The ſpare minutes were beſtowed among the ſuperfluous, or Epact days; which made up ſeven Moneths in 19. years; to ſix of which ſeven were commonly given 30. days, to one of them 29. days, or otherwiſe, as was found requiſite. Their common year (as appeareth by the ſeveral days of each Moneth) contained 354. days, which fail of the year, wherein the Sun finiſheth his courſe, 11. whole days, with ſome fractions of time. But theſe days, and other broken pieces, howſoever they were neglected in one year, yet in the Cycle of 19. years, were ſo diſpoſed of by convenient intercalations, that ſtill at the end of the Cycle, both the Sun and Moon were found on the ſame day of the year, Moneth, and week, yea, commonly on the ſame hour of the day, where they had been at the beginning of it, 19. years before.

Sig. de rep. Heb. lib. 3. cap. 1. Divers have diverſly ſet down the form of the Hebrew year, with the manner of their intercalations. Sigonius tells us, that every ſecond year, they did add a Moneth of 22. days; every fourth year a Moneth of 23. in regard of 11. days and a half wanting in 12. Moons, to fulfill a year of the Sun. But herein Sigonius was very much deceived. For the Moon doth never finiſh her courſe in 22. or 23. days; and therefore to have added ſo many days to the end of the year, had been the way to change the faſhion of all the Moneths in the years following, which could not have begun, as they ought, with the new Moon. Genebrard ſaith, that every third year, or ſecond year, as need required, they did intercalate one Moneth, adding it at the years end unto the other 12. This I believe to have been true; but in which of the years the intercalation was (if it be worthy of conſideration) me thinks they do not probably deliver, who keep all farr from evenneſs, untill the very laſt of the 19. years. For (to omit ſuch as erre groſly) ſome there are who ſay, that after three years, when beſides the days ſpent in 36. courſes of the Moon, 33. days are left remaining, that is, 11. days of each year; then did the Hebrews add a Moneth of 30. days; keeping three days, as it were, in pluſiage unto the next account. The like, ſay they, was done at the end of the ſixth year; at which time, beſides the intercalary Moneth, remained ſix days, namely, three ſurmounting that Month, and the Epact of three years, beſides the three formerly reſerved. Thus they go on to the 18. year; at which time they have 18. days in hand: all which, with the Epact of the 19. year, make up a Moneth of 29. days, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle, makes all even.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirm nor deny; yet ſurely it muſt needs have bred a great confuſion, if in the 18. year every Moneth were removed from his own place by the diſtance of 48. days, that is, half a quarter of a year and more; which inconvenience, by ſuch a reckoning, was unavoidable. Wherefore I preferr the common opinion, which prevents ſuch diſlocation of the Moneths, by ſetting down a more convenient way of intercalation in the 8. year. For the 6. days remaining after the two former intercalations made in the third and ſixth years, added unto the 22. days, ariſing out of the Epacts of the 7. and 8. years, do fitly ſerve to make up a Moneth, with the borrowing of one day or two from the year following; and this borrowing of two days is ſo farr from cauſing any diſorder, that indeed it helps to make the year enſuing vary the leſs from the proper ſeaſon of every Moneth. This may ſuffice to be ſpoken of the Hebrew Moneths and years, by which they guided their accounts.

Of the paſſage of Iſrael from Succoth towards the Red Sea; and of the divers ways leading out of Egypt.

FRom Succoth, in the morning following, Moſes led the Iſraelites towards the Deſart of Etham, to recover the Mountain foot, by the edge of that Wilderneſs, though he intended nothing leſs than to go out of that way, of all other the neareſt. But being aſſured of the multitude of Horſe-men and armed Chariots that followed him, he kept himſelf from being encompaſſed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he reſted but one night, and then he reflected back from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the diſtance between it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbare to enter Arabia, being then in ſight thereof, it ſeemeth to proceed from three reſpects: the firſt two, natural; the third, divine. For, Pharaoh being then at hand, and having received intelligence of the way which Moſes took, perſwaded himſelf, that the numbers which Moſes led, conſiſting of above a Million, if not of two Millions of Souls (for it is written, Exod. the 12. Great multitudes of ſundry ſorts of people went out with them) could not poſſibly paſs over thoſe Deſart and high Mountains with ſo great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel, but that at the very entrance of that faſtneſs he ſhould have overtaken them, and deſtroyed the greateſt number of them. For theſe his own words, They are tangled in the Land, the Wilderneſs hath ſhut them in, do ſhew his hopes and intents; which Moſes, by turning another way, did fruſtrate. Secondly, Moſes by offering to enter Arabia that way, way, drew Pharaoh toward the Eaſt-ſide of the Land of Goſen, or Rameſes: from whence (miſſing Moſes there) his purſuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reaſon of the roughneſs of the way; and howſoever, yet while the Hebrews kept the Mountain foot on the left hand, they were better ſecured from the over-bearing violence both of Horſe and Chariots. Thirdly, Moſes confidence in the All-powerfull God was ſuch, by whoſe Spirit, onely wiſe, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leave the glory of his deliverance and victory to Almighty God than either by an eſcape the next way, or by the ſtrength of his multitude, conſiſting of 600000. men, to caſt the ſucceſs upon his own underſtanding, wiſe conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Valley of Pihacheroth, ſixteen miles diſtant; and ſate down between two ledges of Mountains adjoining to the Red Sea, to wit, the Mountains of Etham on the North, and Baalzephon towards the South; the ſame which Oroſius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there ſtood a Temple, dedicated to Baal. And, as Phagius noteth, the word ſo compounded, is as much to ſay, as, Dominus ſpeculæ, ſive cuſtodiæ; Lord of the watch-tower. For the Egyptians believed, or at leaſt made their ſlaves believe, that if any of them offered to eſcape that way into Arabia, this Idol would both arreſt them, and force them to return to their Lords and Maſters. For the Egyptians had gods for all turns. Egyptii diis fœcundi; The Egyptians were fruitfull in gods, ſaith S. Hierom. But Moſes, who encamped at the foot of this Mountain with a million of Souls, or, as others conceive, with two millions, found this Lord of the Watch-tower aſleep, or out of countenance.

It is probable that all thoſe Egyptians, and others brought by the Hebrews to the knowledg of the true God, followed Moſes at his departure.

Climax is rather ſo called in reſpect of a paſſage up and down, than that it is any proper name.

Now, theſe two paſſages, leading out of Egypt into Arabia upon the firm Land, Moſes refuſed, as well that of Peluſium and Caſiotis, the faireſt and ſhorteſt of all other, in reſpect of Judæa, as the other by Etham, from which he reflected, for the reaſons before remembred, and took the way by the Valley of Pihacheroth, between the Mountains, which made a ſtreight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made ſo great ſpeed with his Horſe-men and Chariots, as he gave the Hebrews no time at all to reſt them after ſo long a march; but got ſight of them, and they of him, even at the very brink and waſh of the Sea; in ſo much as the Hebrews being terrified with Pharaoh's ſudden approach, began to deſpair, and to mutiny, at that time when it behooved them moſt to have taken courage for their own defence; laying it to Moſes charge, that themſelves foreſaw thoſe perils in which they were wrapped. And fear, Which, ſaith the Book of Wiſdom, is the betraying of thoſe ſuccours which reaſon offereth, made them both deſpair in God's former Promiſes, and to be forgetfull of their own ſtrength and multitudes. Exod. 13. 17. Chap. 17. 11.

§. VIII.

Of their paſſage over the Red Sea; and of the Red Sea it ſelf.

BUt Moſes, who feared nothing but God himſelf, perſwaded them to be confident in his goodneſs, who hath never abandoned thoſe, that aſſuredly truſted in him; uſing this comfortable and reſolved ſpeech: Fear not, &c. for the Egyptians whom ye have ſeen this day, ye ſhall never ſee them again. The Lord ſhall fight for you. After which, Moſes called on God for ſuccour, received encouragement, and commandment to go on, in theſe words; Wherefore cryeſt thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Iſrael that they go forward; and lift thou up thy Rod, and ſtretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it, and let the children of Iſrael go on dry ground through the midſt of the Sea. Moſes obeying the voice of God, in the dark of the night, finding the ſands uncovered, paſt on towards the other ſide and coaſt of Arabia; two parts of the night being ſpent ere he entred the Foord, which it pleaſed God by a forcible Eaſtern Wind, and by Moſes Rod, to prepare. Exod. 14. 13. Exod. 14. 16.

Pharaoh followed him even at the heels, finding the ſame dry ground which Moſes trod on. Therefore, as it is written: The Angel of God which went before the Hoſt of Iſrael, removed, and went behind them; alſo the Pillar of the cloud went from before them, and ſtood behind them; which is, that it pleaſed God therein, either by his immediate power, or by the miniſtry of his Angel, to interpoſe his defence between the Hebrews and their Enemies; to the end that the Egyptians might hereby be blinded, in ſuch ſort, as they could not purſue Iſrael with any harmfull ſpeed. But in the morning-watch, Moſes ſeized the other bank of Arabia ſide; and Pharaoh (as the dawn of the day began to enlighten the obſcure air) finding a beginning of the Sea's return, haſted himſelf towards his own Coaſt: But Moſes ſtretched forth his hand, and the Sea returned to his force, that is, the Sea, moved by the power of God, ran back towards the Land with unreſiſtible fury and ſwiftneſs, and overwhelmed the whole Army of Pharaoh, ſo as not one eſcaped. For, it is written, that God took off their Chariot wheels, Joſua 24. 7. Exod. 14. 27.

that is, when the waters began to cover the ſands, the Egyptians being ſtrucken with fear of death, ran one athwart another, and miſſing the path by which they had paſt on after the Hebrews, their wheels ſtuck faſt in the mud and quick-ſands, and could not be drawn out; the Sea coming againſt them with ſupernatural violence.

Lyranus, upon Exod. 14. and others, following the Opinions or old Traditions of the Hebrews, conceived, that after Moſes had by the power of God divided the Red Sea, and that the children of Iſrael were fearfull to enter it, Aminadab, Prince, or Leader of the Tribe of Judah, firſt made the adventure; and that therefore was that Tribe, ever after, honoured above the reſt, according to the Prophecie of Jacob, Gen. 49. 8. Thy fathers Sons ſhall bow down unto thee. But Hierome, upon Hoſea 11. condemns this Opinion, And though it be true, that Judah had the firſt place in all their miracles in the Deſart, and, as we now call it, led the Van-guard (whereupon it may be inferred, that he alſo led the way through the Red Sea) yet, that Moſes himſelf was the Conducter of Iſrael at that time, it is generally received. For, it is written in the 77. Pſalm; Thou didſt lead thy people, like Sheep, by the hand of Moſes and Aaron.

The Hebrews have alſo another fancie, that the Red Sea was divided into twelve parts, and that every Tribe paſt over in a path apart, becauſe it is written in the 135. Pſalm, according to the vulgar: Diviſit Mare Rubrum in diviſiones; He divided the Red Sea in diviſions. Alſo that the bottom of the Sea became a green Field, or Paſture. But Origen, Epiphanius, Abulenſis, and Genebrard, favouring this conceit, had forgotten to conſider, that there were not twelve Pillars, nor twelve Armies of the Egyptians. It is written, Pſalm 77. v. 16. Thy way is in the Sea; not thy ways: and in the laſt Book of Wiſdom, verſ. 7. In the Red Sea there was a way.

Now, this Sea, through which Moſes paſt, and in which Pharaoh, otherwiſe called Chencres, periſhed, in the 16. year of his reign, is commonly known by the name of the Red Sea, though the ſame differ nothing at all in natural colour from other Waters. But, as Philoſtratus in his third Book noteth, and our ſelves know by experience, it is of a bluiſh colour, as other Seas are. It entreth at a narrow ſtrait, between Arabia the Happy, and Æthiopia, or the Land of the Abyſins: the mouth of the indraught from the Cape, which Ptolemy calleth Poſſodium, to the other Land of Æthiopia, hath not above ſix leagues in breadth, and the ſame alſo filled every where with Iſlands, but afterwards it extendeth it ſelf 58. leagues from coaſt to coaſt, and it runneth up between Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Petræa on one ſide, and Æthiopia and Egypt on the other, as farr as Sues, the uttermoſt end and indraught of that Sea; where the Turk now keeps his fleet of Gallies. The Coſmographers commonly give it the name of the Arabian Gulf; but the North part towards Sues, and where Moſes paſt, is called Heropolites, of the City Hero, ſometime Troy, and of later times Sues. Pliny calls it Cambiſu, by which name it was known, ſaith he, before it was called Hero, many years. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North, Apocopa, Eccant, and Eant. Artemidorus writes it Æleniticum; King Juba, Læniticum; others more properly, Elaniticum, of the Port and City Elana, which the Septuagint call Elath; Ptolemy, Elana; Pliny, Læna; Joſephus, Ilana; and Marius Niger, Aila: there is alſo Ilalah in Aſſyria, to which Salmanaſſer carried the Iſraelites captive, 2 King. 8. 11. which Ilalah in Aſſyria, the Septuagint call Elæa; and in the firſt of Chro. 5. Ala. But, as for the Red Sea, on the parts thereof, thus diverſly named, the Moors, and Arabians (Vaſſals to the Turk) know it by no other appellation, than the Gulf of Meca, after the name of Mahomet's Town Mecca. The Greeks write it the Sea Erythræum, of a King called Erythras, or Erythræus: and becauſe Erythros in the Greek ſignifieth Red; hence it is, that, being denominated of this Erythræus, the Son of Perſeus and Andromeda, it took the name of the Red Sea, as Q. Curtius conjecture th; which Arianus and Strabo confirm. But it ſeems to me, by the view of a Diſcovery of that Sea, in the year 1544. performed by Stephen Gama, Viceroy of the Eaſt-India for the King of Portugal, that this Sea was ſo called from a reflection of a redneſs, both from the banks, cliffs, and ſands of many Iſlands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For, I find by the report of Caſtro, a principal Commander under Gama (which Diſcourſe I gave Mr. Richard Hacluit to publiſh) that there is an Iſland called Dalaqua, ſometime Leques, containing in length, 25. leagues, and 12. in breadth; the earth, ſands, and cliffs, of which Iſland, being of a rediſh colour, ſerve for a foil to the waters about it; to make it ſeem altogether of the ſame colour. Secondly, the ſame Caſtro reporteth, that from 24. degrees of Septentrional latitude, to 27. (which make in length of Coaſt 180. miles, lying, as it doth, Northerly & Southerly) all the cliffs, and banks are of red earth, or ſtone, which by reflection of the Sunbeams, give a kind of rediſh luſtre to the waters. Thirdly, thoſe Portugals report, and we

we know it by many teſtimonies, that there are found in the bottom of this Sea, towards the ſhore, great abundance of red ſtones, on which the greateſt ſtore of Corral grows, which is carried into moſt parts of Europe, and elſewhere. There are alſo on the Iſlands of this Sea, many red Trees, ſaith Strabo, and thoſe, growing under water, may alſo be a cauſe of ſuch a colour. Of theſe appearances of redneſs by the ſhadow of theſe ſtones, ſands, earth, and cliffs, I ſuppoſe that it firſt took the name of the Red Sea, becauſe in ſo many places it ſeemeth to be ſuch; which Johannes Barros in his ſecond Decade, eighth Book, and firſt Chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this Sea, from Elana, or Ezion-Gaber adjoining, now Toro, called by the antient Coſmographers, Sinus Elaniticus, which waſheth the banks of Madian, or Midian, is for 16. or 17. leagues together, along Northward toward Sues, ſome 3. leagues, or 9. Engliſh miles over, and from this Port of Toro to Sues, and the end of this Sea, it is in length about 28. leagues, of which, the firſt 26. have 9. miles breadth, as aforeſaid, and afterward, the Lands, both from Egypt and Arabia, thruſt themſelves into the Sea, and ſtrengthen it ſo faſt, as for 6. miles together, it is not above 3. miles over; from thence, upward the Land on Egypt ſide, falleth away, and makes a kind of Bay, or Cove, for ſome 10. miles together, after which, the Land grows upon the Sea again, and ſo binds it into the very end thereof, at 4. miles breadth, or there about, in which Tract it was that Moſes paſt it over, though others would have it to be over againſt Elana, or Toro, but without judgment; for from Rameſes to Pihacheroth, and Baalzephon, there is not above 30. miles interjacent, or 35. miles at moſt, which Moſes paſt over in three days; and between the Land of Egypt, oppoſite to Elana, or Toro, the diſtance is above 80. miles. For Rameſes, to which City Moſes came (being the Metropolis of Goſen) when he left Pharaoh at Zoan, and took his laſt leave, ſtandeth in 30. degrees 5. minutes of Septentrional latitude; and Migdol, or the Valley of Pihacheroth, at the foot of the Mountain Climax, or Baalzephon, in nine and twenty and a half, which make a difference of five and thirty Engliſh miles, the way lying, in effect, North and South.

That the paſſage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not a low ebb.

THe Egyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who, in hatred of the Hebrews, have objected that Moſes paſt over the Red Sea at a low ebb, upon a great Spring-tyde, and that Pharaoh, conducted more by fury than diſcretion, purſued him ſo farr, as before he could recover the coaſt of Egypt, he was overtaken by the floud, and therein periſhed; did not well conſider the nature of this place, with other circumſtances. For, not to borrow ſtrength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plain, that the Waters were divided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Eaſterly Wind, and by the hand and rod of Moſes (which authority to men that believe not therein, perſwadeth nothing) I ſay, that by the ſame natural reaſon unto which they faſtened themſelves, it is made manifeſt, that had there bin no other working power from above, or aſſiſtance given from God himſelf to Moſes and the children of Iſrael, than ordinary, and caſual, then could not Pharaoh and all his Army have periſhed in that purſuit.

For whereſoever there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulf, or indraught, there do the waters fall away from the Land, and run downwards toward the Ocean, leaving all that part towards the Land, as far as the Sea can ebb, or fall off, to the dry land. Now, Moſes entring the Sea at Migdol under Baalzephon (if he had taken the advantage and opportunity of the tide) muſt have left all that end of the Red Sea towards Sues, on his left hand, dry and uncovered. For if a paſſage were made by falling away of the water 10. or 12. miles farther into the Sea than Sues, and between it and where Moſes paſt, who entred the ſame ſo far below it, and towards the body of the ſame Sea; it followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleev, or Strait, had been by the ebb of a Spring-tide diſcovered, when Pharaoh found the floud increaſing, he needed not to have returned by the ſame way toward Egypt ſide, but might have gone on in his return before the tide, on his right hand; and ſo taken ground again at the end of the Sea, at Sues it ſelf, or elſewhere. But the Scriptures do truly witneſs the contrary, that is, That the Sea did not fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth, but that Moſes paſt on between two Seas, and that the waters were divided. Otherwiſe, Pharaoh, by any return of waters, could not have periſhed, as he did; and therefore the effects of that great Armies deſtruction, prove the cauſe to have bin a power above nature, and the miraculous work of God himſelf. Again, thoſe words of the Scriptures, that God cauſed the Sea to return back by a ſtrong Eaſt-wind, do rather prove the miracle, than that thereby was caused an ebb more than ordinary; for that Sea did not lie East and West, but, in effect, North and South. And it must have been a West and North west wind, that must have driven those waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East-wind blew athwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell back towards the South and main body thereof, the other part remained toward Sues, and the North. Which being unknown to Pharaoh; while he was checkt by that Sea, which used in times before to ebb away, the floud prest him, and over-whelm'd him. Thirdly, seeing Josephus avoweth, that Moses was not onely of excellent judgment, generally, but also, so great a Captain, as he over-threw the Æthiopians in battels, being imployed by Pharaoh, and wan divers Cities, seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemn him of this grosness, and distraction: that rather then he would have endured the hardness of a Mountainous passage at hand (had not God commanded to take that way, and fore-told him of the honour which he would there win upon Pharaoh) he would have trusted to the advantage of an ebbing water. For he knew not the contrary, but that Pharaoh might have found him, and prest him, as well when it flowed, as when it ebbed, as it seemeth he did. For the people, beholding Pharaoh's approach, cried out against Moses, and despaired altogether of their safety; and when Moses prayed unto God for help, he was answered by God; Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward, and lift thou up thy Rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it: which proves that there was not at that time of Pharaoh's approach any ebb at all, but that God did disperse and cut through the weight of waters, by a strong East-wind, whereby the sands discovered themselves between the Sea on the left hand toward Sues, from whence the Waters moved not, and the Sea which was towards the South on the right hand, so that the Waters were a wall unto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the Waters so defended them on both sides, as the Egyptians could onely follow them in the same path, not that the Waters stood upright as walls do, as some of the Schole-men have fancied. For, had Pharaoh and the Egyptians perceived any such buildings in the Sea, they would soon have quitted the chase and pursuit of Israel. Furthermore, there is no man of judgment, that can think, that Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the observations of heavenly motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes and refluxes of the Sea, in his own Countrey, on his own coast, and in his own most traded and frequented Ports and Havens; and wherein his people having had so many hundreds of years experience of the tides, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any fore-known or natural accident, but by God's powerfull hand only; which then falleth most heavily on all men, when, looking through no other spectacle but their own prosperity, they least discern it coming, and least fear it. Lastly, if the Army of the Egyptians had been overtaken by the ordinary return of the floud, before they could recover their own coast; their bodies drowned would have been carried with the floud, which runneth up to Sues, and to the end of that Sea, and not have been cast a-shore on the coast of Arabia, where Moses landed, to wit, upon the Sea-bank over against Baalzephon, on Arabia side; where it was that the Israelites saw their dead bodies, and not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinary floud would have carried them; Which floud doth not any where cross the Channel, and run athwart it, as it must have done from Egypt side to Arabia, to have cast the bodies there; but it keeps the natural course towards the end of that Sea; and to which their carkasses should have been carried, if the work had not been supernatural and miraculous. Apollonius, in the lives of the Fathers, affirmeth, that those of the Egyptians which stayed in the country, did not follow Pharaoh in the pursuit of Israel, did ever after honor those beasts, birds, plants or other creatures, about which they were busied at the time of Pharaoh's destruction; as he that was then labouring in his Garden, made a god of that Plant or Root about which he was occupied, and so of the rest. But how those multitudes of gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be given else-where. Orosius, in his first Book and tenth Chapter against the Pagans, tells us, that in his time, who lived some 400. years after Christ, the prints of Pharaoh's Chariot wheels were to be seen at a low water, on the Egyptian sands; and though they were sometime defaced by wind and weather, yet soon after they appeared again. But hereof I leave every man to his own belief.

CHAP. IV.

Of the journeying of the Iſraelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was given them; with a diſcourſe of Laws.

§. I.

A tranſition, by way of recapitulation of ſome things touching Chronologie; with a continnation of the Story, untill the Amalekites met with the Iſraelites.

BUt to go on with the Story of Iſrael, in this ſort I collect the times. Moſes was born in the year of the World, 2434. Saphrus then governing Aſſyria; Orthopolis, Sycionia, or Peloponneſus; Crioſus, the Argives; Orus, Egypt; and Deucalion, Theſſaly. He fled into Midian, when he had lived fourty years, in the year of the World, 2474. and two years after was Caleb born. He returned by the commandment and ordinance of God into Egypt, and wrought his miracles in the fields of Zoan, in the year, 2514. the laſt Moneth of the year. On the 14. day of the firſt Hebrew Moneth Abib, or the 15. of that Moneth, beginning the day (as they) at Sunſetting, in the year of the World, 2514. was the celebration of the Paſſover; & in the dead of the night of the ſame day, were all the firſt born ſlain through Egypt, or in all thoſe parts where the Hebrews inhabited not. The 15. day of the firſt Month of the Hebrews, called Abib, being about the beginning of the year of the World, 2514. Moſes, with the children of Iſrael removed from the general Aſſembly at Rameſes, and marched to Succoth.

Acts 7. Joſua 14. 2474. 2514. Pag. 254. Exod. 12. Numb. 33.

And departing thence, they made their third ſtation at Etham; and journeying from Etham, they encamped in the Valley of Pihacheroth, or Migdol, under the Mountain Baalzephon; and in the ſame night, after midnight, they paſt the Red Sea; Pharaoh and his Army periſhing in their return, about the firſt dawn of the day. Moſes having recovered the banks of Arabia, gave thanks unto God for the delivery of Iſrael; and making no ſtay on that coaſt, entred the Deſarts of Arabia Petræa, called Sur. But finding no water in that paſſage, he encamped at Marah, in the Deſart of Etham, which in Exod. 15. 22. is called Sur, 25. miles from the Sea; where the children of Iſrael, preſt with extreme thirſt, murmured againſt Moſes the ſecond time; firſt, at Pharaohs approach at Pihacheroth, and now in Arabia. But Moſes taking the branches of a Tree, growing near a Lake of bitter water, and caſting the ſame thereinto, made the ſame ſweet: a plain type and figure of our Saviour; who, upon the Tree of the Croſs, changed the bitterneſs of everlaſting death, into the ſweetneſs of eternal life. Pliny remembers theſe bitter Fountains in his ſixth Book, 29. Chapter. From whence to Delta in Egypt, Seſoſtris firſt, Darius after him, and laſtly, Ptolemy the ſecond, began to cut an artificial River, thereby by Boats and ſmall Shipping to Trade and Navigate the Red Sea, from the great Cities upon Nilus. From Marah he removed to Elim, the ſixth Manſion, a march of eight miles: where finding twelve Fountains of ſweet water, and threeſcore and ten Palm-trees, he reſted divers days.

Exod. 13. Numb. 33. Exod. 14. Numb. 33. Exod. 14. Exod. 15. Numb. 33. Exod. 15. Numb. 33.

Whether this Helim were the name of a Town or City in Moſes time, I cannot affirm. And yet the ſcarcity of waters in that Region was ſuch, as Helim, which had twelve Fountains, could hardly be left unpeopled. William, Archbiſhop of Tyre, in his Hiſtory of the Holy Warr, found at Helim, the ruines of a great and antient [illegible]. And at ſuch time as Baldwine the firſt paſt that way into Egypt. Ingreſſus (ſaith he) Helim Civitatem antiquiſſimam, populo Iſraelitico aliquando familiarem; ad quem cum perveniſſet, loci illius incolæ, Regis adventu præcognito, naviculam ingredientes, in Mare vicinum ſe contulerunt; Entring Helim, a very antient City, well known ſometime to the people of Iſrael; whither, when he came, the Inhabitants, forewarned of the Kings approach, took Boat, and ſhifted themſelves into the Sea lying near them. From Elim he returned again towards the South, and ſat down by the banks of the Red Sea; the ſeventh Manſion. For it ſeemeth, that he had knowledge of Amalech, who repaired to reſiſt his paſſage through part of Arabia. And Moſes, who had not as yet trained the Hebrews, appointed to bear Arms; nor aſſured the minds of the reſt, who encountring with the the least misery, were more apt to return to their quiet slavery, than either to endure the wants and perils which every way accompanied them in that passage, or at this time to undertake or sustain so dangerous an enemy: he therefore made stay at this Mansion, untill the fifteenth of this second Moneth, called Zim, or Jiar; and made Exod.16. the eighth Mansion in the Desart of Zin; where the children of Israel mutinied against Moses the third time, having want of food. In the 16. Chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retreat from Elim to the Red Sea, but in the collection of every several encamping, in the 33. of Numbers, it is set down.

Here it pleased God to send so many flights of Quails, as the Countrey about their encamping was covered with them. The morning following, it also rained Manna, being the 16. of their Moneth, which served them in stead of bread. For now was the store consumed which the people carried with Exod.16. them out of Egypt. And though they had great numbers of Cattel and Sheep among them, yet it seemeth, that they durst not feed themselves with many of those; but reserved them, both for the Milk to relieve the Children withall, and for Breed to store themselves when they came to the Land promised.

From hence towards Raphidim, they made two removes of 20. miles; the one to Daphca, the other to Alus, distant from Raphidim six miles. Here, being again prest with want of Water, they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Egypt, where they rather contented themselves to be fed and beaten after the manner of Beasts, than to suffer a casual, and sometime necessary want, and to undergo the hazards and travels which every manly mind seeks after, for the love of God, and their own freedoms. But Moses, with the same Rod which he divided the Sea withall, Exod.17. in the sight of the Elders of Israel, brought waters out of the Rock, wherewith the whole multitude were satisfied.

§. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, upon occasion of the battel with the Amalekites, and Jethro's coming; who, being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

AND while Moses encamped in this place, the Amalekites, who had knowledg of his approach, and ghessed that he meant to lead the children of Israel through their Countrey (which being barren of it self, would be utterly wasted by so great a multitude of People and Cattel) thought it most for their advantage to set upon them at Raphidim, where the want of water, and all other things needfull for the life of man, enfeebled them. On the other side, Moses perceiving their resolutions, gave charge to Josua, to draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrews, to encounter Amalech. Be- Exod.17. tween whom and Israel the victory remained doubtfull, for the most part of the day; the Hebrews and the Amalekites contending with equal hopes and repulses for many hours. And had not the strength of Moses Prayers to God been of farr greater force, and more prevalent than all resistance & attempt made by the bodies of men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly endangered the whole enterprise. For those bodies which are unacquainted with scarcity of food, and those minds whom a servile education hath dulled, being beaten, and despaired in their first attempts, will hardly, or never, be brought again to hazzard themselves.

After this Victory, Jethro repaired to Moses, bringing with him Moses his Wife, and his two Sons, which either Jethro forbare to conduct, or Moses to receive, till he had by this overthrow of Amalech the better assured himself of that part of Arabia. For it is written in *Exod.*18. 1. When Jethro, the Priest of Madian, Moses Father-in-law, heard all that God had done for Moses, &c. of which, the last deed, to wit, the overthrow of Amalech, gave Jethro courage and assurance, he then repaired to his Son-in-law, Moses, at Sinai; where, among other things, he advised Moses to appoint Judges, and other Officers over Israel, being himself unable to give order in all causes and controversies, among so many thousands of people, full of discontentment and private controversie.

This Jethro, although he dwelt amongst the Madianites, yet he was by Nation a Kenite, as in the fourth of Judges, Vers. 11, 17. it is manifest: where it is written, Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, to wit, the Son of Jethro, the Father-in-law of Moses, was departed from the Kenites, and Chap.15. pitched his Tents untill the Plain of Zaanaim, v.18. which is by Kedesh. Likewise, in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, lest he should destroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountains of Numb.24. 28. Sin Kadesh; and the Amalekites dwelt in 1 Sam. the Plains, according to the saying of Bala- cap.15. am, speaking of the Kenites: Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou hast put thy nest in the rock. And that Saul spared this Nation, he giveth giveth for cause, that they shewed mercy to all the children of Israel, when they came up from Egypt. For these Kenites were a Nation of the Madianites, and the Madianites were of the issues of Madian, one of the six Sons which Abraham begat on Kethura: and might also take that name of Kenites from Kethura, of whom they descended by the mother, who (as it seemeth) kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they received from their Parent Abraham. For Moses, when he fled out of Egypt into Madian, and married the Daughter of Jethro, would not (had he found them Idolaters) have made Jethro's Daughter the mother of his children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, which God promised, that the seed of Abraham should root out, and inherit their lands; yet it cannot be meant by these, who are descended from Abraham himself: but by some other Nation, bearing the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chus. For, in the fifteenth of Genesis, vers. 19. these Kenites, or Chusites, are listed with the Hittites and Perizzites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites, and Jebusites, which were indeed afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites descended from Abraham, had separated themselves from among the rest, which were altogether Idolatrous. For, as it is before remembred, Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites; that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh, or Cadesh. Again, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abraham's other Sons were born; which he did (referring my self to better judgment) rather, because they were more antient, than by anticipation.

Gen. 25.

Gen. 15.

Gen. 25. 4.

And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Madianites, parted by Moses into five Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and Heathens; as those of Madian by the River Zared, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Madianites, neer the banks of the Red Sea, where Moses married his Wife Zippora, and with whom he left her and his children, till after the overthrow of Amalech, seem likewise not to have been corrupted. For these Madianites, with the Kenites, assisted Israel, and guided them in the Deserts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petræa, were by Israel rooted out, when those adjoyning to the Red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian, of whom Jethro was Priest, and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrary is more probable. For Moses would not have sent 12000. Israelites, as far back as the Red Sea, from the Plains of Moab, to have destroyed that Madian, where his Wives kinred inhabited; seeing himself coming with 600000. able men, was encountred by Amalech in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Deserts, wherein himself and Israel had wandered fourty years.

That Jethro, or Jothor, Raguel, or Revel, and Hobab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach us. For the Vulgar, and Septuagint, which call him Raguel, and our English, Revel, Exod. 2. 18. cals him Jethro, or Jothor, Exod. 3. 1. and 4. 18. & 18. 1. & 6. 9, 10, 12. & in Numb. 10. 29. Hobab. Others take Jethro and Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was given; with divers commendations of the invention of Laws.

THE rest of the Moneths of this year 2515. were spent in the Desart of Sinai, neer the mountain of Sinai, or Horeb, the twelfth Mansion. Eusebius thought that Sinai and Horeb were distinct Mountains: Hierom, to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many Scriptures. For, in Exod. 3. 1. it is called Horeb: and in Exodus 24. 19. it is written Sinai. In the 106. Psalm, vers. 19. Horeb: in Exodus 19. 11. Sinai. And so it is called, Galatians 4. vers. 24. And again, Deut. 4. 10. and 15. and Deut. 5. 2. Horeb. And so it is in the first of Kings 8. 6. and the second of Chronicles 5. 10. and in Malachie 4. 4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus, 48. 7. they are named as one. Which heardest (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the judgment of the vengeance. Somewhat they are dis joined at the top, by the report of Peter Belonius; who, in the year 1588. past out of Egypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Fumet of France, and travelled to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by farr the higer hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very fair Spring of Water into the Valley adjoining: where he found two Monasteries of Christian Marronites, containing some hundred Religious persons of divers Nations, who had pleasant Gardens, delicate Fruits, and excellent Wine. These (saith the same Authour) give entertainment to all strangers, which pass that way. Pet. Bel. l. 2. cap. 62.

Now, that there was some such Torrent of water neer Sinai, in Moses time, it is very probable: First, because he encamped thereabout almost a year, and drew no water, as in other places, by miracle: Secondly, because it is written, Exod. 32.20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calf to powder, which Aaron set up in his absence, he cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of Israel to drink thereof.

On this mountain, the Law by the Angel of God was given to Moses, where he stayed a whole year, wanting some ten or twelve days: for he removed not till the twentieth day of the second Moneth of the second year; and he arrived about the five and fourtieth day after the egression; the Law being given the fiftieth day.

At this Mansion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that Book; all in Leviticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (because there is no Story nor other Passage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof speak somewhat of the Law, and the kinds and use thereof: wherby, if the Reader find the Story any way dis-joyned, he may turn over a few leaves, and, omitting this, find the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, level, and square of Laws: so it pleased God to give thereby unto Moses the powerfullest man (his miraculous grace excepted) to govern that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquest. For, as the North Starr is the most fixed Director of the Sea-man to his desired Port: so is the Law of God the Guide and Conductor of all in general to the haven of eternal life: the Law of Nature, from God his eternal Law deduced, the rule of all his creatures; the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and vertuous Men; yea, the very spirit, and the very sinews of every Estate in the World, by which they live and move: the Law, to wit, a just Law, being resembled to an Heart without affection, to an Eye without lust, and to a Mind without passion; a Treasurer, which keepeth for every man what he hath, and distributeth to every man what he ought to have. This benefit the Antient, though barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those which were taken for the first makers of Laws were honoured as gods, or, as the Sons of gods: and the rest, that made either additions, or corrections, were commended to all Posterity for men of no less vertue, and no less liberally beneficial to their Countreys, than the greatest and most prosperous Conquerors that ever governed them. The Israelites, the Lacedæmonians, and the Athenians, received their Laws from one; as the Israelites, from Moses; the Lacedæmonians, from Lycurgus; the Athenians, from Solon; the Romans, sometime from their first Kings, from their Decem viri, from their Senators, from their Lawyers, and from the people themselves: other from the Prince, Nobility, and People; as in England, France, and in other Christian Monarchies and Estates.

§. IV.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law and Right.

THE word Lex, or Law, is not always taken alike, but is diversly, and in an indifferent sence used. For, if we consider it at large, it may be understood for any rule prescribing a necessary mean, order, and method, for the attaining of an end. And so the Rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Laws. Or, it is taken for any private Ordinance of Superiours or Inferiours: for the commandments of Tyrants, which they cause to be observed by force, for their Decrees do also usurp that Title, according to the general acceptation of the word Law: of which Esay, Wo unto them that decree wicked Decrees, and write grievous things. Likewise, the word is used for the tumultuary resolutions of the People. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call Laws, though evil and insufficient: Mala lex est, quæ tumultariè posita est; It is an evil Law that is made tumultuously. So as all Ordinances, either good or evil, are called by the name of Laws. Esay 10. Ethic. l. 4. cap. 1.

The word Law is also taken for the moral habit of our mind, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to it self, as to their pattern and plat-form. And thus the Law of the flesh, which the Divines call legem fomitis, is to be understood. For every law is a kind of pattern of that which is done according unto it: in which sence, as elsewhere, this moral habit or disposition of the heart, is called the frame, or figmentum of the heart: so in S. Paul Gen. 6. 5. Item 8. 21.

to the Romans it is called a Law; But I see another law in my members, rebelling against the law of my mind, and leading me captive unto the law of sin. Again, the nature and inclinations of all creatures, are sometime called (a) laws, so farr as they agree with the reason of the Law eternal; as the law of a Lion, to be fierce or valiant.

(a) So Virgil, Continuo has leges æternaque fœdera certis imposuit natura locis; where also it is to be noted, that he joyns Leges and Fœdera together, as in the Scripture the Law is oftentimes called the covenant.

Also private contracts among Merchants, and other Trades-men, do often put on the name of laws. But law, commonly and properly, is taken for a right rule, prescribing a necessary mean, for the good of a Commonwealth, or Civil Community. The rest, to wit, the commandments of Tyrants, &c. which have not the common good for their end, but being leges iniquæ, are by Thomas called violentiæ magis quàm leges; rather compulsions than laws: And whatsoever is not just, S. Augustine doth not allow for laws, howsoever established: for he calls them iniqua hominum constituta, quæ nec jura dicenda, nec putanda sunt; The unjust constitutions of men, which are neither to be tearmed nor thought laws. For, saith Aristotle, Legalia justa sunt factiva, & conservativa fœlicitatis; Just laws are the workers and preservers of happiness: because by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: Yea, to life everlasting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the Law, saith Plato, is God, and his worship: Finis legis Deus & cultus ejus. Lex, or the Law, is so called by the Latines, à legendo, or, à ligando, of reading, or binding: Leges quia lectæ & ad populum latæ, saith Varro; For, after Laws were written and published, all men might read them, and behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymologie, à ligando, is no less agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called also a yoak, and a band: as confregerunt jugum, diruperunt vincula; they have broken the yoak, they have broken the bands. And in the second Psalm, Dirumpamus vincula eorum, & projiciamus à nobis funes ipsorum; Let us break their bands asunder, and let us cast away their cords from us.

Arist. Ethic. 5. c. 5.

Plato in Dial. 1. de Leg.

Hier. 5. 5.

Psal. 2.

The Covenant it is called, because of the conditional promises of God; and because of God's people's voluntary submission of themselves unto it: for which word the Septuagint, and the Epistle to the Hebrews, use the word διαθήκη, a Testament, or last Will: which name it hath, because it is not otherwise effectual for our salvation, but in respect of the death of the Testator; for without the death of the Testator, the Testament is of no force, as Heb. 9. 17. it is said, Testamentum in mortuis ratum est.

The Hebrews call the Law Thorah, of teaching, because every man is thereby taught his duty, both to God and Men. The Greeks call it Nomos, of distributing, because it distributeth to every man his own due; the power of the Law is the power of God: Justice being an attribute proper unto God himself. Imperium legis, imperium Dei est; The reign of the Law, is the reign of God.

Law in general is thus defined by the Philosophers; Lex est vitæ regula, præcipiens quæ sunt sequenda, & quæ fugienda; Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow, and what to shun: or, Lex est omnium divinarum & humanarum rerum Regina; Law is the Queen, or Princess of things both humane and divine. But this description is grounded upon the opinion of inevitable fate. Law is the very wisdom of Nature: the reason and understanding of the prudent; and the rule of right and wrong. For, as a right line is called, Index sui, & curvi, the demonstrance of it self, and of the crooked; so is the Law, the judge and measure of right and wrong.

M. Hooker calls the Law a directive rule to goodness of operation; and though Law, as touching the substance & essence, consists in understanding: Concludit tamen actum voluntatis; Yet it comprehends the act of our will. The word Jus is also diversly taken, as sometime for the matter of the Law, and for common right: sometime for the Law it self; as Jus civile, or Jus gentium. Isidore distinguisheth the two general words, Jus and Fas; whereof Jus, saith he, hath reference to men, Fas to God. Fas lex divina, Jus lex humana. Isid. Etym. To go over another man's field, is permitted by Gods Law, not by Man's; and therefore in a thing out of controversie, Virgil used both these words: as Fas & jura sinunt, God and men permit.

The word Jus, or Right, is derived or taken from the old Substantive Noun jussus, a bidding or commandment: or, perhaps, from the Greek Ζεύς, which is the name of Jupiter, or of the Latine Genitive case Jovis; because, as the Scripture speaks, the judgment is God's. For, as it is certain that jus jurandum came of Jovis-jurandum (for so we find it written in Nonius out of the antient, in which sence the Scripture calls it juramentum Jehovæ) so also we may say, that Jus came of Jovis, quia Jovis est; because as God is the Authour, and Pattern, and Maintainer of right, so also in his Vicegerents, the Magistrates, he is the Pronouncer and Executor of right. Of this Jus, the just are denominated, Justus à jure, and Justitia à justo; The Right gives name to the Righteous; and Justice takes her name from the Just.

§. V.

Of the definition of Laws, and of the Law eternal.

But, because Laws are manifold, and that every kind hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, first to divide and distinguish them. I mean, those sorts of Laws from whence all other particulars are drawn: leaving the individuals of humane laws to their infinite and horrible confusion.

The Law Eternal is thus defined by Thomas. Lex æterna est æternus divinæ sapientiæ conceptus, secundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipso præcognitarum; The eternal Law is the eternal conceit of God's Wisdom, as it is referred to the government of things foreknown by himself. Or, Lex æterna est summa atque æterna ratio divinæ sapientiæ: quatenus res omnes ad destinatos fines ita dirigit, ut illis juxta conditionem ipsarum modum aliquem necessitatis adferat; It is high and eternal reason of divine sapience: as it directeth all things in such sort to their proper ends, imposing a kind of necessity, according to their several natures, or conditions. Now, the difference lies in this: That as the same divine understanding directs all these to their proper ends; so it is called Providence: but, as it imposeth a necessity, according to the nature of all things which it directs, so it is called a Law.

Of this eternal Law, Cicero took knowledge, when in his Book of Laws, he wrote in this manner: Erat ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad recte faciendum impellens & à delicto avocans: quæ non tum incipit lex esse cum scripta est, sed tum orta est. Orta autem simul est cum mente divina: quamobrem lex vera atque princeps, apta ad jubendum & ad vetandum, ratio est recta à summi Jovis; That perfect reason and nature of things, incouraging or impelling to rightfull actions, and calling us back from evil, did not (saith he) then begin to be a law when it was written, but when it had being. Being and beginning it had together with divine understanding, and therefore a true Law, and a fit Princess to command and forbid, is the right reason of the most high God. This eternal Law (if we consider it in God, or as God) is always one and the same; the nature of God being most simple: but as it is referred to divers objects, so the reason of man finds it divers and manifold. It also seemeth one law in respect of things necessary, as the motions of the heavens, stability of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwise to things contingent: another law to men, another to other creatures, having life, and to all those that be inanimate.

By this eternal Law, all things are directed, as by the counsel and providence of God: from this Law, all laws are derived, as from the rule universal, and thereto referred, as the operation of the second to the first.

The eternal, and the divine Law, differ only in consideration; the eternal directing more largely: as well every creature, to their proper and natural ends, as it doth Man to his supernatural: but the divine Law to a supernatural end onely: the natural law is thence derived, but an effect of the eternal: as it were a stream from the fountain. Tho. & Aug.

The Law humane or temporal is also thence drawn: in that it hath the form of right reason; from which if it differ, it is then impositio iniqua, a wicked imposition; and onely borroweth the name of a law.

To this eternal Law all things are subjected, as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures, creatures, or things created; whether neceſſary or contingent, natural or moral, and humane. For the Law eternal runneth through all the univerſal, and therefore it is the Law alſo of things which are ſimple, natural and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praiſe God their Creator and Director: as Praiſe him all ye his Angels: praiſe him Sun and Moon, all bright Starrs: Heavens of heavens, for he hath eſtabliſhed them for ever and ever. He hath made an ordinance which ſhall not paſs: Praiſe ye the Lord from the earth ye Dragons and all Deeps; fire and hail, ſnow and vapours, ſtormy winds which execute his word: mountains and hills, fruitfull trees, and all Cedars; Beaſts and all Cattel, &c. Now, as the reaſonable creatures are by this eternal Law bound, by the glory and felicity propoſed unto them (beatitude being both the attractive, and the end) ſo all other natural things and creatures have in themſelves, and in their own natures, an obedience formal to it, without any proper intention, known cauſe, or end propoſed. For Beaſts are led by ſenſe, and natural inſtinct: thinks without life by their created form, or formal appetites, as that which is heavie to fall downward; things light to mount upward, &c. and fire to heat whatſoever is appoſed. This kind of working, the Ariſtotelians aſcribe to common nature; others to fate; a difference uſed in tearms only; it being no other than God's general providence: for, as it is truly ſaid of God, that he is omnia ſuper omnia: ſo are all things which appear in themſelves thence derived, there-under ſubjected, thence-from by his eternal Law and providence directed, even from the greateſt to the leaſt of his creatures, in heaven and in earth.

Pſal. 148.

The Schoolmen are very curious and ample in the conſideration of theſe laws: and in diſcourſe of the profit, and of the matter, and object of the eternal Law. But, as the profit is manifeſt in the good of all creatures, who have thence-from, either reaſon, ſenſe, vegetation, or appetitions, to conduct them: ſo is the object and matter of the Law, the whole creature. For, according to S. Auguſtine, Lex æterna eſt qua juſtum eſt, ut omnia ſint ordinatiſſima; The Law eternal is that, whereby it is juſt, that all things ſhould be diſpoſed in the beſt and goodlieſt order.

Laſtly, it is diſputed, whether the eternal law be immutable, yea or no? But the reſolution is, that it changeth not; for which S. Auguſtine uſeth a ſufficient argument in his firſt Book of Free-will, the ſixth Chapter. For the law of Moſes, which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to laſt untill the time of the Pædagogie of God's people, or Introduction to Chriſt, ſhould be expired; which time of expiration, ſome think our Saviour noted to be come, when on the Croſs he ſaid, Conſummatum eſt. But I rather think theſe words of our Saviour to have no other ſignification, than that now the Prophecie of their giving him Vinegar to drink was fulfilled. For ſo S. John expounds it, when he ſaith, v. 28. That Chriſt ſeeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, Ut conſummaretur Scriptura, That the Scripture in this alſo might be fulfilled, ſaid, I thirſt: though I deny not, but at the ſame time alſo the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremonial, and of ſo much of the judicial, as appertained peculiarly to the Jews, and agreeth not with the Law of the New Teſtament and Goſpel of Chriſt. For the immutable Law of God, though preſcribing things mutable, is not therfore changed in it ſelf; but the things preſcribed change according to this eternal ordinance, of which the Wiſdom of Solomon, and being one, ſhe can do all things, and remaining in her ſelf, reneweth all.

§. VI.

Of the Law of Nature.

OF the Law of Nature, as it is taken in general, I find no definition among the School-men; only as it is conſidered in Man, it is called The impreſſion of divine Light, and a participation of the eternal Law in the reaſonable creature. Lex Naturalis eſt impreſſio divini luminis in nobis, & participatio Legis æternæ in rationali creatura. Ulpian defines the natural Law to be the ſame which Nature hath taught all living creatures: Jus naturale eſt quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: and he afterward addeth, Jus iſtud non humani generis proprium, ſed omnium animalium quæ terra marique naſcuntur, avium quoque commune eſt; The Law of Nature is not proper to man alone, but the ſame is common to all living creatures, as well Birds, as to thoſe the Land and Sea produceth. But this definition is not general, but of the natural Law in things of life.

Aug. in Ep. ad Hil. 89. & in Evang. Joh. tract. 49.

Ulp. de juſtitia & jure l. 1. tit. 1.

The Law of Nature in general, I take to be that diſpoſition, inſtinct, and formal quality, which God in his eternal Providence hath given and imprinted in the nature of every creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is divinum lumen in men, inlightning our formal reaſon; ſo is it more than ſenſe in Beaſts; and more than vegetation in Plants. For it is not ſenſe alone in Beaſts, which teacheth them, at firſt ſight, and without experience perience or instruction, to flie from the enemies of their lives: seeing that Bulls and Horses appear unto the sense more fearfull and terrible, than the least kind of Doggs; and yet the Hare and Deer feedeth by the one, and flieth from the other; yea, though by them never seen before, and that as soon as they fall from their Dams. Neither is it sense, which hath taught other Beasts to provide for Winter, Birds to build their Nests high or low, according to the tempestuous or quiet seasons: or the Birds of India, to make their Nests on the smallest twigs which hang over Rivers, and not on any other part of the Tree, or elsewhere, to save their Eggs and young ones from the Monkies, and other Beasts, whose weight such a twig will not bear, and which would fear to fall into the Water. The instances in this kind are exceeding many which may be given. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of Plants, that some Trees, as the female of Palmitto, will not bear any fruit, except the male grow in sight. But this they do by that Law, which the infinite and unsearchable Wisdom of God had in all eternity provided for them, and for every nature created. In Man this Law is double, corrupt, and incorrupt: corrupt, where the reason of Man hath made its self subject, and a Vassal to Passions, and Affections Brutal: and incorrupt, where time and custom hath bred in Men a new nature, which also, as is aforesaid, is a kind of Law. For it was not by the Law of Nature incorrupt, which S. Augustine calleth the Law of Reason, but by a nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did antiently allow of theft: and that other Nations were by Law constrain'd to become Idolaters; that by the Laws of Lycurgus it was permitted to men to use one another's Wife, and to the women, to choose them others besides their Husband, to beget them with child: which Law in those parts hath lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

Supra sect. 4. cap. 1. loco. ad Rom. 7. 23.

Theod. l. 9. de curandis affect Græcorum.

Acosta.

The Scythians, and the People of both Indies, hold it lawfull to bury with them the best beloved Wives: as also they have many other customs remembred by G. Valentia, against nature and right reason.

And I know not from what authority it is, that these Laws some men avow to be natural: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile: to become faithless among the faithless: to provide for our selves by another man's destruction: that Injury is not done to him that is willing; to destroy those whom we fear, and the like. For taking the definition of natural laws, either out of S. Augustine, or Aquinas (the one calling it The impression of divine light; the other, the dictate, or sentence of practique reason) the same can teach us, or incline us to no other thing, than to the exercise of Justice and uprightness: and not to offer or perform any thing toward others, save that which we would be content should be offered or performed toward our selves. For, such is the Law of Nature to the Mind, as the Eye is to the Body; and that which, according to David, sheweth us good, that is, the observation of those things which lead us thereby to our last end; which is eternal life; though of themselves not sufficient without faith and grace.

Nemo jure naturæ cum alterius detrimento locupletior fieri debet.

Psal. 4.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the law, is, as aforesaid, the impression of God's divine light in men, and a participation of the law increated and eternal. For without any law written, the right reason and understanding, which God hath given us, are abilities within our selves, sufficient to give us knowledge of the good and evil, which by our gratitude to God and distribution of right to men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchase for our selves. For when the Gentiles (saith S. Paul) which have not the law, do by nature those things contained in the law: they having not the law, are a law unto themselves. Now, to love God, by whom we are, and to do the same right unto all men, which we desire should be done unto us, is an effect of the purest reason; in whose highest Turrets, the quiet of Conscience hath made her resting place and habitation; In arce altissima rationis quies habitat. Therefore the Gentiles (saith S. Paul) which shew the effects of the law written in their hearts, have their consciences for a witness of those effects: and the reprobate their thoughts to accuse them.

Rom. 2. 11.

Rom. 2. 11.

And it is most true, that whosoever is not a law unto himself (while he hopeth to abuse the World by the advantage of hypocrisie) worketh nothing else, but the betraying of his own Soul, by crafty unrighteousness, purchasing eternal perdition. For it helpeth us not to hide our corrupt hearts from the World's eye, seeing from him, who is an infinite eye, we cannot hide them: some Garlands we may gather in this May-game of the World, Sed flos ille, dum loquimur, arescit; Those flowers wither, while we discourse of their colours, or are in gathering them. That we should therefore inhabit and dwell within our selves, and become fearfull Witnesses of our secret evils, did that reverend Philosopher Pythagoras teach in this golden Precept: Nil turpe committas, neque coram aliis, neque neque tecum; maximè omnium verere teipſum; Commit nothing foul or diſhoneſt, ſaith he, neither to be known to others, nor to thine own heart: but above all men, reverence thine own Conſcience. And this may be a Precept of Nature and right Reaſon; by which law, men, and all creatures, and bodies, are inclined to thoſe operations, which are anſwerable to their own form; as Fire to give heat. Now, as the reaſonable mind is the form of Man, ſo is he aptly moved to thoſe things which his proper form preſenteth unto him; to wit, that which right Reaſon offereth; and the Acts of right Reaſon, are the acts of Vertue; and in the breach of the rules of this Reaſon, is a man leaſt excuſable: as being a reaſonable creature. For all elſe, both ſenſitive, growing, and inanimate, obey the Law which God impoſed on them at their firſt creation.

The Earth performeth her office, according to the Law of God in nature: for it bringeth forth the bud of the Herb, which ſeedeth ſeed, &c. and the Beaſt, which liveth thereon. He gave a law to the Seas, and commanded them to keep their bounds; which they obey. He made a decree for the Rain, and a way for the Lightning of the Thunders. He cauſed the Sun to move, and to give light, and to ſerve for ſigns, and for ſeaſons. Were theſe as rebellious as Man, for whoſe ſake they were created, or did they once break the Law of their natures and forms; the whole World would then periſh, and all return to their firſt Chaos, darkneſs, and confuſion.

Job c. 28.

By this natural Law, or law of humane Reaſon, did Cain perceive his own wickedneſs and offence, in the murther of Abel: for he not onely feared the diſpleaſure of God, but the revenge of men; it being written in his reaſon, that whatſoever he performed towards others, the ſame by others might be done unto him again. And that this judgment of well and evil doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternal Law, before the Law written, Moſes in the perſon of God witneſſeth, Gen. 4. If thou do well, ſhalt thou not be accepted? and if thou do not well, ſin lieth at thy door.

The School-men are large alſo in this Queſtion of the natural Law; the ſame being opened amply by Reinerius, Antonius, and Valentia. But it is not my purpoſe to write a Volume of this Subject.

But this Law which Thomas Aquinas calleth An act of Reaſon taken properly; and not a habit, as it is an evident natural judgment of practick reaſon; they divide into indemonſtrable, or needing no demonſtration (as that good is to be followed, and evil eſchewed) and demonſtrable, which is evidently proved out of higher and more univerſal propoſitions. Again, as it anſwereth the natural appetite, preſcribing things to be deſired as good, or to be avoided as evil (as of the firſt, to deſire to live, and to ſatisfie hunger, &c. and of the ſecond, to eſchew pains, ſorrow, and death) in this conſideration they divide it, according to the divers kinds of appetites that are in us. For in every man there are three ſorts of appetites, which anſwer the three degrees of natural Law. The firſt is, to be that which we are; in which is comprehended the deſire, both to live, and to preſerve our being and life, as alſo the deſire of iſſue, with care to provide for them: for the Father, after his death, lives in his children; and therefore the deſire of life comprehends the deſire of children. And to theſe appetites are referred the firſt indemonſtrable laws of Nature, for the moſt part. For it needs no proof, that all creatures ſhould deſire to be, to live, and to be defended, and to live in their iſſue, when they cannot in themſelves. And as Man is a Being, Ens or Res; ſo he doth deſire good, and ſhun evil. For it is common to all things, to deſire things agreeable to their own natures, which is, to deſire their own good. And ſo is good defined by Ariſtotle, to be that which all deſire. Which definition Baſil upon the 44. Pſalm approveth: Rectè quidem bonum definierunt, quod omnia expetunt; Rightly have ſome men defined good, or goodneſs, to be that which all things deſire.

Ethic. l. 1. cap. 1.

The ſecond kind of appetite, is of thoſe things which appertain unto us, as we have ſenſe. Whence, by the law of Nature, we deſire the delights of every ſenſe; but with ſuch moderation, as may neither glut us with ſatiety, nor hurt us with exceſs. For, as Senſe it ſelf is for the preſervation of life and being; ſo is it meet, even by the law of Nature, that the ſenſitive appetite ſhould not carry us to the deſtruction, either of our life or being. And although (ſeeing both theſe kinds of appetites are in Beaſts) we may well ſay, that Nature hath given divers laws unto them: In which ſenſe the Civilians define natural Right, or Jus naturale, to be the ſame which Nature hath taught all living creatures: Yet the School-men admit not, that the inſtincts of Beaſts can properly be called a law, but onely a Jus, or Right, which is the matter, and aim of every law. For ſo they diſtinguiſh it; where Ulpian affirmeth, that Jus naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all living creatures. In this place (ſaith Valentia) Jus is not to be taken for a law, but for the matter of the law. And yet where Ulpian alſo diſtinguiſheth the right belonging to living creatures in general, from the right belonging to men; calling the one Jus Naturæ, the other Jus Gentium: the Divines underſtand the law of Nature more largely, that is, for all evident dictates, precepts, or biddings of divine reaſon, both in Beaſts and Men; and reſtrain the law of Nations to a kind of humane right.

for

The third appetite is of thoſe things which appertain properly to Man, as he is a living creature reaſonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our ſelves: and the laws of this appetite are the commandments of our Religion.

Now, although there are many other branches and diviſions of this law of Nature anſwering the diviſion of matter, which it preſcribeth, and as manifold, as the moral actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth; yet is the law of Nature but one law, according to Aquinas: firſt, becauſe it hath one fountain or root in the natural or motive faculty, which is but one, ſtirring up to good, and declining the contrary: ſecondly, becauſe all is contained in that general natural precept, That good is to be followed, and ill avoided: and thirdly, becauſe all the parts are reduced to one and the ſame laſt end.

That this law of Nature binds all creatures, it is manifeſt; and chiefly Man; becauſe he is endued with reaſon: in whom as reaſon groweth, ſo this band of obſerving the law of Nature increaſeth; Poſtquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc fit quod ſcriptum eſt, Adveniente mandato, peccatum revixit; When reaſon grew to perfection, then it came to paſs, which was written by S. Paul, When the commandment came, ſin revived. Neither is it a ſmall warrant for this law of Nature, when thoſe that break the ſame, are ſaid by S. Paul, To be delivered over into a reprobate ſenſe (or mind) to do thoſe things which are not convenient: And again, that their conſciences bear witneſs, and their thoughts accuſe them. For, though this law of Nature ſtretch not to every particular; as to command faſting, and the like; yet it commandeth in general all good, and whatſoever is agreeable to right and reaſon. And therefore ſaid Damaſcene; Homines facti ſunt mali, declinando in id quod contra naturam eſt; Men (ſaith he) are made evil, by declining unto that which is contrary to Nature: And S. Auguſtine, Omne vitium naturæ nocet, ac per hoc contra naturam eſt; Every vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrary unto it.

Neither yet are the rules of this law of Nature ſo ſtreight, but that they ſuffer exceptions in ſome particulars. For, whereas by this law, all men are born Lords of the Earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of portions, according to unequal merit: by taking from the evil, and giving to the good; and by permitting and commanding that all men ſhall enjoy the fruits of their labours to themſelves: according to the rules of Juſtice and Equity.

And though the law of Nature command, that all things be reſtored which are left in truſt, yet in ſome caſes, this her law ſhe ſuffereth to be broken: as to deny a mad man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while he was ſober. But the Univerſal principles can no more be changed, than the decrees of God are alterable: who, according to S. Paul, abideth faithfull, and cannot deny himſelf. 2 Tim. 2.

§. VII.

Of the written Law of God.

AFter the Eternal, and Natural, the law Poſitive or impoſed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather an explication of the former, hath two kinds; Divine, and Humane. Again, the Divine poſitive law is double; the Old, and New: The Old was given unto Moſes in Mount Sinai, or Horeb, at ſuch time as the World had ſtood 2513. whole years: and in the 67. day of this year, when as Aſcatades, or Aſcades governed the Aſſyrians, Marathus the Sycionians, Triopus the Argives, Cecrops Attica, and Acherres Egypt: to wit, after the promiſe to Abraham, 430. years. And this, it ſeemes, was the firſt written law which the World received. For the very word Nomos, ſignifying a law, was not then, nor long after, invented by the Græcians; no, not in Homer's time, who lived after the fall of Troy 80. years at leaſt; and Troy it ſelf was caſt down 335. years, after Moſes led Iſrael out of Egypt. This law, it pleaſed God to engrave in Stone, that it might remain a laſting Book of his expreſſed Will in the Church: and that the Prieſts and People might have whereof to meditate, till the coming of Chriſt: and that ſo theſe Children of Iſrael, though bred among an Idolatrous People in Egypt, might be without excuſe, the ſlight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

Aug. de Civit. Dei, l. 1

The reaſon known to us, why this law was not written before, is, that when the People were few, and their lives long, the Elders of Families might eaſily, without any written law, inſtruct their own Children; and yet, as they increaſed, ſo doubtleſs they had, beſides the law of Nature, many precepts from God, before before the law written. But now at length, for as much as the law of Nature did not define all kinds of good, and evil; nor condemn every sin in particular: nor sufficiently terrifie the consciences of offenders; nor so expound divine Worship, as for those afterages was required, who gave every day less authority than other to the natural law; In these respects it was necessary, that the law should be written, and set before the eyes of all men; which before, they might, but would not, read in their own consciences. The School-men, and the Fathers before them, inlarge the causes and necessity, why the law was written; whereof these are the chiefest.

The first, for restraining of sin, directly grounded upon this place of David, The law of the Lord is undefiled, converting Souls: The testimonies of the Lord are faithful, giving wisdom to children. For the humane law, saith S. Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away somthing seeming necessary, and hinder common profit; but the divine law written, forbiddeth every evil, and therefore, by David, it is called undefiled.

Secondly, it serveth for the direction of our minds. For the laws of men can onely take knowledg of outward actions, but not of internal motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that we be no less clean in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words converting our Souls, added by David: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists. Actiones hominum nullæ essent, nisi prius in mente dicerentur; The actions of men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceived in the mind.

Thirdly, it leadeth us to the knowledg of truth, which by reason of diversity of Opinion, and difference of peculiar laws among sundry Nations, we cannot be assured of; but the Law of GOD bindeth all men, and is without errour; and therefore also said David, That the testimony of the Law of God is faithful; giving wisdom to children.

§. VIII.

Of the unwritten Law of God, given to the Patriarchs by Tradition.

NOw, that in all this long tract of Time, betweeen the Creation and the written Law, the World and People of God were left altogether to the law of Reason and Nature, it doth not appear. For the Patriarchs of the first Age received many Precepts from God himself, and whatsoever was first imposed by Adam, the same was observed by Seth, who instructed Enos; from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and Moses. Yea, many particular commandments afterward written, were formerly imposed and delivered over by tradition; which kind of teaching the Jews afterward called Cabala, or Receptio; Precepts received from the mouth of their Priests and Elders; to which the Jews after the law written, added the interpretation of secret Mysteries, reserved in the bosoms of their Priests, and unlawful to be uttered to the People. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeed the divine Law revealed to the Patriarchs, and from them delivered to the Posterity, when as yet it was unwritten. The commandments which God gave unto Adam in the beginning, were, that he should impose names to all Beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of understanding, they were sufficiently known. For, finding the reason of his own name Adam, or Adamah, Earth, or red clay, he gave other names significant, not only to Beasts, but to his Children and Nephews, which afterward his issues imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the Church, or rather one given in recompence for Abel that was slain; and Enosh signifieth Man, or miserable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the Ground, and to live by the labour thereof: God also gave him the choice of all fruits, but the forbidden; and in Adam also was Marriage first instituted, all men thence-after being commanded to co-habit with their Wives, rather than with their Father or Mother.

That murther and cruelty was also forbidden, both before the Law written, and before the Flood it self, it is manifest. God himself making it appear, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of Mankind by the general Flood. For God said unto Noah, An end of all Flesh is come before me; for the Earth is filled with cruelty through them: and behold, I will destroy them from the Earth.* That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be unknown to all that perished: God's Mercy and Justice interposing between the untaught and Revenge. This Commandment God repeated to Noah, after the Waters were dried up from the Earth: Whoso sheddeth Man's Blood, by Man shall his Blood be shed; for in the Image of God hath He made Man.

Also the law of honouring and reverence-

* The common reading is cum terra: but God did not destroy the earth: and why may not this Prepositition in this place have the same force, which it hath, according to Junius? Gen. 4. 1. Item 44. 4. & Deut. 34. 1. especially, seeing these words are but a repetition of that which is said, ver 7. *Delebo hominem de superficie terræ. ing our Parents, was obſerved among the faithful, and the contrary puniſhed by the Father's curſe: as, Curſed be Canaan, a ſervant of ſervants ſhall he be unto his brethren. Again, we find that the unnatural ſin of the Sodomite was puniſhed in the higheſt degree, as with fire from Heaven. The ſin of Adultery and Raviſhment, was before the Law no leſs deteſted than the reſt, as appeareth by that revenge taken for Dina's forcing: and by the judgment which Juda gave againſt Tamar, That ſhe ſhould be burnt; and by the repentance of Pharaoh and Abimelech, againſt whom this ſentence was pronounced, Thou art but dead, becauſe of the woman which thou haſt taken; for ſhe is a man's Wife. To theſe we may add the ordinance of Sacrifice, of diſtinction of clean and unclean Beaſts, of Circumciſion, of the brother to raiſe up ſeed to his brother that left a Widow childleſs, and divers other conſtitutions, partly Moral, and partly Ceremonial, which being delivered before the written Law were after by it confirmed. So that this Divine Law impoſed, of which the Law of Moſes containeth that which is called, The Old Teſtament, may be ſaid, not only to have been written in the hearts of men, before it was engraven in ſtone, but alſo in ſubſtance to have been given in Precept to the Patriarchs. For, as S. Paul witneſſeth of himſelf, I knew not ſin, but by the Law; ſo ever the Law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed. It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by ſome kind of unwritten Law; the Angels intuitively; Men, by reaſon; Beaſts by ſenſe and inſtinct, without diſcourſe; Plants by their vegetative powers; and things Inanimate, by their neceſſary motions, without ſenſe or perception.

Of the Moral, Judicial, and Ceremonial Law, with a note prefixed, how the Scripture ſpeaketh not alway in one ſence, when it nameth the Law of Moſes.

NOw, as the word (Law) in general, as is aforeſaid, hath divers ſignifications, and is taken for all doctrin which doth preſcribe and reſtrain; ſo the Law, called the Law of Moſes in particular, is taken by S. Paul diverſly: as ſometime for the Old Teſtament; as, Rom. 3 19 Now we know, that whatſoever the Law ſaith, it ſaith to them which are under the Law.

When it is oppoſed, or differenced from the Prophets and Pſalms, it is there taken for the five Books of Moſes. For ſo S. Luke hath diſtinguiſhed them; as, All muſt be fulfilled which are written of me in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Pſalms. Luke 24. 44.

When it is oppoſed to the Goſpel, then it is taken for the Law Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is juſtified by Faith, without the works of the Law. Rom. 3. 28.

When it is oppoſed to Grace, it ſignifieth the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the Law, and Summum Jus: as, For ye are not under the law, but under grace. Rom. 6. 4. Gal. 3. 18.

When it is oppoſed to the Truth, namely, where the Ceremonies or Signs are taken for the things ſignified; as the Sacrifice for Chriſt, and the like; then it ſignifieth but ſhadows and figures; as, The law was given by Moſes, but grace and truth came by Jeſus Chriſt. John 1. 17.

Laſtly, when it is oppoſed to the time of Chriſt's coming, it ſignifieth the whole policy of the Jews Common-wealth; as, Before Faith came, we were kept under the law, &c. Or the law of the Order and Inſtitution of the Aaronical Prieſthood; as, All the Prophets & the law, or the Prieſts, propheſied unto John. And if the Prieſthood be changed, the Law alſo, to wit, of the Prieſthood, muſt needs be changed. Gal 3. 23. Luc. 16 6. Heb. 7. 11. & 10. 1.

The word (Law) is ſometime alſo taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Intereſt, Authority, and Empire, or for conſtraining force; as, The law of the Spirit of life, the law or the force of ſin and death, the enforcements of concupiſcence, &c. Rom. 8. 2. Rom. 7 23.

But the Written Law of Moſes, or the law of the Old Teſtament, of which we now ſpeak, is thus defined. The law is a doctrine, which was firſt put into the minds of men by God, and afterwards written by Moſes, or by him repeated, commanding Holineſs and Juſtice, promiſing eternal life conditionally, that is, to the obſervers of the Law, and threatning Death to thoſe which break the Law in the leaſt. For, according to S. James, Whoſoever ſhall keep the whole, and fail in one point, is guilty of all. The definition uſed by the Schole-men, in which both the Old and New Law are comprehended, is thus given: Lex divina eſt divinum decretum, hominibus præſcribens modum neceſſarium, ut aptè pervenire poſſint ad ſupernaturalem beatitudinem, quæ eſt ultimus humanæ vitæ finis; the divine Law (ſay they) is the decree of God, preſcribing unto men a neceſſary mean, whereby they may aptly attain ſupernatural beatitude, which is the laſt end of man's life. James 2. 10.

The Law of Moſes hath three parts: Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial. The Moral part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that evil to be avoided, in particu-particular; as alſo it declareth, for whoſe ſake it is to be done; as, Do this, for I am the Lord; whereas the law of Nature commands it but in general. Again, the Moral law entreateth of vertue and goodneſs; the Ceremonial of divine ſervice, and of holineſs; (for external worſhip, and the order of hallowing our ſelves unto God, is called Ceremony) and the Judicial teacheth the particular government, fit for the Common-wealth of the Jews, and preſcribeth orders for juſtice and equity. And therefore was it ſaid of

Rom. 7. 12. S. Paul, The Commandment is juſt, holy, and good: juſt, or juſtice being referred to the Judicial: holy, or holineſs to the Ceremonial; good, or honeſt to the Moral. The Judicial part is touching the government of the Common-wealth of the Jews, in which many things muſt needs be proper to that eſtate, as ſuch as were inſtituted either in reſpect of place or perſons.

The Ceremonial is divided into four parts, according to the four kinds of things of which it ſpeaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, holy things, Sacraments, and Obſervances. To Sacrifices belong Beaſts, and the Fruits of the earth; to holy things the Tabernacle, Temple, Veſſels, Altars, and the like; to Sacraments, Circumciſion, the Paſſover, and ſuch like. For Obſervances, they conſiſted either in prohibition of certain meats, as not to eat the bloud and fat of Beaſts; or in ſome other outward things, as in waſhings, purifyings, anointings, and attire, as not to wear mix'd Garments of Linnen and Woollen: as alſo it prohibiteth other unnatural and unproper commixtion; as, Thou ſhalt not yoak together in a Plough, an Ox and an Aſs, or caſt mingled ſeed in one field. It alſo exhorteth to natural compaſſion, and forbiddeth cruelty, even to Beaſts, Birds, and Plants, whereby the creatures of God might be deſtroyed without any profit to man. For ſo ſome referr theſe Precepts, Thou ſhalt not kill the Bird ſitting on her Neſt, nor beat down the Buds of the Tree, nor muzzle the labouring Ox, and the like, to the Ceremonial Law.

Neither is there any of theſe three parts of the law of Moſes, but it hath as yet in ſome reſpect the ſame power which it had before the coming of Chriſt. For the Moral liveth ſtill, and is not abrogated or taken away; ſaving in the ability of juſtifying or condemning; for therein are we commanded to love and worſhip God: and to uſe charity one towards another; which for ever ſhall be required at our hands. Therein alſo are we in particular directed, how this ought to be done; which power of directing by ſpecial Rules and Precepts of life, it retaineth ſtill. For theſe things alſo are commanded in both Teſtaments to be obſerved: though principally for fear of God in the one, and for the love of God in the other.

The Ceremonial alſo lived in the things which it fore-ſignified. For the ſhadow is not deſtroyed, but perfected, when the body it ſelf is repreſented to us. Beſides, it ſtill liveth, in that it giveth both inſtruction and teſtimony of Chriſt, and in that it giveth direction to the Church, for ſome Ceremonies and Types of holy ſignification, which are ſtill expedient; although in a farr fewer number than before Chriſt's coming, and in a farr leſs degree of neceſſity.

Laſtly, the Judicial liveth in ſubſtance, and concerning the end, and the natural and univerſal equity thereof.

But the Moral faileth in the point of juſtification, the Ceremonial as touching the uſe and external obſervation (becauſe Chriſt himſelf is come, of whom the Ceremonies were ſigns and ſhadows) and the Judicial is taken away, as far forth as it was peculiar to the Jews Common-weal and Policy.

§. X.

A Propoſal of nine other points to be conſidered, with a touch of the five firſt.

AS for that which remaineth in general conſideration of the divine Written Law, it may in effect be reduced into theſe nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the Law.
2. The Majeſty of the Law-giver.
3. The property and peculiarity of the People receiving it.
4. The conveniency of the time in which it was given.
5. The efficacy and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the Old and New Teſtament.
7. The end and uſe of the Law.
8. The ſence and underſtanding of the Law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignity of the Law is ſufficiently proved by S. Paul, in theſe words: Wherefore the Law is holy, and the Commandment is holy, and juſt, and good: which three attributes are referred, as aforeſaid, to the Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial.

2. The Majeſty of the Law-giver is approved in all his creatures; who, as he hath given all things their lives and beings, ſo he only gave the Law, who could onely give the end and reward promised, to wit, the salvation of Mankind; but he gave it not to Moses immediately, but by the ministery of Angels, as it is said: And the Law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediator: And in the Acts, He gave the Law by the Ordinance of Angels.

Gal. 3 19.

3. The Propriety and Peculiarity of the People receiving the Law, is in three respects. First, in that they were prepared. Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and dissevered. Thirdly, in that they were the Children of the Promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the knowledg of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and severed they were, because of God's choice and election. Children of the Promise they were, for the Promise was made by God unto Abraham and his seed; not unto his seeds, as to Esau and Jacob, but to his seed, as to Jacob or Israel singularly, of whom Christ. Now, to Abraham and his seed was the Promise made; he saith not, to the seeds, as speaking of many, but, to thy seed, as of one, which is Christ.

Gal. 3 6.

4. The conveniency of the time, in which it was given, is noted by S. Augustine; that it was about the middle time, between the Law of Nature and Grace: the Law of Nature continued from Adam to Moses: the Law written in the commandments received by Moses in the Worlds year, 2514. continued to the Baptism of John; from which time, began the Law of Grace, which shall continue to the worlds end. Other reasons for the conveniency are formerly given.

5. The fifth consideration is of the efficacy of this Law, the same being a disposition to, or sign of, our Justification; but not by it self sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousness in moral precepts. For through the Passion of Christ were sins forgiven, who taketh away the sins of the World: and therefore S. Paul calleth the Rudiments of the Law, beggarly and weak; beggarly, as containing no Grace, weak, as not able to forgive and justifie. The bloud of Goats and Bulls, and the Ashes of an Heifer could onely cleanse the body; but they were figures of Christ's bloud, which doth cleanse the inward Soul. For if the Law could justifie, then Christ died in vain.

Gal. 4.

Gal. 8.

§. XI.

Of the sixth Point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the old and new Testament.

THe old and new Testament differ in name, and in the mean and way proposed for attaining to salvation; as the old by Works, the new by Grace; but in the thing it self, or object and remote end, they agree; which is, mans happiness and salvation.

The old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witness of Gods Will, was called the old, because it preceded the new Testament; which is an explication of the old: from which the new taketh witness. Yet the new is of more excellency, in that it doth more lively express, and openly and directly delineate, the ways of our redemption. It is also called the old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated: In that he saith, the New Testament, he hath abrogated the Old. For the old Law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and delivered with wonderfull miracles, yet was it constituted in a policy perishable; but the new was given in a promise of an everlasting Kingdom, and therefore called in the Apocalyps, a Testament and Gospel for ever during.

Heb. 8, 13.

The old Testament is called the Law, because the first and chief part is of the Law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalms are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The new Testament is called the Gospel, because the first and chief part thereof, is the glad tidings of our Redemption: the other Books, as the Epistles, or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts or Story of the Apostles, are plentiful Interpreters thereof: The word Evangelion, signifying a joyful, happy, and prosperous message, or (as Homer used it) the reward given to the Messenger bringing joyful news. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing success, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations. First, for glad tidings in general, as in Esay 52. v. 7. concerning peace. Secondly, by an excellency it is restrained, to signifie that most joyful message of Salvation, as in Luke 2. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the History of Christ; and so we understand the four Gospels.

Acts 1.

Lastly, for the preaching and divulging the Doctrine of Christ, as 1 Cor. 9. 14. and 2 Cor. 8. 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I think, as they are divided in Volumes) is by Danæus comprised in these four.

In their Author.
In the substance of the Covenant, or things promised.
In the foundation, to wit, Christ.
In the Effects, that is, in Righteousness and Justification.

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament ment and will of God in ſubſtance of doctrine. For as there was ever one Church, ſo was there one Covenant and Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old law doth point at Chriſt, ſo doth the new Law teach Chriſt; the old propoſing him as to come, the new as already come; one and the ſame thing being promiſed in both; both tending to one and the ſame end, even the ſalvation of our Souls; which, according to S. Peter, is the end of our Faith. For although it be ſaid, that Moſes did promiſe by obſerving the law, an earthly kingdom, a land flowing with Milk and Honey, the propagation of children, and other worldly bleſſings; yet all theſe were but figures to teach, and pledges to aſſure the Fathers of thoſe ſpiritual bleſſings by Chriſt; for by the earthly, he raiſed their minds to the hope of heavenly. And the Fathers, notwithſtanding theſe worldly goods, did yet acknowledg themſelves ſtrangers, and pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Hieruſalem; according to this place of the Hebrews; All theſe died in faith, and received not the promiſes, but ſaw them afar off, and believed them; confeſſing that they were ſtrangers and pilgrims on the earth. To which purpoſe alſo S. Auguſtine, Omnino pauci veterem legem intelligunt, non attendentes per promiſſa terrena, æterna promitti; Few (ſaith he) do underſtand the old law; not attending that by things earthly, eternal are promiſed. And S. Hierom; Noluit Deus paſcere Judæos more pecorum corporalibus donis opibuſque, ut Judæi ſomniant; God would not feed the Jews as beaſts with corporal gifts and riches, as themſelves dream. And this may be gathered out of God's own words, Ego ſum Deus tuus; & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God, and I will be your God. For the words, I wil be your God, prove that it was not for the preſent, or for periſhable things, that God gave them this promiſe, but in reſpect of the future; to wit, the ſafety of their Souls. For as God created both Body and Soul, ſo hath he of his goodneſs, not left the better part uncared for, which liveth ever.

Cap 11. v. 13.

Lib. de Civit. Dei, 18. c. 15.

In Sophon. c. 3. v. 9.

The agreement between the old and new Teſtament in ſubſtance, inferrs alſo the agreement in foundation. For Chriſt is called the foundation of the law laid by the Apoſtles and Prophets; in whom all the promiſes of God in the old and new, are aſſured: the Fathers having eaten the ſame ſpiritual food, which we eat in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects, is, in that the knowledg of our ſin and miſery, which is taught us by the law, maketh way, and, as it were, ſerveth in ſubordination to the Goſpel, the proper effects wereof are mercy and ſalvation; to which the law ſerving as an introduction (for to thoſe which acknowledg their ſin and miſery, God ſheweth his mercy and ſalvation) may be ſaid to agree with the Goſpel in the effect. For otherwiſe, if we ſever the law from ſubordination to the Goſpel, the effects are very different; the one ſheweth the way of righteouſneſs by works, the other by faith; the law woundeth, the Goſpel healeth; the Law terrifieth, the Goſpel allureth; Moſes accuſeth, Chriſt defendeth; Moſes condemneth, Chriſt pardoneth. The old reſtrained the hand, the new, the mind. Data eſt lex quæ non ſanaret (ſaith S. Auguſtine) ſed quæ ægrotantes probaret; The law was given, not to help, but to diſcover ſickneſs: and S. Chryſoſtom; Data eſt lex, ut ſe homo inveniret; non ut morbus ſanaretur, ſed ut medicus quæreretur; The law was given, that man might find and know his own imperfection; not that his diſeaſe was thereby holpen, but that he might then ſeek out the Phyſician. For Chriſt came to ſave the World, which the Law had condemned. And as Moſes was but a Servant, and Chriſt a Son; ſo the greateſt benefit was reſerved to be brought, as by the worthieſt perſon, ſaith Cyril; for this law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope.

Homil. ad Rem.

Heb. 7.

§. XII.

Of the reſt of the points propoſed.

THe ſeventh Conſideration is of the end, and uſe of the Law; which is, to bring us to Chriſt; for finding no righteouſneſs in our own works, we muſt ſeek it in ſome other. But this is the laſt, and remote, and utmoſt end; the next and proper end of the Law, is to preſcribe righteouſneſs, and to exact abſolute and perfect obedience to God. Curſed is he that continueth not in all the things of this Law.

Lev. 18. 5.

The ſecond end of the Law, is, to render us inexcuſable before God; who knowing ſo perfect a Law, do not keep it; the Law requiring a perfect and entire, not a broken or half obedience; but both inward and outward righteouſneſs, and performance of duty to God and Men.

The the third and chief end of the law, is, as hath been ſaid, to ſend us to Chriſt, and his Grace, being in our ſelves condemned and loſt. For the law was delivered with thunder, and with a moſt violent and fearfull tempeſt, threatning eternal death.

The fourth end of the law was to deſign, and preſerve, the place of the Church and true People of God; and to hold men in one Diſcipline, and aw, till the coming of Chriſt;

Chriſt; after whom the Church was to be diſperſed over the whole World.

Theſe be the ends of the Moral Law. The end and uſe of the Ceremonial law, is to confirm the truth of Chriſt, and the new Teſtament. The uſe of the Judicial, to teach us natural equity and right, whereto we muſt conform our ſelves.

The ſence and underſtanding of the law is double, literal, and ſpiritual; by the literal, we are taught the worſhip and ſervice of God; by the ſpiritual, the figures and myſtical fore-ſpeakings of Chriſt.

Gen. 49 10. The Scepter ſhall not depart from Judah, nor a Law-giver from between his feet, until Shila come.

Laſtly, for the durance or continuance of the Law, the ſame had being until the Paſſion of Chriſt; before which time, and while Chriſt taught in the World, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true ſacrifice was offered upon the Altar of the Croſs, then the Jewiſh ſacrifices and ceremonies, which were Types and Figures of Chriſt (Chriſt being the Body of thoſe ſhadows) ceaſed to bind the conſcience any longer; the myſterie of our Redemption being now by Chriſt, and in him, finiſhed. In token whereof the veil of the Temple rent aſunder; noting that the ceremonial veils and ſhadows were now to be removed, not that the moral law of the Commandments was hereby aboliſhed, or weakned at all; otherwiſe than that it had not power to condemn according to the Jewiſh doctrine, as aforeſaid. For the obſerving of the law was by Chriſt himſelf ſeverely commanded; our love towards God being thereby to be witneſſed. And herein David ſo much rejoiced, as he preferred the obſervation of the law before all that the World could yield. In via teſtimoniorum tuorum delectatus ſum, ſicut in omnibus divitiis; I have been delighted in thy law, as in all manner of riches: And again, The law of thy mouth is good for me above thouſands of gold and ſilver. This is the love of God (ſaith S. John) that we keep his commandment. And that there is no excuſe for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himſelf in Deuteronomy witneſſeth. This Commandment (ſaith he) which I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither is it farr off. It is not in heaven, that thou ſhouldeſt ſay, Who ſhall go up for us to heaven, and bring it us, and cauſe us to hear it, that we may do it? Neither is it beyond the Sea, that thou ſhouldeſt ſay Who ſhall go over the Sea for us, and bring it us? &c. but the word is very near unto thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart for to do it. Behold (ſaith Moſes) I have ſet before thee this day life and death, good and evil, in that I command thee this day, to love the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and to keep his Commandments, and his Ordinances, and his Laws, that thou mayſt live, &c. Neither is it ſaid in vain in S. Matthew: Si vis ad vitam ingredi, ſerva mandata; If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments; and in S. John, Scio quia mandatum ejus vita æterna eſt; I know that his Commandment is life everlaſting. And if this be the charity of God, or of Men towards God, as S. John hath taught, to wit, that we keep his Commandments; certainly, he is but a lyar, that profeſſeth to love God, and neglecteth to obſerve the word of his Will, with all his Power. And, though I confeſs it not in mans ability, without the ſpecial grace of God, to fulfil the law (Chriſt only as man excepted) yet, if we rightly conſider the merciful care which God had of his people in thoſe his Commandments, we ſhall find in our ſelves, how we borrow liberty, and rather let ſlip our affections, and voluntarily looſen them from the chains of obedience, to which the Word of God, and Divine Reaſon hath faſtened them, than that we are excuſable by thoſe difficulties and impoſſibilities, which our mind (greedy of liberty) propoſeth to it ſelf. For, this is the love of God, that we keep his Commandments, and his Commandments are not grievous, 1 Joh. 5. 12. and if we examine every Precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the ballance of our conſciences; it is not hard for any man to judg, by what eaſie perſuaſions, we ſteal away from our own power, as unwilling to uſe it againſt our pleaſing deſires.

§. XIII.

Of the ſeveral Commandments of the Decalogue; and that the difficulty is not in reſpect of the Commandments, but by our default.

FOr by the firſt, we are commanded to acknowledg, ſerve, and love one God. Now, whereby are we enticed to the breach of this Precept? ſeeing every reaſonable man may conceive and know, that an Infinite power cannot be divided into many infinities; and that it is of neceſſity, that by this Almighty Unity, all things have been cauſed, and are continued. And if brute Beaſts had this knowledg of their Creator, and how in his Providence he hath alſo provided for every of them, Which giveth to Beaſts their food, &c. there is no doubt, but they would alſo ſerve and love him onely. Pſal. 149. 9

The ſecond Precept is the forbidding of Idolatry, and worſhip of Images; the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the invention of an ill intent in the beginning, ſeeing this is generally true; Omnia mala exempla bonis initiis orta ſunt; All ill examples did ſpring and ariſe from good beginnings. For their firſt erection was to keep the memory of men famous for their vertue; until (ſaith Lactantius) the Devil crept into them, and (having blotted out the firſt intent) working in weak and ignorant Souls, changed the nature of the one, and the reaſon of the other, to ſerve himſelf thereby. For what reaſonable man, if he be not forſaken of God, will call on thoſe blind, deaf, dumb, and dead ſtocks, more worthleſs than the moſt worthleſs of thoſe, that having life and reaſon, implore their help, which have neither; yea, of more vile price and baſer, than the baſeſt of Beaſts, who have ſenſe and eſtimation? For what do we thereby (ſaith the Wiſdom of Solomon) but call to the weak for help, pray to the dead for life, require aid of him that hath no experience, aſſiſtance in our journeys of him that cannot go, and ſucceſs in our affairs of him that hath no power? And whether the Idolater, or the Block to which he prayeth, be more ſenſleſs, David maketh a doubt. For (ſaith he) they that make them are like unto them, and ſo are all the reſt that truſt in them.

Wiſd. 13. v. 19.

Pſal. 35. 18.

The branch of the third Commandment, is neither perſuaded by worldly pleaſure, nor worldly profit; the two greateſt inchanters of mortal men. No, we are no way allured to this horrible diſdain of God, unleſs the hate of good men, and Gods curſe, be accounted an advantage. For, as our corrupteſt nature gives us nothing towards it, ſo can it ſatisfie no one appetite, except everlaſting ſorrow, and Hell dwell in our deſire. And therefore this ſtrange cuſtom hath the Devil brought up among men, without all ſubtilty of argument, or cunning perſuaſion, taking thereby the greateſt and moſt ſcornful advantage over us. For ſlaughter ſatisfieth hatred, Theft gives ſatisfaction to need, Adultery to luſt, Oppreſſion to covetouſneſs; but this contemptuous offence of blaſphemy, and the irreverent abuſe of God's name, as it giveth no help to any of our worldly affections, ſo the moſt ſalvage Nations of the World do not uſe it.

The fourth Commandment, to keep the Sabbath day holy, hath neither pain, burthen, nor inconvenience. For it giveth reſt to the labourer, and conſolation to their Maſters. And, that this law was impoſed on man for his benefit, Moſes teacheth in the reaſon of the law: as in Exod. 23. 12. And in the ſeventh day thou ſhalt reſt, that thine Ox, and thine Aſs may reſt, and the Son of thy Maid, and the Stranger may be refreſhed.

The firſt of the ſecond Table, to honor our Parents, with whom we are one and the ſame, is a gratitude which Nature it ſelf hath taught us towards them, who, after God, gave us life and being, have begotten us, and born us, cheriſhed us in our weak and helpleſs infancy, and beſtowed on us the harveſt and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore, in the Temporal and Judicial Ordinances, curſing of Parents, or the offering them violence, was made death.

The next is, That thou ſhalt not Murther, that is, Thou ſhalt not do the acts following the affections of hatred. For the Law of God, and after it, our own laws, and, in effect, the law of all Nations, have made difference between ſlaughter caſual, and furious. Affectio enim tua (ſaith Bracton) imponit nomen operi tuo; It is the affection and will that makes the work ſuch as it is. And certainly, whoſoever cannot forbear to commit Murther, hath neither the grace of God, nor any uſe of his own will.

The third of the ſecond Table, commands us from Adultery. Now, if the preſervation of Virginity have been poſſible for thouſands of Men and Women, who in all Ages have maſtered their fleſhly deſires, and have returned chaſte to their Grave: It cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbear the diſhonour and injury, which we offer to others by ſuch a violation, ſeeing Marriage is permitted by the Laws of God and men, to all that affect it. And there is no man living, whom the deſire of beauty and form hath ſo conſtrained, but he might with eaſe forbear the proſecution of this ill, did not himſelf give ſuck to this Infant, and nouriſh warmth, till it grow to ſtrong heat, heat till it turn to fire, and fire to flame.

Nuptiæ replent terram, Virginitas Paradiſum.

The fourth of the ſecond Table, is, That we ſhall not ſteal. And, if that kind of violent robbery had been uſed in Moſes time, which many Ruffians practiſe now a-days in England, and, to the diſhonour of our Nation, more in England, than in any Region of the World among Chriſtians; out of doubt, he would have cenſured them by death, and not by reſtitution, though quadruple. For, I ſpeak not of the poor and miſerable Souls, whom hunger and extreme neceſſity inforceth; but of thoſe deteſted Thieves, who, to maintain themſelves Lord-like, aſſault, rob, and wound the Merchant, Artificer, and labouring man; or break by violence into other mens houſes, and ſpend in Bravery, Drunkenneſs and upon Harlots, in one day, what other men have ſometime laboured for, all their lives; impoveriſhing whole Families, and taking the bread and food from the mouths of their children. And that this Commandment might eaſily be obſerved, it would ſoon appear, if Princes would reſolve, but for a few years, to pardon none. For, it is the hope of life, and argument of ſparing the firſt offence, that incourageth theſe Hell-hounds. And if every man preſume to be pardoned once, there is no State or Commonwealth, but theſe men would in a ſhort time impoveriſh or deſtroy it.

Commandment

The fifth Commandment of this ſecond Table, is, the prohibition of falſe witneſs: from which, if men could not forbear, all ſurety of eſtate and life were taken away. And ſo much did God deteſt a falſe witneſs, and a falſe accuſer, eſpecially, in matters criminal, that the Law ordained him to ſuffer the ſame death or puniſhment, which he ſought by falſhood to lay on his brother.

The laſt of the ten Commandments, forbiddeth us to covet any thing, which belongeth to another man, either the bodies of their wives for concupiſcence, or their goods for deſire of gain. And this Precept ſeemeth the hardeſt for men to obſerve; ſo eſteemed by reaſon of our frail affections; and yet, if we judg hereof rightly, it may be doubted, whether it extend to all our inconſiderate fancies, and vain thoughts. For, although it be not eaſie to maſter all our ſudden paſſions, yet we may reſtrain and hinder the growing, and farther increaſe, if we pleaſe to intend our ſtrength, and ſeek for grace. How the word Coveting, reacheth to all thoſe, it is to be conſidered. For, Concupiſcentia, according to ſome, Eſt effrænatus habendi appetitus; An unbridled, or unreſtrained appetite of having: And, as touching ſuch an appetite, we cannot excuſe our ſelves by any our natural frailty, or unadviſed error; But, as I ſuppoſe, the word Concupiſcence is more largely taken, either for a determinate and unbridled evil intent, or for ſome urging inclination thereunto. All the queſtion is of the later ſort; which is, Actus imperfectus, id eſt, non deliberatus ratione, quæ eſt principium proprium actus boni aut vitioſi; Such paſſions, or inclinations are imperfect acts, that is, not deliberated upon by reaſon, which is the proper Principle of a good or vicious action. And ſure, it may ſeem, that ſo long as we reſiſt ſuch motions, they harm us not: as they ſay, Quamdiu refragamur, nihil nocent: nocent autem cum eas dominari permittimus; As long as we give no aſſent unto them, it is thought by ſome, that they hurt us not; and that then onely they hurt, when we ſuffer them to bear ſway. But theſe men, as it ſeems, make nothing forbidden in the tenth Precept, but what hath been forbidden in the other: for in every Commandment, not onely the outward act, but alſo the inward aſſent unto evil, though it break not out into act, is forbidden; therefore, that we may know the difference between this Commandment and the reſt, the diſtinction of deſires is to be held; that ſome are with aſſent, and unbridled; others bridled, and without aſſent. For, even ſo the Moral Philoſopher can tell us, that the continent man hath evil deſires, but without aſſent (for they are bridled by the ſtrength of right reaſon) as, on the other ſide, the Incontinent hath good deſires but reſtrained and ſuppreſſed by contrary paſſions. The evil deſires, when they are accompanied with aſſent, are in every Commandment forbidden, together with the outward act: and therefore, if we will have any thing proper to this Commandment, we muſt needs ſay, that the evil deſires of the continent man (that is, even thoſe which we reſiſt and bridle) are here forbidden. For though he that bridled his evil deſires, be much better than he that yieldeth unto them; yet, ſuch a man according to the Heathen Philoſopher, is not worthy the name of a vertuous man. For Ariſtotle himſelf makes Continentia, not to be vertue, but only a degree unto it; confeſſing, that though the Continent man do well in bridling his evil affections, yet he doth not all, ſeeing he ought not ſo much as to have them at all. Neither is it much more, that true Divinity delivereth touching this matter. For, as he ſaith, that in the Continent man the having of theſe evil deſires, though he reſiſt them, is the cauſe that he cannot be called a vertuous man: ſo we, that the having of them is a ſin. Onely in this we excel him here; that we are able, out of Divinity, to give the true reaſon of this doctrine; which is, that every one ſinneth, that doth not love God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth, that the evil deſires of the Continent man; that is, of him which bridleth them, muſt needs be ſin: ſeeing ſuch deſires, though bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleaſed God, to make us know, that by our faithful endeavours to keep his Commandments, we witneſs our love toward himſelf; we may not ſafely give liberty to our vanities, by caſting back upon God (who is Juſtice it ſelf) that he hath given us Precepts altogether beyond our power, and Commandments impoſſible for us to keep. For, as he is accurſed (ſaith Saint Hierom) that avows that the Law is in all things poſſible to be obſerved: ſo he hath made this addition: Maledictus qui qui dicit impossibilia Deum præcepisse; Accursed is he that saith, that God hath cōmanded things (in themselves, and not through our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command us to keep the Law; so is our weakness also in the Scriptures laid before us, and therefore it is thus safely to be understood, that we should without evasion, or without betraying of our selves, do our faithful endeavours to observe them: which if we do unfeignedly, no doubt, but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no man just, David witnesseth: Enter not into judgment with thy servant, for in thy sight, no flesh that liveth shall be justified. And in the first of Kings, There is no man that sinneth not; And again, Who can say, I have made my heart clean? But, seeing there is no sin grievous without deliberation; let every man's conscience judg him, whether he give way willingly, or restrain himself in all that he can; yea, or no? For when a King gives to his subject a commandment upon pain of loss of his love, to perform some service: if the subject, neglecting the same, seek to satisfie his Soveraign with shifting excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himself to be derided therein.

Psal. 143.

Cap. 8. v. 46.

Prov. 20. 9.

§. XIV.

If there were not any Religion, nor Judgment to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be observed.

AND if we consider advisedly, and soberly, of the Moral Law, or ten Commandments, which God by the hand of Moses gave unto his People, it will appear, that such was his merciful Providence in the choice of them, as, were there neither pain nor profit adjoyned to the observing, or not observing of them; were there no divine power at all, nor any Religion among men; yet, if we did not for our own sakes strive to observe these Laws, all Society of men, and all endeavours, all happiness and contentment in this life would be taken away, and every State and Common-weal in the World fall to the ground and dissolve. Therefore these Laws were not imposed as a burthen, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might be defended, that every man might enjoy the fruits of his own travel, that right might be done to all men, from all men: that by Justice, Order, and Peace, we might live the lives of reasonable men, and not of Beasts; of free-men, and not of slaves; of civil men, and not of Salvages. And hereof making our humane reason onely Judg, let us see the inconveniences in this life, which would follow by the breach and neglect of these Laws.

As first, what would the issue be, if we acknowledged many gods? would not a farr greater hatred, warr, and bloud-shed follow, than that which the difference of Ceremony, and diversity of interpretation, hath already brought into the World, even among those Nations which acknowledg one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit mankind to pray to Idols, and Images of Gold, Metal, dead Stones, and rotten Wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the loss of time, and an impossibility to receive thence-from, either help or comfort?

The breach of the third Commandment bringeth therewith this disadvantage, and ill to man, that whosoever taketh the Name of God in vain, shall not at any time benefit himself by calling God to witness for him, when he may justly use his Holy Name.

The observing the Sabbath Holy, giveth rest to Men and Beasts, and Nature her self requireth intermission from labour.

If we despise our Parents, who have given us being, we thereby teach our children, to scorn and neglect us, when our aged years require comfort and help at their hands.

If Murther were not forbidden, and severely punished, the race of mankind would be extinguished; and whosoever would take the liberty to destroy others, giveth liberty to others to destroy himself.

If Adultery were lawful, and permitted, no man could say unto himself; This is my Son: there would be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to Posterity, no endeavour by vertue and undertaking to raise Families; murthers and poisonings between Man and Wife would be daily committed; and every man subject to most filthy and unclean Diseases.

If Stealth and violent Rapine were suffered, all mankind would shortly after perish, or live as the Salvages, by Roots and Acorns. For no man laboureth but to enjoy the fruits thereof. And such is the mischief of Robbery, as where Moses for lesser crimes, appointed restitution fourfold, policy of State, and necessity, hath made it death.

To permit false Witnesses, is to take all mens lives and estates from them by corruption; the wicked would swear against the vertuous; the waster against the wealthy; the idle Beggar and Loyterer, against the careful and painful Labourer; all trial of right were taken away, and Justice thereby banished out of the World.

The coveting of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a diſtraction of mind, with an inward vexation; for while we covet what appertains to others, we neglect our own: our appetites are therein fed with vain and fruitleſs hopes, ſo long as we do but covet; and if we do attain to the deſire of the one, or the other, to wit, the Wives, or goods of our neighbours; we can look for no other, but that our ſelves ſhall alſo, either by theft or by ſtrong hand, be deprived of our own.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandments, if there be nothing in them, but rules and directions for the general and particular good of all living? Surely, for our own good, and not in reſpect of himſelf, did the moſt merciful and provident God ordain them; without the obſervation of which, the vertues of heavenly bodies, the fertility of the earth, with all the bleſſings given us in this life, would be unto us altogether unprofitable, and of no uſe. For we ſhould remain but in the ſtate of brute Beaſts, if not in a farr more unhappy condition.

§. XV.

Of humane law, written, and unwritten.

HUmane law, of which now it followeth to ſpeak, is firſt divided into two (viz.) Written, and unwritten. The unwritten conſiſts of uſage, approved by time; which Iſidore calls Mores; and he defines Mores to be Conſuetudines vetuſtate probatæ; to be cuſtoms approved by antiquity, or unwritten laws. Now cuſtom differeth from uſe, as the cauſe from the effect; in that cuſtom is by uſe and continuance eſtabliſhed into a law; but yet there, where the law is defective, ſaith Iſidore.

And of cuſtoms there are two general natures, containing innumerable particulars; the firſt are written cuſtoms, received and exerciſed by Nations, as the cuſtoms of Burgundy and Normandy, the antient general cuſtom of England, and the cuſtoms of Caſtile, and other Provinces.

The ſecond are theſe petty cuſtoms, uſed in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The general or National cuſtoms are ſome written, others unwritten.

The particular or petty cuſtoms are ſeldom written, but witneſſed by teſtimony of the inhabitance. The cuſtom of the Dutchie of Cornwall, comprehending alſo the Stannary of Devon, as touching Tinn, and Tinn cauſes are written in Devon, but not in Cornwall. But howſoever, uſe and time hath made theſe cuſtoms as laws, yet ought every cuſtom to be rationabilis, as well as præſcripta. Non firmatur tractu temporis, quod de jure ab initio non ſubſiſtit; That which at firſt was not grounded upon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (ſaith Ulpian) quod ab initio vicioſum eſt, non poteſt tractu temporis convaleſcere; Courſe of time amends not that which was naught from the firſt beginning. For theſe two defences are neceſſary in all laws of cuſtom; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law Divine, and Natural; the other, that the cauſe and reaſon be ſtrong, proving a right birth, and neceſſary continuance; it being manifeſt, that every cuſtom which is againſt the law, had its beginning from evil deeds, and therefore not without the former conſiderations to be allowed. And it is true, that all cuſtoms of this nature, were but tollerated for a time, by the law-makers, though they have been ſince continued; becauſe poſterity is not bound to examine by what cauſe their Anceſtors were thereto moved. For, Non ſufficit ſimplex toleratio. And it is in this ſort over-ruled in the law; Per populum conſuetudo contra legem induci non poteſt, niſi de voluntate illius qui novam legem & novam conſtitutionem ſtatuere poteſt, qui ſolus princeps eſt; The people cannot bring in a new cuſtom againſt law, ſave by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is only the Prince.

In Reg. Jur. v. 2. q. 117. art. 1.

Ulp. l. 29.

Humane law, generally taken, to wit, humane law written, is by ſome defined to be the decree or doom of practick reaſon; by which humane actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the law a common precept, the adviſement of wiſe men, and the reſtraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Iſidore calls the law, a Conſtitution written, agreeing with Religion, fitteſt for government and common profit; And more largely, Omne id quod ratione conſiſtit; All that ſtands with reaſon.

Laſtly, and more preciſely, it is thus defined. Humane law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the law natural and eternal; made by the rational diſcourſe of thoſe, that exerciſe publick authority; preſcribing neceſſary obſervances to the ſubject. That every law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Auguſtine teacheth, ſaying, Mihi lex eſſe non videtur, quæ juſta non fuerit; It ſeems to be no law at all to me, which is not juſt; and juſt it cannot be, except it agree with the law natural and eternal. For there is no law juſt and legitimate (ſaith S. Auguſtine) which the Law-makers have not derived from the eternal. Nihil juſtum atque legitimum eſt, quod non ab æterna lege ſibi homines derivaverunt.

Lib. 1. de li. arb. cap. 6.

Secondly, it ought to be conſtituted by diſcourſe diſcourſe of reaſon, whereby it is diſtinguiſhed from the law natural, to wit, the natural, demonſtrable, or needing no demonſtration, from whence the law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to be made by an authoriſed Magiſtracy, it cannot be doubted, be the government of what kind ſoever. For it falleth otherwiſe under the title of thoſe decrees called Violentiæ, or iniquæ conſtitutiones; Violences, or wicked conſtitutions.

4. Parts. Of humane law there are four properties, eſpecially anſwering theſe four conditions in the former definition. Firſt, as it is drawn out of the law of Nature; ſo every particular of the humane law may be reſolved into ſome principle or rule of the natural.

Secondly, it is to be conſidered as it is referred unto, and doth reſpect, the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by publick authority.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the law, it preſcribeth and directeth all humane actions. And ſo is the law as large and divers, as all humane actions are divers, which may fall under it. For, according to Thomas, Alia lex Julia de Adulteriis, alia Cornelii de Sicariis; The law of Julian againſt Adultery, is one, the Cornelian againſt Ruffians, is another. Now, the humane law generally taken, is in reſpect of theſe conſiderations, divided into the law of Nations, and the Civil.

The law of Nations is taken leſs or more properly; leſs properly for every law which is not of it ſelf, but from other higher principles deduced: and ſo it ſeemeth that Ulpian underſtands it: for he defineth Jus Gentium, or the law of Nations, to be that which is only common amongſt men, as Religion, and the Worſhip of God; which is not in the very nature of this law of Nations; but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other divine Revelations. But the law of Nations properly taken, is that dictate, or ſentence, which is drawn from a very probable, though not from an evident principle, yet ſo probable, that all Nations do aſſent unto the concluſion, as that the free paſſage of Ambaſſadors be granted between enemies, &c. which National law, according to divers acceptations, and divers conſiderations had of the humane law, may be ſometime taken for a Species of the Natural, ſometime of the Humane.

Jus civile, or the civil Law, is not the ſame in all Common-wealths, but in divers Eſtates it is alſo divers and peculiar, and this law is not ſo immediately derived from the law of Nature, as the law of Nations is: For, it is partly deduced out of ſuch principles, as all Nations do not agree in, or eaſily aſſent unto; becauſe they depend on particular circumſtances, which are divers, and do not fit all Eſtates. Hereof Ulpian, Jus civile neque in totum à Naturali & Gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei ſervit: itaque cum aliquid addimus, vel detrahimus juri communi, jus proprium, id iſt, Civili efficimus; The civil Law (ſaith he) doth neither wholly differ from the law of Nature and Nations, nor yet in all points obey it: therefore, when we add ought to, or take from the law that is common, we make a law proper, that is, the Civil Law. In Leg. 6. to. ff. de Juſtitia jur.

The law now commonly called the Civil Law, had its birth in Rome; and was firſt written by the Decem-viri, 303. years after the foundation of the City. It was compounded as well out of the Athenian and other Grecian laws, as out of the antient Roman cuſtoms and laws Regal. The Regal laws were deviſed by the firſt Kings, and called Leges Regiæ, or Papyrianæ, becauſe they were gathered by Papyrius, Tarquin then raigning. For, though ſo many of the former laws as maintained Kingly authority, were aboliſhed with the name; yet thoſe of Servius Tullius, for commerce and contracts, and all that appertained to Religion and common Utility, were continued, and were a part of the laws of the twelve Tables. To theſe laws of the twelve Tables, were added (as the times gave occaſion) thoſe made by the Senate, called Senatus-conſulta: thoſe of the common people, called Plebei-ſcita, thoſe of the Lawyers, called Reſponſa-prudentum; and the Edicts of the Annual Magiſtrate; which Edicts being firſt gathered and interpreted by Julian, and preſented to Adrian the Emperor, they were by him confirmed, and made perpetual laws, and the Volume ſtyled, Edictum perpetuum; as thoſe and the like collections of Juſtinian afterward were. Dion. Hal. C. Signon. l. 1. out of Pomponius.

The difference antiently between Laws and Edicts, which the French call Reglements, conſiſted in this, that laws are the Conſtitutions made or confirmed by Soveraign Authority (be the ſoveraignty in the People, in a few, or in one) and are withall general and permanent: but an Edict (which is but Juſſum Magiſtratus, unleſs by authority it be made a Law) hath end with the Officer, who made the ſame, ſaith Varro. Qui plurimum Edicto tribuunt, legem annuam eſſe dicunt; They who aſcribe the moſt to an Edict, ſay that it is a law for one year: Though Iſidore doth alſo expreſs by the word Conſtitutions or Edicts, thoſe Ordinances called Acts of Prerogatives; as, Conſtitutio, vel Edictum eſt quod Rex, vel Imperator conſtituit, vel edixit; An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or Emperour doth ordain, or proclaim.

Laſtly, the humane Law is divided into the Secular, and into the Eccleſiaſtical, or Canon. The Secular commanding temporal good, to wit, the Peace and tranquility of the Common-weal; the Eccleſiaſtical, the ſpiritual good, and right government of the Eccleſiaſtical Common-wealth, or Church: Illud naturæ legem, hoc divinam ſpectat; That reſpecteth the law of Nature, this the Law of God. And ſo may Jus Civile be taken two ways; Firſt, as diſtinguiſhed from the law of Nations, as in the firſt diviſion: Secondly, as it is the ſame with the Secular, and diverſe from the Eccleſiaſtical. But this diviſion of the School-men is obſcure. For although the Civil be the ſame with the Secular, as the Civil is a law, yet the Secular is more general, and comprehendeth both the Civil, and all other laws not Eccleſiaſtical. For, of Secular laws in uſe among Chriſtian Princes, and in Chriſtian Common-weals, there are three kinds; the Civil, which hath every where a voice, and is in all Chriſtian Eſtates (England excepted) moſt powerful; the laws of England, called Common, and the laws of cuſtom, or Provincial. In Spain, beſides the law Civil, they have the cuſtoms of Caſtil, and other Provinces. In France, beſides the Civil, the cuſtoms of Burgundy, Bloys, Berri, Nivernois, and Lodunois, &c. Tous liez ſitues & aſſis en Lodunois, ſeront governez ſelon les coſtumes du dit pays; All places lying within the precincts of Lodunois, ſhall be governed according to the cuſtoms of that place. There are alſo in France the cuſtoms of Normandy, and theſe of two kinds; General, and Local; and all purged and reformed by divers Acts of the three Eſtates. The Charters of confirmation of theſe antient cuſtoms, before and ſince their reformation have theſe words: Nos autem Regiſtrum prædictum, uſus laudabiles, & conſuetudines antiquas, &c. laudamus, approbamus, & authoritate Regia confirmamus; The Regiſter aforeſaid, laudable uſe, and antient cuſtoms, we praiſe, approve, and by our Kingly Authority confirm. The Common Law of England is alſo compounded of the antient cuſtoms of the ſame, and of certain Maxims by thoſe cuſtoms of the Realm approved. Upon which cuſtoms alſo are grounded thoſe Courts of Record, of the Chancery, Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other ſmall Courts.

Art. 3. tit. 5. G. Caſt.

Theſe antient cuſtoms of England have been approved by the Kings thereof from Age to Age: as that cuſtom by which no man ſhall be taken, impriſoned, diſſeiſed, nor otherwiſe deſtroy'd, but he muſt firſt be put to anſwer by the Law of the Land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the antient cuſtom of England, that the eldeſt Sons ſhould inherit without partition. In Germany, France, and elſewhere otherwiſe, and by partition. In Ireland, it is the cuſtom of all Lands (that have not been reſigned into the Kings hands) that the eldeſt of the Houſe ſhall enjoy the Inheritance during his own life; and ſo the ſecond and third eldeſt (if there be ſo many brothers) before the Heir in lineal deſcent; this is called the cuſtom of Taniſtry. For example, if a Lord of Land have four Sons, and the eldeſt of thoſe four have alſo a Son, the three brothers of the eldeſt Son ſhall, after the death of their brother, enjoy their Fathers Lands before the grandchild: the cuſtom being grounded upon the reaſon of neceſſity. For the Iriſh in former times, having always lived in a ſubdivided civil Warr, not onely the greateſt againſt the greateſt, but every Baron and Gentleman one againſt another, were enforc'd to leave ſucceſſors of age and ability, to defend their own Territories. Now, as in Normandy, Burgundy, and other Provinces of France, there are certain peculiar and petty Cuſtoms, beſides the great and general cuſtom of the Land, ſo are there in England, and in every part thereof. But the greateſt bulk of our Laws, as I take it, are the Acts of Parliament; Laws propounded and approved by the three Eſtates of the Realm, and confirmed by the King, to the obedience of which, all men are therefore bound, becauſe they are Acts of choice, and ſelf-deſire. Leges nulla alia cauſa nos tenent, quàm quòd judicio populi receptæ ſunt; The Laws do therefore bind the Subject, becauſe they are received by the judgment of the Subject. Tum demum humanæ leges habent vim ſuam, cum fuerint non modò inſtitutæ, ſed etiam firmatæ approbatione communitatis; It is then that humane laws have their ſtrength, when they ſhall not onely be deviſed, but by the approbation of the People confirmed.

Vlp. ff. de Leg. Leg. 31. Aug. de vera relig. cap. 31. Gratian. in dec. diſt. 4. Cum in iſtis.

Iſidore faſtneth theſe properties to every Chriſtian Law, that the ſame be honeſt, that it be poſſible, that it be according to Nature, and according to the cuſtom of the Countrey; alſo for the time and place, convenient, profitable, and manifeſt; and without reſpect of private profit, that it be written for the general good. He alſo gives four effects of the Law, which Modeſtinus comprehends in two; to wit, obligation, and inſtigation: the former binds us by fear, to avoid vice; the later encourageth with hope, to follow vertue. For, according to Cicero, Legem oportet eſſe vitiorum emendatricem, tricem, commendatricemque virtutum: It behooveth the Law to be a mender of Vices, and a commender of Vertue. The part obligatory, or binding us to the observation of things commanded, or forbidden, is an effect common to all laws; and it is two-fold: the one constraineth us by fear of our consciences, the other by fear of external punishment. These two effects the Law performeth, by the exercise of those two powers, to wit, Coactive and Directive.

The second of these two effects remembred by Modestinus, is Instigation, or incouragement to Vertue, as Aristotle makes it the end of the Law, to make men vertuous. For laws being such as they ought to be, do both by prescribing and forbidding, urge us to well-doing; laying before us the good and the evil, by the one and the other purchased. And this power affirmative commanding good, and power negative forbidding evil, are those into which the law is divided, as touching the matter: and in which David comprehendeth the whole body and substance thereof: saying, Declina à malo, & fac bonum, Decline from evil, and do good. Psalm 37.

§. XVI.

That onely the Prince is exempt from humane laws, and in what sort.

NOw, whether the power of the humane Law be without exception of any person, it is doubtfully disputed among those that have written of this subject, as well Divines as Lawyers; and namely, whether Soveraign Princes be compellable; yea, or no? But whereas there are two powers of the Law, as aforesaid; the one Directive, the other Coactive: to the power Directive they ought to be subject, but not to that which constraineth. For, as touching violence, or punishments, no man is bound to give a prejudicial judgment against himself; and, if equals have not any power over each other, much less have inferiours over their superiours, from whom they receive their authority and strength.

And speaking of the supreme power of Laws, simply then is the Prince so much above the laws, as the Soul and Body united, is above a dead and sensless Carkass. For the King is truly called, Jus vivum, & lex animata: An animate, and living law. But this is true, that by giving authority to laws, Princes both add greatness to themselves, and conserve it; and therefore was it said of Bracton out of Justinian; Meritò debet Rex tribuere legi quod lex attribuit ei: nam lex facit ut ipse sit Rex; Rightfully ought the King to attribute that to the law, which the law first attributeth to the King; for it is the law that doth make Kings. Bract. l. 2.

But whereas Bracton ascribeth this power to the humane law, he is therein mistaken. For Kings are made by God, and laws divine; and by humane laws onely, declared to be Kings. As for the places remembred by the Divines and Lawyers, which inferr a kind of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, than the bond of conscience, and profit arising from the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to give an accompt of their actions to God onely.

Tibi soli peccavi, saith David; against thee onely have I sinned; therefore the Prince cannot be said to be subject to the law; Princeps non subjicitur legi. For seeing, according to the School-men, the law humane, is but quoddam organum, & instrumentum potestatis gubernativæ: non videtur posse ejus obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa vis potestatis humanæ non pertinet; sed vis potestatis humanæ non se extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa residet. Ergo, neque lex condita per talem potestatem obligare potest ipsum conditorem. Omnis enim potentia activa, est principium transmutandi aliud; Seeing humane law (say they) is but a kind of organ, or instrument of the power that governeth, it seems that it cannot extend it self to bind any one, whom no humane power can controll, or lay hold of: but the Governour himself, in whom the governing power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himself, or by his own power, be controlled. And therefore the law which is made by such a power, cannot bind the Law-maker himself: for every active ability, is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it self resides. And seeing Princes have power to deliver others from the obligation of the law; Ergo, etiam potest ipsemet Princeps, sive Legislator sua se voluntate pro libito ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore also may a Prince, or Law-maker, at his own will and pleasure, deliver himself from the bond of the Law. Therefore in the rules of the Law it is thus concluded: Subditi tenentur leges observare necessitate coactionis. Princeps vero sola voluntate sua, & intuitu boni communis; The subjects are bound to fulfill the Law by necessity of compulsion, but the Prince only by his own will, and regard of the common good. Psalm 50. Aff. de Leg. Greg. Valentia de Leg.

Now, concerning the politick laws, given by Moses to the Nation of the Israelites, whether they ought to be a Prefident, from which no civil Institutions of other People should presume to digress, I will not presume to determine, but leave it as a question on for such men to decide, whose professions give them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirm, That we ought not to seem wiser than God himself, who hath told us, that there are no laws so righteous, as those which it pleased him to give to his Elect People to be governed by. True it is, that all Nations have their several qualities, wherein they differ, even from their next borderers, no less than in their peculiar Languages; which disagreeable conditions to govern aptly, one and the same law very hardly were able. The Roman civil laws did indeed contain in order a great part of the then known World, without any notable inconvenience, after such time as once it was received and become familiar; yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yielded much unto the natural customs of the sundry people which it governed. For, whether it be through a long continued persuasion; or (as Astrologers more willingly grant) some influence of the Heavens; or, peradventure, some temper of the soil and climate, affording matter of provocation to vice (as plenty make the Sybarites luxurious; want, and opportunity to steal, makes the Arabians to be Thieves) very hard it were to forbid by law, an offence so common with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be distinguished from just and honest. By such rigour was the Kingdom of Congo unhappily diverted from the Christian Religion, which it willingly at the first imbraced, but after, with great fury rejected, because plurality of Wives was denied unto them, I know not how necessarily, but more conscientiously than seasonably. In such cases, methinks it were not amiss to consider, that the high God himself permitted some thing to the Israelites, rather in regard of their natural disposition (for they were hard-hearted) than because they were consonant unto the antient Rules of the first perfection. So, where even the general nature of man doth condemn (as many things it doth) for wicked and unjust; there may the law, given by Moses, worthily be deemed the most exact reformer of the evil, which forceth man, as near as may be, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where nature or custom hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habit, with so long and so publick approbation, that the vertue opposing it would seem as uncouth, as it were to walk naked in England, or to wear the English fashion of apparel in Turkie; there may be a wise and upright Law-giver, without presumption, omit somewhat that the rigour of Moses law required; even as the good King Hezekiah did, in a matter meerly Ecclesiastical, and therefore the less capable of dispensation, praying for the people; The good Lord be mercifull unto him, that prepareth his whole heart to seek the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though he be not cleansed according to the purification of the Sanctuary; which Prayer the Lord heard and granted. 2 Chron. 30.18,19.

To this effect it is well observed by Mr. Doctor Willet, that the moral Judicials of Moses do partly bind, and partly are let free. They do not hold affirmatively, that we are tied to the same severity of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negatively they do hold, that now the punishment of death should not be adjudged, where sentence of death is given by Moses; Christian Magistrates ruling under Christ the Prince of peace, that is, of Clemency and Mercy, may abate of the severity of Moses law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot add unto it, to make the burthen more heavie: for to shew more rigour than Moses, becometh not the Gospel. Isai. 9.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath been the subject of many learned discourses, neither will I take upon me, to speak any thing definitively in a case which dependeth still in some controversie among worthy Divines. Thus much (as in honour of the Judicial law, or rather of him that gave it) I may well and truly say, that the defence of it hath always been very plausible. And surely, howsoever they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a general and onely law; yet shall we hardly find any other ground, wheron the conscience of a Judg may rest, with equal satisfaction in making interpretation, or giving sentence upon doubts arising out of any law besides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Judg could have been witness, of whom Fortescue, that notable Bulwark of our laws, doth speak, complaining of a judgment given against a Gentlewoman at Salisbury; who being accused by her own man, without any other proof, for murthering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the man who accused her, within a year after, being convict for the same offence, confest that his Mistris was altogether innocent of that cruel fact, whose terrible death he then (though over-late) grievously lamented; but this Judg, saith the same Author, Sæpius ipse mihi fassus est, quod nunquam in vita sua animum ejus de hoc facto ipse purgaret; He himself often confessed unto me, that he should never, during his life, be able to clear Cap. 5. 3.

his conscience of that fact. Wherefore, that acknowledgment which other Sciences yield unto the Metaphysicks, that from thence are drawn Propositions, able to prove the principles of Sciences, which out of the Sciences themselves cannot be proved, may justly be granted by all other politick institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more justly, by how much the subject of the Metaphysicks which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Being as it is being; is infinitely inferiour to the Ens Entium; The Being of beings, the onely good, the fountain of Truth, whose fear is the beginning of Wisdom. To which purpose, well saith Saint Augustine, Conditor legum temporalium si vir bonus est, & sapiens, illam ipsam consulit æternam, de quâ nulli animæ judicare datum est; The Author of temporal Laws, if he be good and wise, doth therein consult the Law æternal, to determine of which, there is no power given to any Soul. And as well Prince Edward, in Fortescue his Discourse, Nemo potest melius, aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quàm posuit Dominus; No man can lay a better, or another foundation, than the Lord hath laid.

CHAP. V.

The Story of the Israelites from the receiving of the Law, to the death of Moses.

§. I.

Of the numbring and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wilderness; with a note of the reverence given to the Worship of God, in this ordering of their troups.

WHen Moses had received the Law from God, and published it among the People, and finished the Tabernacle of the Ark, and Sanctuary; he mustred all the Tribes and Families of Israel; and having seen what number of Men fit to bear Arms, were found in every Tribe, from twenty years of age upwards; he appointed unto them, by direction from the LORD, such Princes and Leaders, as in Worth and Reputation were in every Tribe most eminent. The number of the whole Army was 603550. able men for the Warrs, besides Women and Children; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Egypt. This great Army was divided by Moses into four gross and mighty Battalilions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The first of these containing 186400. able Men, consisted of three Regiments, which may well, in respect of their number, be called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Judah, Issachar and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Judah were 74600. fighting men, led by Naasson; in Issachar, 54400. led by Nathaniel; in Zabulon 57400 led by Eliab. All these marched under the Standard of the Tribe of Judah, who held the Vaunt-guard, and was the first that moved and marched, being lodged and quartered at their general encamping on the East-side of the Army, which was held the first place, and of greatest dignity.

The second Battalion or Army, called in the Scriptures, the host of Reuben, had joyned unto it Simeon and Gad, in number, 151450. All which marched under the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Reuben were 46500. under Elizur; in Simeon, 59300. under Shelumiel; in Gad, 45650. under Eliasaph: These had the second place, and encamped on the South-side of the Tabernacle.

The third Army marched under the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were joyned the Regiment of Manasse and Benjamin; who joyned together, made in number 108100. able men. These marched in the third place, encamping on the West quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500. under Elishama; Manasse 32200. under Gamliel; Benjamin 35400. under Abidam.

The fourth and last Army, or Squadron, of the general Army, containing 157600. able men, marched under the Standard of Dan; to whom were joyned the two Tribes of Nephtali and Asher. And these had the Rere-ward, and moved last, encamping on the North-side. Dan had 62700. under Ahiezer; Asher 41500. under Pagiel; Nephtali 53400. under Ahira.

Besides these Princes of the several Tribes, there were ordained Captains over Thousands, over Hundreds, over Fifties, and over over Tens; as it may appear by that mutiny and insurrection against Moses; Numb. 16. verse 1. and 2. For there arose up against Moses 250. Captains of the Assembly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renown; of which number were Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Which three principal Mutineers, with those 250. Captains that followed them, were not any of the Princes of the Tribes or general Colonels before spoken of, as by their names, Numb. 1. is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gave to his children, took place not only in the division of the Land of Promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but even in sorting them under their several Standards in the Wilderness it was observed. For Judah had the precedency, and the greatest Army, which also was wholly compounded of the Sons of Leah, Jacob's Wife. Reuben having lost his birth-right, followed in the second place, accompanied with his brother Simeon, who had under-gone his Fathers curse; and with Gad, the Son of his Mothers Hand-maid. Joseph, who, in temporal blessings, had the prerogative of the first-born, a double portion, was accompted as two Tribes, and divided into two Regiments; the younger (according to Jacob's prophecy) taking place before the elder, he was assisted by Bejamin, his best beloved brother, the other son of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest son of Jacob's Concubines, was given the leading of the fourth Army, according to Jacob's prophecy. He had with him under his Standard, none of the children of Leah, or Rachel, but only the sons of the Hand-maids.

In the middle of these four Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, surrounded by the Levites. Near unto which, as the Heathens and Pagans could not approach, by reason of these four powerful Armies which guarded the same; so was it death for any of the children of Israel to come near it, who were not of the Levites, to whom the charge was committed. So sacred was the movable Temple of God, and with such reverence guarded and transported, as 22000. persons were dedicated to the service and attendance thereof: of which, 8580. had the peculiar charge, according to their several offices and functions; the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the People observed the former order in their incampings: so did the Levites quarter themselves, as in an inner square, on every side of the Tabernacle; the Gesshurites on the West, within the Army, and Standard of Ephraim, over whom Eliasaph commanded, in number, 7500. The Family of Cohath on the South-side, guided by Elizaphan, within the Army of Reuben, and between him and the Tabernacle, in number 8600. The third Company were of the Family of Merari, over whom Zuriel commanded, in number 6200. and these were lodged on the North-side, within the Army of Dan. On the East-side, and next within those Tribes and Forces which Judah led, did Moses and Aaron lodge, and their children, who were the first and immediate Commanders, both of Ceremonies, and of the People; under whom, as the chief of all the other Levitical Families, was Eleazar, the son of Aaron, his successor in the high Priest-hood.

This was the order of the Army of Israel, and of their encamping and marching; the Tabernacle being always set in the middle and center thereof. The reverend care which Moses the Prophet, and chosen servant of God, had in all that belonged even to the outward and least parts of the Tabernacle, Ark, and Sanctuary, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeal born towards God himself. The industry used in the framing thereof, and every, and the least part thereof; the curious workmanship thereon bestowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the provisions; the dutiful observance in the laying up, and preserving the holy Vessels; the solemn removing thereof; the vigilant attendance thereon, and the provident defence of the same, which all Ages have in some degree imitated, is now so forgotten and cast away in this super-fine Age, by those of the Family, by the Anabaptist, Brownist, and other Sectaries, as all cost and care bestowed and had of the Church, wherein God is to be served and worshipped, is accompted a kind of Popery, and as proceeding from an Idolatrous disposition; insomuch as time would soon bring to pass (if it were not resisted) that God would be turned out of Churches into Barns, and from thence again into the Fields, and Mountains, and under the Hedges, and the offices of the Ministery (robbed of all dignity and respect) be as contemptible as those places; all Order, Discipline, and Church-government, left to newness of Opinion, and mens fancies; yea, and soon after, as many kinds of Religions would spring up, as there are Parish-Churches within England; every contentious and ignorant person clothing his fancy with the Spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of Revelation; insomuch, as when the Truth, which is but one, shall appear to the simple multitude, no less variable than than contrary to it self, the Faith of men will soon after die away by degreees, and all Religion be held in scorn and contempt. Which distraction gave a great Prince of Germany cause of this Answer to those that persuaded him to becom a Lutheran; Si me adjungo vobis, tunc condemnor ab aliis: si me aliis adjungo, à vobis condemnor; quid fugiam video, sed quid sequar, non habeo: If I adjoin my self to you, I am condemned by others; If I joyn with others, I am condemned by you: what I should avoid I see, but I see not what I should follow.

§. II.

The offerings of the twelve Princes: the Passover of the second year: the departing of Jethro.

NOw, when Moses had taken order for all things necessary, provided for the service of God, written the laws, numbred his Army, and divided them into the battels and troups before remembred, and appointed them Leaders of all sorts; The twelve Princes or Commanders of the Tribes, brought their offerings before the Lord, to wit, six covered Chariots, and twelve Oxen to draw them, therein to transport, as they marched, the parts of the Tabernacle, with all that belonged thereunto, the Sanctuary excepted, which for reverence was carried upon the shoulders of the Sons of Korah, to whom the charge was committed; and the Chariots, in which was conveyed the other parts of the Tabernacles and Vessels thereto belonging, were delivered to the Levites for that service, namely, to the sons of Gershan and Merari. Numb. 6.

Besides these Chariots, each of these Commanders, Princes, or Heads of Tribes, offered unto God, and for his service in the Temple, a Charger of fine Silver, weighing 130. shekels; a silver Bowl of 70. shekels, after the shekel of the Sanctuary; and an Incense-Cup of Gold, of ten shekels, which they performed at the same time when the Altar was dedicated unto God by Aaron; and before they marched from Sinai towards their conquest, besides the Beasts which they offered for sacrifice, according to the law Ceremonial, the weight of all the twelve silver Chargers, and twelve silver Bowls, amounted unto 2400. shekels of silver; and the weight of gold in the Incense-Cups, to 120. shekels of gold; which makes of shekels of silver, 1200. every shekel of gold valuing ten of silver, so that the whole of gold and silver which they offered at this time, was about four hundred and twenty pound sterling. This done, Moses, as in all the rest, by the Spirit of God conducted, gave order for the celebrating of the Passover, which they performed on the fourteenth day of the second Moneth of the second year; and on the twentieth day of the same, the cloud was lifted up from above the Tabernacle, as a sign of going forward; Moses beginning his march with this invocation to God: Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered; and let them that hate thee, flie before thee. Then all the people of Israel removed from their encamping at the foot of the Mountain Sinai, towards Paran, the Army, or great squadron of Juda, led by Naasshon, taking the Vaunt-guard, followed by Nathaniel and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Issachar and Zabulon; after whom the rest marched, as in the Figure expres'd. And because the passage through so many Desarts and Mountains, was exceeding difficult: Moses leaving nothing un-forethought, which might serve for the advancement of his enterprise, he instantly intreated his Father-in-law, whom, in the tenth of Numbers, he calleth Hobab, to accompany them in their journey towards Canaan; promising him such part and profit of the enterprise, as God should bestow on them; for this man, as he was of great understnding and judgment (as appeared by the counsel he gave to Moses for the appointing of Judges over the People) so was he a perfect guide in all those parts, himself inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian or Madian: and (as it seemeth) a man of great years and experience; for he was then the Priest or Prince of Madian, when Moses fled first out of Egypt, and married his Daughter, which was 42. years before this request made. And though Moses himself had lived 40. years in these parts of Arabia, through which he was now to travel; yet the better to assure his passage, and so great a multitude of souls, which could not be so few as a Million, it was necessary to use many guides, and many conductors. To this request of Moses, it may seem by the places, Exod. 18. 27. and Numb. 10. 30. that Jethro, otherwise called Hobab, yielded not; for it is evident, that he went back from Moses into his own Countrey. But because it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the Posterity of this Hobab was mingled with the Israelites, it is most likely that this his return to his own Countrey, was rather Judic. 1. 16. & 4. 11. Also 1 Sam. 15. 6. And 2 Reg. 10. 15. 1 Chron. 5. 55. Jer. 35.

The Hebrew Gerah weigheth sixteen grains: so a Gerah of Silver is about three half pence sterling: the Sicle of the Sanctuary (as it is expounded, Exod. 30. 13.) containeth 20. Gerahs, so a Sanctuary Sicle of Silver is about 7. Groats, the common Sicle is but half as much, to wit, 10. Gerahs: as it is usualy expounded; though Villalpandus labours to prove that the common, and the Sanctuary Sicle were all one, Numb. 9. 5. Numb. 10. 11. Exod. ult. 34. Num. 9. 17.

rather to fetch away his Family, and to take his leave of his own Country, by ſetting things in order, than to abide there.

§. III.

The Voyage from Horeb to Kades; the Mutinies by the way; and the cauſe of their turning back to the Red Sea.

AFter this diſmiſſion of Hobab, Iſrael began to march towards the deſarts of Paran; and after three days wandring, they ſate down at the Sepulchres of luſt, afterward called Tabeera, or Incenſio; by reaſon that God conſumed with fire thoſe Mutineers and Murmurers, which roſe up in this remove, which hapned about the 23. day of the ſame Moneth. And from this 23. day of the ſecond Moneth of the ſecond year, they reſted, and fed themſelves with Quails (which it pleaſed God by a Sea-wind to caſt upon them) to the 24. day of the third Moneth; to wit, all the Moneth of Sinan, or June; whereof ſurfeiting, there died great numbers; from whence Numb. 11. and 13. in the following Moneth, called Thamus, anſwering to our July, they went on to Haze- Numb. 12. roth, where Miriam the ſiſter of Moſes was ſtricken with the leproſie, which continued upon her ſeven days, after whoſe recovery Iſrael removed toward the border of Idumæa, and encamped at Rithma, near Kades Barnea, from whence Moſes ſent the twelve diſcoverers into the Territory of Canaan, both to inform themſelves of the fertility and ſtrength of the Countrey; as alſo to take knowledg of the ways, paſſages, rivers, fords and Mountains. For Arad, King of the Canaanites, ſurprized divers companies of the Iſraelites, by lying in ambuſh near thoſe ways, through which the diſcoverers and ſearchers of the Land had formerly paſt. Now, after the return of the diſcoverers of Kades, the wrath of God was turned againſt Iſrael; Numb. 21. whoſe ingratitude and rebellion after his ſo many benefits, ſo many remiſſions, ſo many miracles wrought, was ſuch, as they eſteemed their deliverance from the Egyptian ſlavery, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible Wilderneſs (for ſo Moſes calleth it) with the Victory which he gave them againſt the powerful Amalekites, to be no other than the effects of his hatred, thinking that he led them on, and preſerved them, but to bring them, their Wives and Children to be ſlaughtered, and given for a prey and ſpoile to the Amorites, or Canaanites. For, it was reported unto them by the ſearchers of the Land, that the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many ſtrong Towers and Caſtles, that many of the people were Giant-like (for they confeſs'd that they ſaw the Sons of Anac there) who were men of fearful ſtature, and ſo far over-topped the Iſraelites, as they appeared to them and to themſelves, but as Graſhoppers in their reſpect. Now, as this mutiny exceeded all the reſt, wherein they both accuſed God, and conſulted to chooſe them a Captain (or as they call it now aday, an Electo) to carry them back again into Egypt; ſo did God puniſh the ſame in a greater meaſure, than any of the former. For he extinguiſhed every Soul of the whole multitude (Joſua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promiſes, perſuaded the people to enter Canaan, being then near it; and at the mountain foot of Idumæa, which is but narrow; laying before them the fertility thereof, and aſſuring them of Victory. But as men whom the paſſion of fear had bereaved both of reaſon and common ſenſe, Numb. 14. 10. they threatned to ſtone theſe encouragers to death; accompting them as men either deſperate in themſelves, or betrayers of the lives, goods, and children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God reſiſted theſe wicked purpoſes, and interpoſing the fear of his bright glory between the unadviſed fury of the multitude, and the innoceney & conſtancy of his ſervants, preſerved them thereby from their violence; threatning an entire deſtruction of the whole Na- Numb. 14. tion, by ſending among them a conſuming 22. and mercileſs Peſtilence. For this was the tenth inſurrection and rebellion, which they had made, ſince God delivered them from the ſlavery of the Egyptians. But Moſes (the mildeſt or meekeſt of all men) prayed unto Numb. 12. God to remember his infinite mercies; alleg- 3. ing, that this ſo ſevere a judgment, how deſervedly ſoever inflicted, would increaſe the pride of the heathen Nations, and give them occaſion to vaunt, that the God of Iſrael failing in power to perform his promiſes, ſuffered them to periſh in theſe barren and fruitleſs Deſarts. Yet, as God is no leſs juſt than merciful, as God is ſlow to anger, ſo is his wrath a conſuming fire; the ſame being once kindled by the violent breath of man's ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand leſs heavie than hoped for, he ſcourged this iniquity; ſo by the meaſure of his glory (evermore jealous of neglect and deriſion) he ſuffered not the wicked to paſs unpuniſhed; reſerving his compaſſion for the innocent; whom, becauſe they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, he was pleaſed to preſerve, and in them to perform his promiſes, which have never been fruſtrate.

§. IV.

§. IV.

Of their unwillingness to return; with the punishment thereof, and of divers accidents in the return.

NOw, when Moses had revealed the purposes of God to the People, and made them know his heavie displeasure towards them, they began to bewail themselves, though over-late; the times of grace and mens repentance, having also their appointment. And then when God had left them to themselves, and was no more among them, after they had so often plaid and dallied with his merciful sufferings, they would needs amend their former disobedience by a second contempt, and make offer to enter the Land, contrary again to the advice of Moses; who assured them that God was not among them; and that the Ark of his Covenant should not move, but by his direction, who could not err; and that the Enemies sword, which God had hitherto bended, and rebated, was now left no less sharp than death; and in the hands of the Amalekites and Canaanites, no less cruel. But as men from whom God hath with-drawn his Grace, do always follow those counsels which carry them to their own destructions: so the Hebrews, after they had forsaken the opportunity by God and their Conductors offered: and might then have entred Judæa before their Enemies were prepared and joyned; did afterward, contrary to Gods Commandment, undertake the enterprise of themselves, and ran head-long, and without advice, into the Mountains of Idumæa. There the Canaanites and the Amalekites being joyned, and attending their advantage, set on them, brake them, and of their numbers slaughtered the greatest part: and following their victory and persute, consumed them all the way of their flight, even unto Hormah: the Amalekites, in revenge of their former loss, and overthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites, to prevent their displantation and destruction threatned. Of which powerful assembly of those two Nations (assisted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings, joined together for their common safety) it pleased God to forewarn Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commanded him to return by those painful passages of the Desarts, through which they had formerly travelled, till they found the banks of the Red Sea again; in which retreat, before they came back to pass over Jordan, there were consumed eight and thirty years; and the whole number of the 600. and odd thousand, which came out of Egypt (Moses, Josua, and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wilderness, the stubborn and careless generations were wholly worn out, and the promised Land bestowed on their children; which were increased to 600000. and more. For, besides the double fault, both of refusing to enter the Land upon the return of their discoverers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermanded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worshipping Moloch, and the Host of Heaven. For, although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen; as also that the Israelites worshipped the Sun and Moon in after-times, it is proved out of sundry other places. Amos 5. 25. Acts 7. 42. 2 King. 17. 16. & cap. 21. v. 3. & c. 23. v. 4, 5, 11. 2 Chron. 33. 3. Hier. 19. v. 13. &c.

Now, after the broken Companies were returned to the Camp at Cades, Moses, according to the commandment received from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recover the shoars of the Red Sea. And so from Cades, or Rithma, he removed to Remmonparez, so called of abundance of Pomegranates there found, and divided among them. From whence he went on to Libnah, taking that name of the Frankincense there found. From Libnah he crossed the Valley, and sate down at Ressa, near the foot of the Mountain. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the West, and encamped at Ceelata; where one of the Hebrews, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was stoned to death. After which, Moses always keeping the Valley, between two great legdes of Mountains (those which bound the Desart of Sin, and those of Pharan) cross'd the same from Ceelata, and marched Eastward to the Mountain of Sapher, or Sepher; this making the twentieth Mansion. From thence he passed on to Harada; then to Maceloth; and then to Thahah, and so to Thara, or Thare; the four and twentieth Mansion. Where Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutiny of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; who, for their contempt of God and his Ministers, were some of them swallowed up alive, and by the earth, opening her mouth, devoured; others, even two hundred and fifty which offered Incense with Korah, were consumed with fire from Heaven; and 14700. of their party, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest marvels and judgments of God that hath been shewed in all the time of Moses his Government, or before. For Numb. 33.

among ſo great a multitude, thoſe lay-men, who would have uſurped Eccleſiaſtical authority, were ſuddenly ſwallowed up alive into the Earth, with their Families and goods; even while they ſought to overthrow the Order, Diſcipline, and Power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliouſly contending againſt the High Prieſt and Magiſtrate, to whom God had committed the government both of his Church, and Common-weal of his People. And the better to aſſure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirm them, it pleaſeth him in this place alſo to approve by miracle the former election of his ſervant Aaron, by the 12. Rods given by the Heads of the 12. Tribes; of which Moſes received one of every Head, and Prince of his Tribe: which, being all withered and dried Wands, and on every Rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aaron's on that of Levi, it pleaſed God, that the Rod of Aaron received, by his power, a vegetable ſpirit, and having lain in the Tabernacle of the Congregation before the Ark one night, had on it both Buds, Bloſſoms, and ripe Almonds.

From Tharah, the whole Army removed to Methra; and thence to Eſmona; and thence to Moſeroth (or Maſurit, after S. Hierom) and from Moſeroth to Benejacan; and ſo to Gadgad, which Hierom calleth Gadgada; thence to Jetabata, the thirtieth Manſion; where, from certain fountains of water gathered in one, Adricomius maketh a River, which falleth into the Red Sea, between Madian, and Aſiongaber.

Now, although it be very probable, that at Aſiongaber, where Solomon furniſhed his Fleet for the Eaſt-India, there was ſtore of freſh water; and though Herodotus maketh mention of a great River in Arabia the Stony, which he calleth Corys, from whence (ſaith he) the Inhabitants convey water in Pipes of Leather to other places, by which device the King of Arabia relieved the Army of Cambyſes; yet is Adrichomius greatly deceived, as many times he is, in finding theſe Springs at Gadgad, or Jetabata, being the nine and twentieth, or thirtieth Manſion. For it was at Punon, that thoſe Springs are ſpoken of, which in Deuteronomy the tenth, and the ſeventh Verſe, is alſo called Jetabata, or Jotbath, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the River Zared, the next adjoyning. And that theſe Springs ſhould fall into the Red Sea at Aſiongaber, or Eloth, I cannot believe, for the way thither is very long. And this I find in Belonius, that there are divers Torrents of freſh water in thoſe ſandy parts of Arabia; which though they continue their courſe for a few miles, yet they are drunk up by the hot and thirſty ſand, before they can recover the banks of the Red Sea.

From Jetabata, Moſes directed his journey towards the Red Sea, and encamped at Hebrona, & from thence to Eſiongaber; which City in Joſephus time, had the name of Berenice; and in Hieroms, Eſſia. From thence, keeping the Sea, and Eloth on his right hand, he turned towards the North, as he was by God commanded; Eſiongaber being the farthеſt place towards the South-Eaſt, that Moſes travelled in that paſſage. Deut. 2.

It ſeemeth that Eſiongaber, or Aſiongaber, Eloth and Madian, were not at this time in the poſſeſſion of the Kings of Edom. For it is ſaid, That the Lord ſpake unto Moſes and Aaron in the Mount Hor, near the coaſt of the Land of Edom; ſo as the Mount Hor was at this time in the South border of Idumæa. And if Eſiongaber, and the other places near the Red Sea, had at this preſent been ſubject unto the Idumæans, Moſes would alſo have demanded a free paſſage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumæans obtained thoſe places: for it is ſaid; And they aroſe out of Midian, and came to Paran, and took men with them; which were thoſe Companies that followed young Adad of Idumæa into Egypt, when he fled from Joab. Likewiſe it is ſaid of Solomon, that he made a Navie of Ships in Eſiongaber, beſides Eloth, in the Land of Edom. Numb. 20. 13. 1 King. 11. 18.

§. V.

Of Moſes arrival at Zin Kades: and of the accidents while that they abode there.

FRom Eſiongaber he turned again towards the North, and pitched in the Wilderneſs of Zin, which is Kadeſh; or in Beroth, of the children of Jacan; where they ſate down in the firſt Moneth of the fourtieth year, after they left Egypt. For, at the next Manſion, Aaron died in the firſt day of the fifth Moneth of the fourtieth year; the nine and thirtieth year taking end at Eſiongaber. And at this City of Cades (for ſo it was thought to be) or near it, died Miriam, or Mary, Moſes ſiſter, whoſe Sepulcher was to be ſeen in S. Hieroms time, as himſelf avoweth. From hence, ere they departed to the Mountain Hor, all the people murmured moſt violently againſt Moſes, by reaſon of the ſcarcity of water. For neither the puniſhments by fire from Heaven; by being devoured and ſwallowed up by the Earth; by the ſudden Peſtilence, which often ſeized them; nor any Numb. 20. 1. Numb. 20. 3.

any miracle formerly shewing, either the love or wrath of God, could prevail with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in every of their appetites; but in stead of seeking for help and relief at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and casting ungratefully on Moses all their misadventures; yea, though they well knew that their own fathers had left their bodies in the Desarts, and they were now entred into the fourtieth year, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in sight of the Land promised, they again as obstinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of God are without beginning; so his mercies being without end, he commanded Moses to strike a Rock adjoyning, with his Rod, and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselves and their cattel were satisfied. Nevertheless, because God perceived a kind of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron at this place; therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised, whereto perchance their worldly desires might invite them. But it pleased him to end the travels of Aaron at the Mountian Hor, being the next, and the four and thirtieth Station. At which Mountain Hor, Aaron was despoiled of the garments of his Priest-hood, and the same put on Eleazar his Son, as God hath commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar descended the Mountain; but God received Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more seen.

Of this Mountain called Hor, otherwise Mosera, as in Deut. 10. vers. 6. those Horites took name, which the Idumæans had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mosera, which was the seven and twentieth Mansion; and Mosera, which they write Moseroth, for difference, which was the four and thirtieth Mansion, and is also called Hor, to be two distinct places; because Moses in passing from Cadesbarne towards Esiongaber, encamped at Mosera, after he departed from Hesmona, and before he came to Benjaacan. And this Mosera, which is also called Hor, he came unto after he had left Cades, where Miriam, Moses sister, died; the first being the seven and twentieth, and the second being the four and thirtieth Mansion. But for Hor, which is also called Mosera, it should have been written, Hor juxta Mosera; Hor near Mosera; for it is but one root of a Mountain, divided into divers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are: Whereof the West part Moses calleth Mosera, and the East part Horeb. By the West part Moses encamped, as he past towards the Red-Sea on his left hand; by the East part, as he went back again North-wards towards Moab, as in the description of Moses his passage through Arabia, the Reader may perceive.

Numb. 33.

Now, it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent messengers to the Prince of Idumæa, praying him that he might pass with the people of Israel through his Territory into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the neerest way of all other from the City of Kadesh, where Moses then encamped; whereas otherwise, taking his journey by the Rivers of Zared, Arnon and Jordan, he might have run into many hazards in the passage of those Rivers, the far way about, and the many powerful Kings, which commanded in those Regions. Now, the better to perswade the Prince of Idumæa hereunto, Moses remembred him, that he was of the same Race and Family with Israel; calling him by the name of Brother, because both the Edomites and Israelites were the Sons of one father, to wit, Isaac; inferring thereby, that he had more reason to favour and respect them, than he had to assist the Canaanites; against whom, Esau his Ancestor had made Warr, and driven out the Horites (who were of their antient Races descended of Cham) out of the Region of Seir, calling it by his own name, Edom, or Idumæa. He also making a short repetition of Gods blessings bestow'd on them, & of his purposes; and promises assured Edom, or the King thereof that he would no way offend his people, or waste his Countrey, but that he would restrain his Army within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high ways, paying money for whatsoever he used, yea, even for the water, which themselves or their cattel should drink. For Moses was commanded by God, not to provoke the children of Esau. But the King of Idumæa, knowing the strength of his own Countrey, the same being near Canaan, rampir'd with high and sharp mountains; and withall suspecting, as a natural wise man, that 600000. strangers being once entred his Countrey, it would rest in their wills to give him law, resolvedly refused them passage, and delivered this answer to the Messengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and resist them by all possible means. And not knowing whether such a denial might satisfie or exasperate, he gathered the strength of his Countrey together, ther, and shewed himself prepared to defend their passage. For, as it is written, Numb. 20. Then Edom came out against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moses understanding, that the end of his enterprise was not the conquest of Seir, or Idumæa, and that the Land promised, was that of Canaan: like unto himself, who was of natural understanding the greatest of any man, and the skilfullest man of Warr that the World had, he refused to adventure the Army of Israel against a Nation, which being overcome, gave but a passage to invade others; and which, by reason of the seat of their mountainous Countrey, could not but have endangered, or (at least) greatly enfeebled the strength of Israel, and rendred them less able, if not altogether powerless, to have conquered the rest.

§. VI.

Of their compassing Idumæa, and travelling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

HE therefore leaving the way of Idumæa, turned himself towards the East, and marched towards the Desarts of Moab. Which, when Arad the King of the Canaanites understood, and that Moses had blanched the way of Idumæa; and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which Israel aimed at, he thought it safest, rather to find his enemies in his neighbours Countrey, than to be found by them in his own; which he might have done with a farr greater hope of victory, had Moses been enforced first to have made his way by the Sword through Idumæa, and thereby, though victorious, greatly have lessened his numbers. But although it fell out otherwise than Arad hoped for, yet, being resolved to make trial, what courage the Israelites brought with them out of Egypt, before they came nearer his own home; leading the strength of his Nation to the edge of the Desart, he set upon some part of the Army; which, for the multitude occupied a great space, and for the many herds of cattel that they drave with them, could not encamp so near together, but that some quarter or other was evermore subject to surprise. By which advantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance unexpected, he slew some few of the Israelites, and carried with him many prisoners.

Now, it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predecessor, which joyned Numb. 14. 45. his forces with the Amalekites, and gave an overthrow to those mutinous Israelites, which, without direction from God by Moses, would have entred Canaan from Cadesbarne. For it seemeth, that the greatest number of that Army were of the Canaanites, because in the first of Deuteronomy 44. the Amorites are named alone, without the Amalekites, and are said to have beaten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the same that had a victory over Israel, near Cadesbarne; or if it were his Predecessor that then prevailed; this man finding that Moses was returned from the Red Sea, and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was first to be invaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moses purpose to pass Moab, determined, while he was yet in the Desart, to try the quarrel. And whereas it followeth in the third Verse of the twelfth Chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites utterly destroyed the Canaanites, and their Cities, they are much mistaken that think, that this destruction was presently performed by the Israelites. But it is to be understood, to have been done in the future, to wit, in the time of Josua. For, had Moses at this time entred Canaan in the persute of Arad, he would not have fallen back again into the Desarts of Zin and Moab, and have fetch'd a wearisome and needless compass, by the Rivers of Zared and Arnon.

Neither is their conjecture to be valued at any thing, which affirm, that Arad did not inhabit any part of Canaan it self, but that his Territory lay without it, and near to the Mountain Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. Numb. 33. 40. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt; which South part of Canaan, was the North part of Edom.

Again, Horma (for so farr the Israelites, after their victory, persued the Canaanites) is seated in the South of Judæa. There is also a City of that name in Simeon. But there is no such place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutiny which followed presently after the repetition of this Victory, it were enough to prove, that the same was obtained in the future, and in Josua his time, and not at the instant of Arads assault. For, had the Israelites at this time sack'd the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day have complained for want of Water and Bread. For where there are great Cities, there is also Water and Bread. But it was in the time of Josua, that the Israelites took their revenge, and after they had pass'd Jordan; Josua then governing them, who in the twelfth Chapter and fourteenth Verse, nameth this Arad by the

the name of his City so called; and with him the King of Horma; to which place the Israelites persued the Canaanites. And he named them amongst those Kings, which he vanquished, and put to death.

Now, after this assault, and surprize by Arad, Moses finding that all entrance on that side was defended, he led the people Eastward to compass Idumæa, and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plains of Moab, at that time in the possession of the Amorites. But the Israelites, to whom the very name of a Desart was terrible, began again to rebel against their Leader; till God by a multitude of fiery Serpents (that is, by the biting of Serpents, whose Venom inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentiful grace, cured them again by their beholding an artificial Serpent, by his commandment set up.

From the Mount Hor, Moses leaving the ordinary way which lyeth between the Red Sea and Cœlosyria, encamped at Zalmona; and thence he removed to Phunon, where he erected the Brazen Serpent; making these journies by the edg of Idumæa, but without it. For Phunon was sometime a principal City of the Edomites. Now, where it is written in Numb. 21. 4. That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieved the people, it was not thereby meant, that the Israelites turned back towards the Red Sea; neither did they march (according to Fonseca) per viam quæ habet à latere mare rubrum; By the way that sided the Red Sea, but indeed they cross'd; and went athwart the common way from Galaad, Traconitis, and the Countreys of Moab, to the Red Sea, that is, to Esiongaber, Eloth, and Midian; which way, as it lay North and South, so Israel, to shun the border of Edom, and to take the utmost East part of Moab, cross'd the common way towards the East, and then they turned again towards the North, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboth, where he entred the Territory of Moab, adjoyning to the Land of Supk, a Countrey bordering on the Dead Sea; and from thence to Abarim, the eight and thirtieth Mansion, that is, where the Mountains so called take beginning, and are as yet but small Mountures of Hills, on the East border of Moab; from thence they recovered Dibon Gad, or the River of Zared, which riseth in the Mountains of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not farr from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And having pass'd that River, they lodged at Dibon Gad, and from thence they kept the way to Diblathaim, one of the Cities of Moab; which Hieremy the Prophet, Chap. 48. Vers. 22. calleth the House of Diblathaim, the same which afterward was destroyed among the rest by Nebuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the River Arnon, and encamped in the Mountains of Abarim; though in the 22. of Numbers, Moses doth not remember Helmondiblathaim, but speaketh of his remove from the River of Zared, immediately to the other side of Arnon; calling Arnon the border of Moab, between them and the Amorites; speaking as he found the state of the Countrey at that time. For Arnon was not antiently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon, King of the Amorites; even from the Predecessor of Balac Peor then raigning. From Diblathaim, Moses sent messengers to Sehon, King of the Amorites, to desire a passage through his Countrey; which, though he knew would be denyed him, yet he desired to give a reason to the neighbour Nations of the Warr he undertook. And though Edom had refused him as Sehon did, yet he had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moses also in sending messengers to Sehon, observed the same precept which he left to his Posterity and Successors, for a law of the Warr; namely, in Deut. 20. 10. in these words; When thou comest neer unto a City to fight against it, thou shalt offer it peace; which if it do accept of, and open unto thee, then let all the people found therein be tributaries unto thee, and serve thee; but if it refuse, &c. thou shalt smite all the males thereof with the edg of the sword. Which ordinance all Commanders of armies have observed to this day, or ought to have done.

Of the Book of the battels of the Lord, mentioned in this Story, and of other Books mentioned in Scripture, which are lost.

NOw, concerning the Warr between Israel and Sehon, Moses seemeth to referr a great part of this Story to that Book, entituled, Liber bellorum Domini; The book of Gods battels: and therefore passeth over many encounters, and other things memorable, with greater brevity in this place. His words, after the Geneva Translation, are these: Wherefore it shall be spoken in the book of the battels of the Lord, what things he did in the Red Sea, and in the Rivers of Arnon. The Vulgar Copy differeth not in sense from this: But the Greek Septuagint vary. For the Greek writes it to this effect; For thus Numb. 21. 14.

it is said in the book: The Warr of the Lord hath burnt (or inflamed) Zoob, and the brooks of Arnon. Junius for the Red Sea, which is in the Genevian and Vulgar Edition, names the Region of Suph, a Country bordering the Dead Sea towards the East, as he conjecture th. The Text, he readeth thus. Idcircò dici solet in recensione bellorū Jehovæ, contra Vahebum in Regione Suph; & contra flumina, flumina Arnonis; Therefore is it spoken in repeating of the battels of Jehovah, against Vaheb in the Countrey of Suph, and against the Rivers, the Rivers of Arnon. In which words he understands, that amongst the Warrs which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memory in the mouth of most men, concerning the Warr of Sehon against Vaheb, the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Country near Arnon, out of the possession of the Moabites. For this Vaheb was the immediate Predecessor of Balac, who lived with Moses; though it be written that this Balac was the Son of Zippor, and not of Vaheb. For, it seems (as it is plain in the succession of the Edomites) that these Kingdoms were elective, and not successive. And as Junius in this Translation understandeth no special Book of the battels of the Lord: so others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any special Book be meant; and if any, whether it be not a prediction of Wars in future ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the book of Judges. Syracides, cap. 46. tells us plainly, that those battels of the Lord were fought by Josua; Who was there (saith he) before him like to him? for he fought the battels of the Lord. But seeing the Histories of the Scripture elsewhere often pass over matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other books written of the same matter at large; therefore it seemeth probable, that such a book as this there was; wherein the several victories by Israel obtained, and also victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the same should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with divine discourse, have perished in the long race of time, or have been destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrates. For the Books of Henoch, howsoever they have been in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembred in an Epistle of Thaddæus, and cited by Origen, περὶ ἀρχῶν, and by Tertullian.

That work also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others bestow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The Books remembred by Josua, Chap. 10 Vers. 13. and in the second of Samuel, Chap. 1. Vers. 18. called the Book of Jasher, or Justorum, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sun and Moon in the middest of the Heavens is recorded, and how they stood still till Israel had avenged themselves of their enemies; out of which also David took the Precept of teaching the Children of Juda, to exercise their Bows against their Enemies.

Some think this to be the Book of eternal Predestination, in which the just are written, according unto the sixty and ninth Psalm, Vers. 28. where it is said; Let them be put out of the book of Life, neither let them be written with the Righteous. Hierom thinks that David by this Book, understood those of Samuel; Rabbi Solomon, that the Books of the Law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the just Abraham, of Isaac, Jacob, and Moses are written. Others, that it is was the Book of Exodus. Others, as Theodoretus, that is was a Commentary upon Josua, by an unknown Author.

The Book of Chozai, concerning Manasse, remembred in the second of Chron. Chap. 33. v. 18, and 19. Of this Book, also lost, Hierom conceives, that the Prophet Esay was the Author.

The same mischance came as well to the Story of Solomon, written by Ahia Silonites, who met with Jeroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdom of Israel from the Son of Solomon: As to the Books of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Jeedo the Seer, remembred in the second of Chron. Chap. 9. Vers. 29. With these have the Books of Shemaiah and of Iddo, remembred in the second of Chron. Chap. 12. Vers. 15. perished; and that of Jehu the Son of Hanani, of the acts of Jehosaphat, cited in the second of Chron. Chap. 20. Vers. 34. Also that Book of Solomon, which the Hebrews write Hascirim, of 5000. Verses, of which, that part called Canticum Canticorum, onely remaineth, 1 Kings 4. 32. and with this, divers others of Solomon's works have perished, as his Book of the natures of Trees, Plants, Beasts, Fishes, &c. 1 Kings 4. 33. with the rest remembred by Origen, Josephus, Hierom, Cedrenus, Ciccus Asculanus, Picus Mirandula, and others.

Of these, and other Books many were consumed with the same fire, wherewith Nebuchadnezzar burnt the Temple of Hierusalem. But let us return thither where we left.

Of Moses his sparing the issue of Lot; and of the Giants in those parts; and of Sehon and Og.

WHen Moses had past Arnon, he incamped on the other side thereof at Abarim, opposite to the City of Nibo; leaving the City of Midian on the left hand, and attempting nothing upon the Moabites on that side. For Moab did at this time inhabite on the South-side of Arnon, having lost all his antient and best Territory, which was now in the possession of Sehon the Amorite. For Moses was commanded by God not to molest Moab, neither to provoke them to battel, God having given that Land to the children of Lot; the same which was antiently possest by the Emims, who were men of great stature, and comparable to those Giants called Anakims, or the sons of Anac.

Deut. 2. 9, 10, 11, 12.

God also commanded Moses to spare the Ammonites, because they likewise were descended of Lot: who had expelled from thence those Giants, which the Ammonites called Zamzummims. For it seemeth that all that part, especially to the East of Jordan, even to the Desart of Arabia, as well on the West, as on the East-side of the Mountains of Gilead, was inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promised, the Israelites did not at any time pass those Mountains to the East of Basan, but left their Countrey to them, as in the description following is made manifest. We find also, that as there were many Giants both before and after the floud: so these Nations, which antiently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the Land it self, had among them many Families of Giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which sometimes was called the City of Arbah, which Arbah in Josua is called the father of the Anakims; and the greatest man of the Anakims. There had also been Giants in the Land of the Moabites, called Emims: and their chief City was Aroer or Ar, near the River of Arnon. To the Giants of the Rephaims, the Ammonites gave the name of Zamzummims; which were of the same antient Canaanites: and their chief City was Rabba, afterward Philadelphia. They were also called Zuzims, which is as much to say, as Viri robusti, horrendique Gigantes; Strong men, and fearful Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Ham, or Hom, in the same Province, and not far to the North of Aroer.

Jos. 15. v. 13, 14, 15.

Now Moses having past Arnon, and being incamped at Abarim; and having (as before) sent to Sehon, as he had done to Edom, to pray a passage through his Countrey, was denied it. For Sehon being made proud by his former conquest upon Vaheb the Moabite; which Nation the Amorites esteemed but as strangers and usurpers, (themselves being of the sons of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refused to grant Israel any entrance that way; and withal, prepared to encounter Moses with as much speed as he could, because Moses incamped in the Countrey of his new conquests, to wit, the Plains of Moab, the two and fortieth and last Mansion: which Moses wasted with the multitude of his people and cattel. Towards him therefore hasting himself, they encountred each other at Jahaz: where Sehon with his children and people were broken and discomfited, and the victory so pursued by Moses, as few or none of the Amorites escaped. He also slaughtered all the Women and Children of the Amorites, which he found in Essebon, and all the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as those of Basan also were, and descended of Emoreus, or Amoreus: for Moses calleth the Basanites also Amorites. And although Israel might now have taken a ready way and passage into Judæa, being at this time, and after this victory, at the banks of Jordan: yet he knew it to be perillous to leave so great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his back, as inhabited all the Region of Basan, or Traconitis: and therefore he led on his Army to invade Og, a person of exceeding strength and stature, and the only man of mark remaining of the antient Giants of those parts, and who at that time had 60 Cities walled and defenced: lying between the Mountain of Hermon (which Mountain, saith Moses, the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites, Shenir) and the River of Jordan. And it befell unto the King of Basan (who attended Moses coming at Edrei) as it did unto Sehon: for he and his sons perished, and all his Cities were taken and possest. After this, Moses with-drawing himself back again to the Mountains of Abarim, left the prosecution of that war unto Jair the son of Manasse: who conquering the East parts of Basan, to wit, the Kingdom of Argob, even unto the Nations of the Gessuri and Machati, &c. walled Cities, called the same after his own name Havoth Jair: of all which conquests afterward the half Tribe of Manasse possest the North part as far as Edrei, but the East part that belonged to Sehon the Amorite, with the Mountains of Gilead adjoyning, was given to Reuben, and unto Gad.

Of the troubles about the Madianites, and of Moſes his death.

AFter theſe victories, and while Iſrael ſojourned in the valley of Moab, the Madianites and Moabites (over both which Nations it ſeemeth that Balac King of the Moabites then commanded in chief) ſought, according to the advice of Balaam, both by alluring the Hebrews to the love of their daughters, and by perſuading them to honour and ſerve their Idols, to divide them both in Love and Religion among themſelves: thereby the better both to defend their own intereſt againſt them, as alſo to beat them out of Moab, and the Countries adjoyning. The Iſraelites as they had ever been enclined, ſo were they now eaſily perſuaded to theſe evil courſes, and thereby drew on themſelvs the plague of peſtilence, whereof there periſhed 24000. perſons: beſides which puniſhment of God, the moſt of the offenders among the Hebrews, were by his commandment put to the Sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the ſon of Eleazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simeonites, together with Cosbi, a Daughter of one of the chief of the Midianites, the Plague ceaſed, and Gods wrath was appeaſed. For ſuch was the love and kindneſs of his all-powerfulneſs, reſpecting the ardent zeal of Phineas in proſecuting of Zimri (who being a chief among the Hebrews, become an Idolater) as he forgave the reſt of Iſrael, and ſtayed his hand for his ſake. Nu. 25. 1.

In this valley it was that Moſes cauſed the people to be numbred the third time: and there remained of able men fit to bear arms 601730. of which, as his laſt enterpriſe, he appointed 12000. to be choſen out, to invade the Cities of Midian, who, together with the Moabites, practiſed with Balaam to curſe Iſrael: and after that, ſought to allure them (as before remembred) from the worſhip of the true God, to the ſervice of Beth-Peor: and to the reſt of their barbarous Idolatry. Over which Companies of 12000. Moſes gave the charge to Phineas the ſon of Eleazar the high Prieſt: who ſlew the five Princes of the Midianites, which were, or had lately been, the vaſſals of Sehon, as appeareth by Joſuah. Theſe five Princes of the Midianites ſlain by Eleazar, were at this time but the vaſſals of Sehon the Amorite, to wit, Evi, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Rera, the Dukes of Sehon, ſaith Joſuah. He ſlew alſo the men, male-children, and women: ſaving ſuch as had not yet uſed the company of men, but thoſe they ſaved, and diſpers'd them among the children of Iſrael to ſerve them. Nu. 16 31. Nu. 31. 8. Joſ. 13. 21. Cap. 13. 21.

And Moſes having now lived 120. years, making both his own weakneſs of body known to the people, and his unability to travel: and alſo that he was forewarned of his end by the Spirit of God, from whom he received a new commandment to aſcend the Mountains of Abarim, and thereon to render up his life: He haſtned to ſettle the government in Joſua, whom he perſuaded with moſt lively arguments to proſecute the conqueſt begun, aſſuring him of Gods favour and aſſiſtance therein. And ſo having ſpent theſe his latter days after the conqueſt of Og, and Sehon King of the Amorites, in the repetition and expoſition of the Law, (or an iteration of the Law, according to Saint Auguſtine) uſing both arguments, prayers, and threats unto the people, which he often repeated unto them; thereby to confirm them in knowledg, love, fear, and ſervice of the all-powerful God: He bleſſed the twelve Tribes, that of Simeon excepted, with ſeveral and moſt comfortable bleſſings: praiſing the greatneſs and goodneſs of him, unto whom in his prayers he commended them: He alſo commanded the Prieſts to lay up the Book of the Law, by the ſide of the Ark of God, The laſt that he indited, was that Prophetical Song, beginning: Hearken ye Heavens, and I will ſpeak, and let the Earth hear the words of my mouth: and being called by God from the labours and ſorrows of this life, unto that Reſt which never afterward hath diſquiet, he was buried in the Land of Moab, over againſt Beth-Peor: but no man knoweth of his Sepulcher to this day; which happened in the year of the World, 2554. Deut. 31. 1. Deut. 31. 2. Aug. l. 4. *de Mirab. Obſervations out of the Story of Moſes, how God diſpoſeth both the ſmalleſt occaſions, and the greateſt reſiſtances, to the effecting of his purpoſe.

NOw let us a little, for inſtruction, look back to the occaſions of ſundry of the great events, which have been mentioned in this Story of the life of Moſes, for (excepting Gods miracles, his promiſe, and fore-choice of this people) he wrought in all things elſe by the medium of mens affections, and natural appetites. And ſo we ſhall find that the fear which Pharaoh had of the increaſe of the Hebrews, multiplyed by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next natural cauſe of of the sorrows and loss, which befel himself, and the Egyptian Nation: which numbers when he sought by cruel and ungodly policies to cut off and lessen, as when he commanded all the male children of the Hebrews to be slain, God (whose providence cannot be resisted, nor his purposes prevented by all the foolish and salvage craft of mortal men) moved compassion in the heart of Pharaoh's own daughter, to preserve that child, which afterward became the most wise, and of all men the most gentle and mild, the most excellently learned in all Divine and Humane knowledge, to be the conductor and deliverer of his oppressed brethren, and the overthrow of Pharaoh, and all the flower of his Nation; even then, when he sought by the strength of his men of War, of his Horse, and Chariots, to tread them under, and bury them in the dust. The grief which Moses conceived of the injuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrews in his own presence, moved him to take revenge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his own Nation, by threatning him to discover the slaughter of the Egyptian, moved him to fly into Madian: the contention between the Shepherds of that place, and Jethro's Daughters, made him known to their Father; who not onely entertained him, but married him to one of those Sisters: and in that Solitary life of keeping of his Father-in-Law's sheep, far from the preass of the World, contenting himself (though bred as a Kings Son) with the Lot of a poor Heardsman, God found him out in that Desart wherein he first suffered him to live many years, the better to know the waies and passages through which he purposed that he should conduct his people, toward the Land promised: and therein appearing unto him, he made him know his will and divine pleasure for his return into Egypt. The like may be said of all things else, which Moses afterward by God's direction performed in the Story of Israel before remembred. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seem unto men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence, but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many years after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their coming out of Egypt; and of the Men of renown in other Nations, about the times of Moses and Josua; with the sum of the History of Josua.

§. I.

How the Nations with whom the Israelites were to have War, were divers waies, as it were prepared to be their Enemies.

IN like manner, if we look to the quality of the Nations, with whom the Israelites, after their coming out of Egypt, had to do, either in the Wilderness, or afterward, we shall find them long before-hand, by the disposing providence of God, as it were, prepared for enmity: partly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Canaan, or at least of Ham; and the rest (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Israelites) were mingled with them by mutual marriages: whereas the Israelites still continued strangers, and separate from them: and so partly in this respect, and partly by antient injuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diversity in Religion, were these Nations, as it were, prepared to be enemies to the Israelites: and so to serve for such purposes as God had reserved them for. To make these things more manifest, we must understand that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountains of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the same mountains continued as far as the Springs of Arnon on the East: by the way of Egypt, and the Red Sea, on the South: and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the sons of Cham, the other from Sem: but those of Sem, were but as ſtrangers therein for a long time, and came thither, in effect, but with * one Family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kinred. The other for the greateſt part, were the Canaanites, the antient Lords and poſſeſſors of thoſe Territories, by proceſs of time divided into ſeveral Families and Names: whereof ſome of them were of eminent ſtature and ſtrength, as the Anakims, Zamzummims, or Zuzei, Emims, Horites, and others. Theſe (as men moſt valiant and able commonly do) did inhabite the utter borders and Mountains of their Countries: the reſt were the Zidonians, Jebuſites, Amorites, Hevites, Hetites, and others, who took name after the ſons of Canaan, and after whom the Countrey in general was ſtill called.

It ſeemeth alſo that Hus, the Son of Nachor, and Buz his Brother, planted themſelvs in the Eaſt ſide of Jordan, about Baſan: whereby they find the Land of Hus, in which Job dwelt as one of the iſſue of Hus, the Son of Nachor, and Eliha, his friend who is called a Buzite. See hereafter chap. 10. ſect. 7.

As for the Hebrews which deſcended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another Family, and ſtrangers in that Country, eſpecially the Iſraelites: and this was ſome cauſe that the Canaanites did not affect them, or indure them, no more than the Philiſtims did, who deſcended alſo of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himſelf, being a ſtranger, was highly eſteemed and honoured among them; eſpecially by the Amorites inhabiting the Weſt part of Jordan: yet now even they which deſcended from Abraham, or from his kinred, abode and multiplied in thoſe parts, were alienated in affections from the Iſraelites, as holding them ſtrangers and intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the reſt of the iſſue of Cham, with whom they dayly contracted affinity, than of their old pedigree from Abraham.

Ex. 17. 16.

Deut. 11. 5.

True it is, that theſe Nations deſcended of Abraham, or of his kinred, who had linked themſelves, and marched with the Canaanites and others, had ſo far poſſeſt themſelves of the borders of thoſe Regions, as they began to be equal in ſtrength to the bordering Canaanites, if not ſuperiour. For of Lot came thoſe two great Families of the Moabites, and Ammonites: of Eſau the Idumæans: of Madian the Madianites: of Iſmael the eldeſt ſon of Abraham, came the Iſmaelites, with whom are joyned, as of the ſame Nation, the Amalekites; whom though the more common opinion thinketh to have been a Tribe of Edom, becauſe Eſau had a grand-child of that name, yet manifeſt reaſon convinceth it to have been otherwiſe.

Deut. 11. 5. For the Iſraelites were forbidden to provoke the Edomites, or do them any wrong;

Ex. 17. 16. whereas contrariwiſe Amalek was curſed, and endleſs war decreed againſt him: but hereof more elſewhere, Chap. 8. §. 3. Of Iſmael's eldeſt ſon Naboth ſprung the Arabians of Petræa, called Nabathæi. Now even as Abraham beſought God to bleſs Iſmael, ſo it pleaſed him both to promiſe and perform it. For of him thoſe twelve Princes came, which in- Gen. 17. habited, in effect, all that Tract of Land between Havilah upon Tygris, and Sur which is the Weſt part of the Deſart of Arabia Petræa. Yet howſoever the ſtrength of theſe later named Nations, which deſcended from Abraham, were great; it is not unlikely, but that ſome reaſon which moved them not to favour the entrance of the Iſraelites into Canaan, was in reſpect of fear: becauſe all Princes and States do not wilingly permit any ſtranger or powerful Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all theſe Families before named, were not ſo united in and among themſelves, but that they had their jealouſies of each other, and contended for dominion: yet fearing a third more ſtrong than themſelves, whether they ſtood apart or united, they were taught by the care of their own preſervation, to joyn themſelves together againſt Iſrael: though they did it nothing ſo maliciouſly and reſolvedly as the Canaanites did. For the Edumæans onely denied the Hebrews a paſſage, which the Moabites durſt not deny: becauſe their Country lay more open; and becauſe themſelves had lately been beaten out of the richeſt part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites their Country lay altogether out of the way, and the ſtrength of Sehon and Og, Kings of the Amorites, was interjacent: and beſides that, the border of the Ammonites was ſtrong by reaſon of the mountains which divided it from Baſan. Again, that which moved the Nu. 21. 24. Moabites in their own reaſon not much to interrupt Iſrael, in the conqueſt of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his confederate, was, that the Moabites might hope, after ſuch a time as the Amorites were beaten by Moſes, that themſelves might recover again their own inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plains lying between the mountains of Arabia and Jordan: But as ſoon as Sehon was ſlain, and that the King of Moab, Balac, perceived that Moſes allotted that Valley to the Tribes of Gad and Reuben, he began to practiſe with Balaam againſt Iſrael, and by the daughters of Midian, as aforeſaid, to allure them to Idolatry: and thus at the length the Moabites, by ſpecial occaſion, were more and more ſtirred up to enmity againſt Iſrael. And as for divers of the reſt that were deſcended from Abraham's kinred, we may note, how in the beginning, between the Authours of their Pedigrees, God permitted ted some enmities to be, as it were, presages of future quarrels, which in the posterity might be the easier incensed by the memory of old grudges: and withall, by some disdain from the elder in nature to the younger. For the Ismaelites being descended from the eldest son of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest son of Isaac, Jacob, being but a second son, of a second brother; those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses, being natural men, might scorn to give place, much less to subject themselvs to their inferiours, as they took it: and for a more aggravation, the issues of Esau, Princes of Idumæa, might keep in record, that their Parent was bought out of his birthright by Jacob's taking his advantage, and that he was deceived of his Father's blessing also by him: and that Jacob, after reconciliation, came not unto him as he promised, into Seir or Idumæa.

Gen. 25. Gen. 27. Gen. 33 14.

So also in the posterity of Ismael, it might remain as a seed or pretence of enmity, that their fore-father was by the instigation of Sara, cast out into the Desart, with his mother Hagar; and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angel to relieve them. Ismael also had an Egyptian both to his Mother and to his Wife: and Amalec was also an Horite by his Mother: which Horites were of the antient Canaanites. The Edumæans also, or Edomites, were by their Maternal line descended of the Canaanites. For Esau took two wives of that Nation: one of them was Adath, the daughter of Elon, the Hittite; and the other Aholibamah, the grand-child of Zibeon, the Hevite, Lord of Seir, before the same was conquered by Esau, and called after his name, Edom, or Edumæa.

Gen. 36.

Lastly it appeareth that all those Families of the Ismaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in process of time corrupted, and drawn from the knowledg and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conversation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those wives of the Canaanites which they had married: onely a few of the Kenites and those Madianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, whereof Jethro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and ever-living God.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the antient Wars of the Israelites.

OF the Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham (for Melchizedek may be thought to be of a better Pedigree) we find four named by Moses: and one and thirty remembred by Josua, though few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities over which they commanded: to which each of them had a small Territory adjoyning, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a general consideration are to be understood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, Gergesites, Hevites, &c. and so here we understand this name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Country of their habitation, the holy Land, or the Land of promise: for God hath appointed that the seven principle Families should be rooted out, and that his own people should inherit their Lands and Cities. But if we consider of the name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Jordan, on the East, and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: in which narrow Country, and in the choisest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternal name chiefly inhabited.

The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor or Hemer, of the Hevites, whom Simeon and Levi slew, together with his Son Sichem, in revenge of their sisters ravishment. Gen 34.

Arad was the second King which the Scriptures have remembred, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the dead Sea; the same which surprised Israel, as they encamped in the Wilderness in the edge of Edumæa. Num. 21. 1.

The third named was Sehon King of Essebon, who before Moses arrival had beaten the Moabites out of the West part of Arabia Petræa, or Nabathea, and thrust them over Arnon into the Desarts, the same whom Moses overthrew in the plains of Moab: at which time he took Essebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites. Num. 21. 24.

Jos. 9. Josephus antiq. lib. 4. c. 5.

Presently after which victory, Og was also slain by Israel, who commanded the North part of that Valley between the Mountains Traconi, or Galaad, and Jordan, who was also a King of the Amorites. Num. 21. 35.

The fifth was Adonizedek King of the Jebusites, and of Hierusalem, with whom Josua nameth four other Kings.

Hoham,

Hoham, King of Hebron.
Piram, King of Jarmuth.
Japia, King of Lachis: and Deber, King of Eglon, who were all Amorites overthrown in battel; and hanged by Josua. After this overthrow Josua nameth Jabin, King of Hazor, and Josua 10. Joseph ant. l. 5. cap 1.

Jobab, King of Madon: whom he also slaughtered, and took his Cities: and this Jabin seemed to have some dominion over the rest; for it is said in the Text, For Hazor before times was the head of all those Kingdoms.

Jos. 11. 1.

After these Adonibezek that notorious Tyrant is named: who confest that he had cut off the thumbs of the hands and feet of seventy Kings, inforcing them to gather crumbs under his Table: who, after Juda and Simeon had used the same execution upon himself, acknowledged it to be a just revenge of God: this King was carried to Hierusalem where he died.

Jud. 1. Joseph. l. 5. c. 2.

The last King named is Jabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Josua. For at such time as he employed Sisara against Israel, whom he oppresst twenty years after the death of Ehud, he inhabited Hazor. This Jabin, Barac (encouraged by Debora) overthrew; and his Captain Sisara had by Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, a nail driven into his head while he slept in her Tent: Jabin himself perishing afterward in that war.

Jud. 4. Jud 4. Psal. 83.

The Madianites had also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites: and they held a corner of Land in Nabathea: to the South-East of the Dead Sea. They descended from Madian Abrahams son, by Cethura. Raguel surnamed Gethegleus or Jethres, saith Josephus, called Jethro in Exodus, Kenis in the first of Judges, the son of Dathan, the grand-child of Jexanis, or Joksham, the great grand-child of Abraham by Cethura, was Priest or Prince of the Madianites by the Red Sea: whose Daughter or Neece, Moses married, and of whom, I have spoken elsewhere more at large. This Jethro, if he were not the same with Hobab, must be his father: and this Hobab had seven daughters. He guided Moses in the Wilderness, and became one of the Israelites: of him descended the Kenites, so called of his father Raguels surname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Jabin the second, even now remembred.

Joseph. l. 5. c. 6. Exod. 3. Cedren. p. 34. Jud. 5.

At such time as Saul invaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Kenites to Israel, gave them warning to separate themselves: and yet the Kenites had strong seats, and lived in the mountains of the Desarts.

1 Sam. 15. 6.

The Kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find named, were these:

1. Homer the Hevite of Sichem
2. Arad of the South parts
3. Sehon of Essebon
4. Og of Basan
5. Adonizedek the Jebusite, King of Hierusalem. Jos. 10.
6. Hoham of Hebron
7. Piram of Jarmuth
8. Japia of Lachis
9. Debir of Eglon
10. Jabin of Hazor
11. Jobab of Modon. Jos. 11.
12. Adonibezek of Bezek, and
13. Jabin the second King of Hazar.

Of the Madianites these:

* Evi or Evis.
Rekam or Recem, who built Petra the Metropolis of Petræa, so called by the Greeks: and by Esay, cap. 16. v. 1. and Selah, which is as much as Petra: and so also it is called 2 Reg. 14. 7. where it is also called Joktheel.
Zur
Hur and
Reba
* Oreb
Zeb
Zebah
Zalmunna.

* These five were first all at one time Kings of several portions of the Madianites, slain by Phineas, and the 12000. which he led against them: Num. 31. 8.
* These four last were likewise at one time slain in the pursuit of Gideons victory, Jud. c. 7. v. 25. & c. 8. v. 12.

After the death of Barac, Judge of Israel, the four last named of these Madianite Kings vexed Israel seven years: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit, Oreb and Zeb, were taken and slain by the Ephraimites, at the passage of Jordan, as in the 6. 7. and 8. of Judges it is written at large. Afterward in the pursuit of the rest, Gideon himself laid hands upon Zebah and Salmana, or Zalmunna, and executed them, being prisoners; in which expedition of Gideon there perished 120000. of the Madianites and their confederates. Of the Idumæans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speak hereafter in the description of their Territories.

§. III.

Of the Amalekites and Ismaelites.

OF the Kings of the Amalekites and Ismaelites, I find few that are named; and though of the Ismaelites there were more in number than of the rest (for they were multiplied into a greater Nation, according unto the promise of God made unto Abraham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Midi-

Gen. 17. 20. Jud. c. 7.

Midianites were numbered among them, were more renowned in Moses time than the rest of the Ismaelites. So also were they when Saul governed Israel. For Saul pursued them from Sur unto Havilah, to wit, over a great part of Arabia Petræa, and the Desart. The reason to me seemeth to be this: That the twelve Princes which came of Ismael, were content to leave those barren Desarts of Arabia Petræa, called Sur, Paran, and Sin, to the issue of Abraham by Cethura, that joyned with them (for so seem the Amalekites to have been, and so were the Madianites:) themselves taking possession of a better soil in Arabia the Happy, and about the Mountains of Galaad in Arabia Petræa: For Nabaioth the eldest of those twelve Princes planted that part of Arabia Petræa; which was very fruitful, though adjoyning to the Desart in which Moses wandred, afterward called Nabathea: the same which neighboureth Judæa on the East-side. They also peopled a Province in Arabia the Happy, whereof the people were in after-times called Napathæi (B) changed into (P.)

Kedar, the second of Ismaels sons, gave his own name to the East-part of Basan, or Batanea, which was afterward possest by Manasse, so much thereof as lay within the mountains Traconi, or Gilead. Which Nation Lampridius calleth Kedarens, and Pliny, Cedræans.

Abbeel sat down in the Desart Arabia, near the Mountains which divide it from the Happy: and gave name to the Adubens, which Ptolomy calleth Agubens.

Mibsam was the Parent of the Masamancuses, near the Mountain Zamath, in the same Arabia the Happy.

The Raabens were of Mishma: who joyned to the Orchens, near the Arabian gulf, where Ptolomy setteth Zagmais.

Of Duma were the Dumæans, between the Adubens and Raabens: where the City Dumeth sometimes stood.

Of Massa the Massani, and of Hadar, or Chadar, the Athritæ, who bordered the Napatheans in the same Happy Arabia.

Thema begat the Themaneans, among the Arabian Mountains, where also the City of Thema is seated.

Of Jetur the Ituræans, or Camathens: of whom Tohu was King in Davids time. Plin. l. 6. c. 28.

Of Naphri, the Nubeian Arabians, inhabiting Syria Zoba: over whom Adadezer commanded, while David ruled Israel.

Cadma, the last and twelfth of Ismaels sons, was the Ancestor of the Cadmonæans: who were afterward called Asitæ, because they worshiped the Fire with the Babylonians. Junius.

The Amalekites gave their Kings the name of Agag, as the Egyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the antient Syrians, Adad to theirs, and the Arabian Nabatheans, Aretas, as names of Honour.

The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moses after he past the Red Sea: when of all times they flourished most, and yet were vanquished. Exod. 17.

Afterward they joyned with the Canaanites, and beat the Israelites near Cadesbarne. After the government of Othoniel, they joyned them with the Moabites: after Barac, with the Madianites, and invaded Israel. God commanded that as soon as Israel had rest, they should root out the name of the Amalekites: which Saul executed in part, when he wasted them from the border of Egypt, to the border of Chaldæa: from Havilah to Shur. Num. 14.

In Davids time they took Siklag in Simeon: but David followed them, and surprised them, recovering his prisoners and spoils. And yet, after David became King, they again vexed him, but to their own loss. 1 Sam. 30.

In Ezekias time, as many of them as joyned to Edumæa, were wasted and displanted by the children of Simeon. 2 Sam. 8. 12.

§. IV.

Of the instauration of Civility in Europe about these times, and of Prometheus and Atlas.

THere lived at this time, and in the same age together with Moses, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily strength as in all sorts of learning. And as the World was but even now enriched with the written Law of the living God, so did Art and Civility (bred and fostered far off in the East, and in Egypt) begin at this time to discover a passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, neighbouring Asia and Judæa. For if Pelasgus, besides his bodily strength, was chosen King of Arcadia, because he taught those people to erect them simple Cottages, to defend them from rain and storm: and learned them withal to make a kind of Meale, and bread of Acorns, who before lived, for the most part, by Herbs and Roots: we may thereby judge how poor and wretched those times were, and how falsly those Nations have vaunted of those their antiquities, accompanied not only with civil learning, but with all other kindes of knowledg. And it was in this age of the World, as both Eusebius and S. Augustine have observed, that Prometheus flourished: Quem propterea ferunt de luto formasse homines Aug. l. 18. c. 8. de civit. Dei.

homines, quia optimus sapientiæ doctor fuisse perhibetur; Of whom it is reported, that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of wisdom: and so Theophrastus expoundeth the invention of fire ascribed to Prometheus, Ad inventa sapientiæ pertinere; To have reference to wise inventions: and Æschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Jupiters fire was meant, that the knowledg of Prometheus reached to the Stars, and other celestial bodies. Again, it is written of him, that he had the art so to use this fire, as thereby he gave life to the Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning, that before his birth and being, those people among whom he lived, had nothing else worthy of men, but external form and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his entrails the while devoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and restless desire he had to investigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of heavenly bodies; for so it is said: Ideo altissimum ascendisse Caucasum, ut sereno cœlo quàm longissimè astra, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret; That he ascended Caucasus, to the end that he might in a clear skie discern a far off the settings and risings of the Stars: though Diodorus Siculus expounds it otherwise, and others diversly.

Africanus makes Prometheus far more antient, and but 94. years after Ogyges. Porphyrius sayes, that he lived at once with Inachus, who lived with Isaac.

Aug. l 18. c. 3. de civit. Dei.

There lived also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the sons of Japetus, of whom though it be said, that they were born before Moses dayes, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more antient date: yet the advantage of their long lives gave them a part of other ages among men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these sons of Japetus, Æsculus finds two other, to wit, Oceanus and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gave name to the Evening, and so to the Evening Star. Also besides this Atlas of Lybia, or Mauritania, there were others which bare the same name: but of the Lybian, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountains which cross Africa, to the South of Marocco, Sus, and Hea, with the Sea adjoyning, took name, which memory Plato in Critias bestowes on Atlas, the son of Neptune.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions affirmeth, that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those names to express divine knowledg. Nec vero Atlas sustinere cœlum, nec Prometheus affixus Caucaso, nec stellatus Cepheus cum uxore traderetur, nisi divina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabulæ traduxisset; Neither should Atlas be said to bear up heaven, nor Prometheus to be fastened to Caucasus, nor Cepheus with his wife to be stellified, unless their divine knowledg had raised upon their names these erroneous fables.

Orpheus sometimes express'd Time by Prometheus, sometime he took him for Saturn; as, Rheæ conjux alme Prometheu. But that the Story of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction, and that he lived about this time, the most approved Historians and Antiquaries, and among them Eusebius and S. Augustine have not doubted: For the great judgment which Atlas had in Astronomy, saith S. Augustine, were his daughters called by the names of constellations, Pleiades and Hyades. Others attribute unto him the finding out of the Moons course, of which Archas the son of Orchomenus challengeth the invention. Of this Arcas, Arcadia in Peloponnesus took name; and therefore did the Arcadians vaunt that they were more antient than the Moon: Et Luna gens prior illa fuit: which is to be understood, saith Natalis Comes, before there had been any observation of the Moons course: or of her working in inferiour bodies. And though there be that bestow the finding out thereof upon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Isacius Tzetzes, a curious searcher of antiquities, gave it Atlas of Libya: who, besides his gifts of mind, was a man of unequalled and incomparable strength: from whom Thales the Milesian, as it is said, had the ground of his Philosophy.

§. V.

§. V.

Of Deucalion and Phaeton.

AND in this age of the World, and while Moses yet lived, Deucalion reigned in Thessaly, Crotopus then ruling the Argives. This Deucalion was the son of Promotheus, saith Herodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gave him Pandora for mother; the rest Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odysses, makes Deucalion the son of Minos: but he must needs have meant some other Deucalion; for else either Ulysses was mistaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Ulysses, after his return from Troy, feigned himself to be the brother of Idomeneus, who was son to this later Deucalion, the son of Minos: but this Minos lived but one age before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus served in that war) and this Deucalion the son of Prometheus, who lived at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalion's time happened that great inundation in Thessaly: by which in effect every soul in those parts perished, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his wife, and some few others. It is affirmed, that at the time of this flood in Thessaly, those people exceeded in all kind of wickedness and villany: and as the impiety of men is the forcible attractive of Gods vengeance, so did all that Nation for their foul sins perish by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and cruelty of all mankind drew on them that general destruction by the flood universal. Onely Deucalion, and Pyrrha his wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to be lovers of Vertue, of Justice, and of Religion. Of whom Ovid:

Com. Alex. Strom. l. 1. Strabo l. 9.

Non illo melior quisquam, nec amantior æqui
Vir fuit: aut illa reverentior ulla dearum.

No man was Better, nor more just than hee:
Nor any woman godlier than shee.

It is also affirmed, that Prometheus foretold his son Deucalion of this over-flowing, and advised him to provide for his safety: who hereupon prepared himself a kind of Vessel, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calls Cibotium; and others Larnax. And because to these circumstances, they afterward add the sending out of the Dove, to discover the waters fall and decrease, I should verily think that Story had been but an imitation of Noah's flood devised by the Greeks, did not the time so much differ, and S. Augustine with others of the Fathers and reverent Writers approve this Story of Deucalion. Among other his children, Deucalion had these two of note; Hellen, of whom Greece had first the name of Hellas; and Melantho, on whom Neptune is said to have begot Delphus, which gave name to Delphos, so renowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

Aug. de civit. Dei, l. 18. c. 10. ex Eusebio & Hieronimo.

And that which was no less strange and marvellous than this flood, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time also happened under Phaeton; not only in Ethiopia, but in Istria, a Region in Italy, and about Cuma, and the Mountains of Vesuvius: of both which the Greeks, after their manner, have invented many strange fables.

§. VI.

Of Hermes Trismegistus.

BUt of all other which this age brought forth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the most famous and renowned; the same which was also called Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus; and of the Greeks, Hermes.

Many there were of this name; and how to distinguish, and set them in their own times, both S. Augustine and Lactantius find it difficult. For that Mercury which was esteemed the god of Theeves, the God of Wrestlers, of Merchants, and Sea-men, and the god of Eloquence (though all by one name confounded) was not the same with that Mercury, of whose many works some fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certain of the Greeks reckon five Mercuries. Of which, two were famous in Egypt, and there worshipped; one, the son of Nilus, whose name the Egyptians feared to utter, as the Jews did Tetragrammaton; the other that Mercury, which slew Argus in Greece, and flying into Egypt, is said to have delivered literature to the Egyptians, and to have given them laws. But Diodorus affirmeth, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought learning and letters out of Egypt into Greece: which Plato also confirmeth, saying; That letters were not found out by that Mercury which slew Argus, but by that antient Mercury, otherwise Thevet; whom Philo Byblius writeth Taautus; the Egyptians, Thoyth; the Alexandrians, Thot, and the Greeks, (as before) Hermes. And to this Taautus, Sanconiatho, who lived about the the war of Troy, gives the invention of letters ters. But S. Augustine making two Mercuries, which were both Egyptians, calls neither of them the son of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to have slain Argus. For he finds this Mercury the slayer of Argus, to to the grand-child of that Atlas, which lived while Moses was yet young. And yet L. Vives upon S. Augustine seems to understand them to be the same with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest have remembred. But that conjecture of theirs, that any Grecian Mercury brought letters into Egypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest, (if there be any truth in prophane antiquity) that all the knowledg which the Greeks had, was transported out of Egypt or Phœnicia, and not out of Greece, nor by any Grecian into Egypt. For they all confess, that Cadmus brought letters first into Bœotia, either out of Egypt, or out of Phœnicia: it being true, that between Mercurius, that lived at once with Moses and Cadmus, there were these descents cast; Crotopus King of the Argives, with whom Moses lived, and in whose time about his tenth year Moses died; after Crotopus, Sthenelus, who reigned eleven years; after him Danaus fifty years; after him Linceus: in whose time, and after him in the time of Minos King of Crete, this Cadmus arrived in Bœotia. And therefore it cannot be true that any Mercurius about Moses his time, flying out of Greece for the slaughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Egypt. Neither did either of those two Mercuries of Egypt, whom Saint Augustine remembreth, the one the grand-father, the other the Nephew or grand-child, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapanus note, that Moses found out letters, and taught the use of them to the Jews: of whom the Phœnicians their neighbours received them; and the Greeks of the Phœnicians by Cadmus. But this invention was also ascribed to Moses, for the reason before remembred; that is, because the Jews and the Phœnicians had them first from him. For every Nation gave unto those men the honour of first Inventors, from whom they received the profit. Ficinus makes that Mercury, upon part of whose works he commenteth, to have been four descents after Moses; which he hath out of Virgil, who cals Atlas, that lived with Moses, the maternal grand-father of the first famous Mercury, whom others, as Diodorus, call the Counseller and Instructer of that renowned Isis, wife of Osiris. Fut Ficinus giveth no reason for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercury instructed Isis, Diodorus Siculus affirmeth, and that such an Inscription was found on a pillar erected on the Tomb of Isis. Lod. Vives upon the six and twentieth Chapter of the eighth Book of Saint Augustine, de Civitate Dei, conceiveth, that this Mercury, whose works are extant, was not the first which was entituled Ter Maximus, but his Nephew or Grand-child, * Sanchoniaton, an ancient Phœnician, who lived shortly after Moses, hath other fancies of this Mercury; affirming that he was the Scribe of Saturn, and called by the Phœnicians, Taautus, and by the Egyptians, Thoot, or Thoyt. It may be, that the many years which he is said to have lived, to wit, three hundred years, gave occasion to some Writers to find him in one time, and to others in other times. But by those who have collected the grounds of the Egyptian Philosophy and Divinity, he is found more antient than Moses: because the Inventor of the Egyptian Wisdom, wherein it is said, that Moses was excellently learned.

It is true, that although this Mercury or Hermes doth in his Divinity differ in many particulars from the Scriptures, especially in the approving of Images, which Moses of all things most detested: yet whosoever shall read him with an even judgment, will rather resolve, that these works which are now extant, were by the Greeks and Egyptian Priests corrupted, and those fooleries inserted, then that ever they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his heart and spirit devised. For there is no man of understanding, and master of his own wits, that hath affirmed in one and the same Tract, those things which are directly contrary in doctrine, and in nature: For out of doubt (Moses excepted) there was never any man of those elder times that hath attributed more, and in a stile more reverend and divine unto Almighty God, than he hath done. And therefore if those his two Treatises now among us; the one converted by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had been found in all things like themselves: I think it had not been perillous to have thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Moses himself; and that the Egyptian Theologie hereafter written, was devised by the first, and more antient Mercury, which others have thought to have been Joseph, the son of Jacob: whom, after the exposition of Pharaoh's dreams, they called Saphanetphane, which is as much to say, as Absconditorum repertor; A finder out of hidden things. But these are overventurous opinions. For what this man was, it is known to God. Envy and aged time hath partly defaced, and partly worn out the certain knowledg of him: of whom, whosoever he were, Lactantius writeth

And so contrary are these his acknowledgments to those Idolatrous fictions of the Egyptians and Grecians: as for my self I am persuaded, that whatsoever is found in him contrary thereunto was by corruption inserted. For thus much himself confesseth: Deus omnium Dominus, & Pater, fons & vita, potentia & lux, & mens, & spiritus; & omnia in ipso, & sub ipso sunt. Verbum enim ex ejus esse prodiens, perfectissimum existens, & generator, & opifex, &c. God (saith he) the Lord and Father of all things, the fountain and life, and power, and light, and mind, and spirit: and all things are in him, and under him. For his Word out of himself proceeding, most perfect, and generative, and operative, falling upon fruitful nature, made it also fruitful and producing. And he was therefore (saith Suydas) called Ter Maximus, quia de Trinitate loquutus est, in Trinitate unum esse Deum asserens; *Because he spake of the Trinity, affirming that there is one God in Trinity. To this I will onely add his two last speeches reported by Calcidius the Platonist, and by Volteran out of Suydas. Hactenus, fili, pulsus à patria, vixi peregrinus & exul, nunc incolumis repeto. Cumque post paulum à vobis corporeis vinculis absolutus discessero, videtote ne me quasi mortuum lugeatis: nam ad illam optimam beatamque Civitatem regredior, ad quam universi cives mortis conditione venturi sunt. Ibi namque solus Deus est summus Princeps, qui cives suos replet suavitate mirifica: ad quam hæc, quam multi vitam existimant, mors est potius dicenda quam vita; Hitherto, O son, being driven from my country, I have lived a stranger and banished man: but now I am repaired homeward again in safety. And when I shall after a few days (or in a short time) by being loosed from these bonds of flesh and blood, depart from you, see that you do not bewail me as a man dead; for I do but return to that best and blessed City, to which all her Citizens (by the condition of death) shall repair. Therein is the onely God, the most high and chief Prince, who filleth or feedeth his citizens with sweetness more than marvellous: in regard whereof, this being, which others call a life, is rather to be accounted a death than a life. The other, and that which seemeth to be his last, is thus converted by others, agreeing in sense, but not in words: with Suydas: O cœlum, magni Dei sapiens opus, teque O vox Patris quam ille primam emisit, quando universum constituit mundum, adjuro per unigenitum ejus Verbum, & Spiritum, cuncta comprehendentem, Miseremini mei: I adjure thee O heaven, thou wise work of the great God, and thee O voyce of the Father, which he first uttered, when he framed the whole World, by his onely begotten Word, and Spirit, comprehending all things, Have mercy upon me.

But Suydas hath his invocation in these words: Obtestor te cœlum, magni Dei sapiens opus, obtestor te vocem Patris, quam loquutus est primùm cum omnem mundum firmavit, obtestor te per unigenitam Sermonem omnia continentem, propitius, propitius esto; I beseech thee O heaven, wise work of the great God, I beseech thee O voice of the Father, which he spake first when he established all the world, I beseech thee by the onely begotten Word containing all things, be favourable, be favourable.

§. VII.

Of Jannes and Jambres, and some other that lived about those times.

THere were also in this age both Æsculapius, which after his death became the god of the Physicians, being the brother of Mercurius, as Vives thinks in his Commentary upon Augustine, de Civitate Dei, lib. 8. and also those two notorious Sorcerers, Jannes and Jambres, who in that impious art excelled all that ever had been heard of to this day: and yet Moses himself doth not charge them with any familiarity with Divels, or ill Spirits: words indeed that seldom came out of his mouth: however by the Septuagint they are called Sophistæ, or Venefici, and Incantatores; Sophists, Poysoners, and Inchanters: by Hierome, Sapientes, & malefici; Wise men, and evil doers: and so by Vatablus, who also useth the word Magi. The Greek it self seems to attribute somewhat of what they did to natural Magick: calling them φαρμακὸς, workers by drugs. The Genevan, Sorcerers and Inchanters: Junius, Sapientes, Præſtigiatores, & Magi. Magicians and Wiſe men here by him are taken in one ſence: and Preſtigiators are ſuch as dazel mens eyes, and make them ſeem to ſee what they ſee not: as falſe colours, and falſe ſhapes. But as ſome vertues and ſome vices are ſo niceſly diſtinguiſhed, and ſo reſembling each other, as they are often confounded; and the one taken for the other (Religion and Superſtition having one face and countenance) ſo did the works and working of Moſes, and of Pharao's Sorcerers appear in outward ſhew, and to the beholders of common capacities, to be one and the ſame art and gift of knowledg. For the Divel changeth himſelf into an Angel of light: and imitateth in all he can the waies and workings of the moſt High. And yet, on the contrary, every work which ſurmounteth the wiſdom of moſt men, is not to be condemned, as performed by the help or miniſtery of ill Spirits. For the properties and powers which God hath given to natural things, are ſuch, as where he alſo beſtoweth the knowledg to underſtand their hidden and beſt vertues, many things by them are brought to paſs, which ſeem altogether impoſſible, and above nature or art: which two ſpeculations of works of nature, and of miracle, the Cabaliſts diſtinguiſhed by theſe names; Opus de Bereſith, & opus de mercana: the one they call, Sapientiam naturæ; The Wiſdom of nature: the other, Sapientiam divinitatis; The Wiſdom of divinity: the one Jacob practiſed in breeding the pied Lambs in Meſopotamia; the other Moſes exerciſed in his miracles wrought in Egypt, having received from God the knowledg of the one in the higheſt perfection, to wit, the knowledg of nature: of the other ſo far as it pleaſed God to proportion him, both which he uſed to his glory that gave them: aſſuming to himſelf nothing at all, either in the leaſt or moſt. Alſo S. Auguſtine noteth, that from the time that Moſes left Egypt, to the death of Joſhua, divers other famous men lived in the World, who, after their deaths, for their eminent vertues, and inventions, were numbred among the gods: as Dionyſius, otherwiſe Liber Pater, who taught the Grecians the uſe of the Vine in Attica: at which time alſo there were inſtituted Muſical plays to Apollo Delphicus: thereby to regain his favour, who brought barrenneſs and ſcarcity upon that part of Greece, becauſe they reſiſted not the attempts of Danaus, who ſpoiled his Temple, and ſet it on fire: ſo did Erichthonius inſtitute the like games to Minerva: wherein the Victor was rewarded with a preſent of Oyl, in memory of her that firſt preſt it out of the Olive.

Ex. 6. 11.

In this age alſo Xanthus raviſhed Europa, and begat on her Radamanthus, Sarpedon and Minos, which three are alſo given to Jupiter by other Hiſtorians. To theſe Saint Auguſtine addeth Hercules; the ſame to whom the twelve labours are aſcribed, native of Tyrinthia a City of Peloponneſus; (or as others ſay, onely nurſed and brought up there) who came into Italy, and deſtroyed many Monſters there; being neither that Hercules, which Euſebius ſurnameth Delphin, famous in Phœnicia; nor that Hercules, according to Philoſtratus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an Egyptian: Manifeſtum fit, non Thebanum Herculem, ſed Egyptium ad Gades pervenisſe, & ibi finem ſtatuiſſe terræ (ſaith Philoſtratus;) It is manifeſt, that it was the Egyptian Hercules, and not the Theban, which travelled as far as the ſtraights of Gades, and there determined the bounds of the earth. In this time alſo while Moſes wandered in the Deſarts, Dardanus built Dardania.

Philoſt. l. 2.

But whoſoever they were, or how worthy ſoever they were that lived in the Dayes and Age of Moſes, there was never any man, that was no more than Man, by whom it pleaſed God to work greater things; whom he favoured more, to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) he ſo often appeared; never any man more familiar and converſant with Angels; never any more learned both in Divine and Humane knowledge; never a greater Prophet in Iſrael He was the firſt that received and delivered the Law of God entire; the firſt that left to poſterity by letters, the truth and power of one infinite God; his creating out of nothing the World Univerſal, and all the creatures therein; that taught the deteſtation of Idolatry, and the puniſhment, vengeance, and eradication, which followed.

Syracides calleth Moſes the beloved of God and men, whoſe remembrance is bleſſed. He made him (ſaith the ſame Author) like to the glorious Saints, and magnified him by the fear of his enemies, made him glorious in the ſight of Kings, ſhewed him his glory, cauſed him to hear his voyce, ſanctified him with faithfulneſs and meekneſs, and choſe him out of all men.

Syrac. 45. 12.

He is remembred among prophane Authors; as by Clearchus the Peripatetick: by Megaſtenes, and Numenius the Pythagorian. The long lives which the Patriarchs enjoyed ed before the flood, remembred by Moſes, Eſtieus, Hieronymus, Ægyptius, Hecatæus, Elanicus, Acuſilaus, Ephorus, and Alexander the Hiſtorian, confirm. The univerſal flood which God revealed unto Moſes, Beroſus, Nicolaus Damaſcenus, and others, have teſtified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confuſion of tongues, Abydenus, Eſtieus, and Sybilla have approved. Beroſus alſo honoureth Abraham. Hecatæus wrote a book of him. Damaſcenus before cited, ſpeaketh of Abrahams paſſage from Damaſcus into Canaan, agreeing with the books of Moſes. Eupolemon writeth the very ſame of Abraham, which Moſes did. For beginning with the building of Babel, and the overthrow thereof by divine power, he ſaith that Abraham, born in the tenth generation, in the City called Camerina, or Urien, excelled all men in wiſdom: and by whom the Aſtrology of the Caldeans was invented. Is juſtitia pietateque ſua (ſaith Euſebius out of the ſame Author) ſic Deo gratus fuit, ut divino præcepto in Phæniciam venerit, ibique habitaverit; For his juſtice and piety he was ſo pleaſing unto God, as by his commandment he came into Phœnicia, and dwelt there. Likewiſe Diodorus Siculus in his ſecond Book and fifth Chapter, ſpeaketh reverently of Moſes: There are many other among prophane Authors, which do confirm the books of Moſes, as Euſebius hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparation to the Goſpel, Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I refer the Reader. Laſtly, I cannot but for ſome things in it commend this notable teſtimony of Strabo, who writeth of Moſes in theſe words: Moſes enim affirmavit, docebatque Ægyptios non recte ſentire, qui beſtiarum & pecorum imagines Deo tribuerunt: Itemque Afros & Græcos, qui diis hominum figuram affinxerunt: id verò ſolum eſſe Deum, quod nos, & terram, & mare continet, quod cœlum, & mundum, & rerum omnium naturam appellamus: cujus profecto imaginem, nemo ſanæ mentis, alicujus earum rerum, quæ penes nos ſunt, ſimilem audeat effingere. Proinde (omni ſimulachrorum effictione repudiata) dignum ei Templum ac Delubrum conſtituendum, ac ſine aliqua figura colendum: Moſes affirmed and taught, that the Egyptians thought amiſs, which attributed unto God the images of beaſts and cattel: Alſo that the Africans and Greeks greatly erred in giving unto their gods the ſhapes of men: whereas that onely is God indeed, which containeth both us, the earth and ſea, which we call heaven, the world, and the nature of all things, whoſe image, doubtleſs, no wiſe man will dare to faſhion out unto the likeneſs of thoſe things, which are amongſt us. That therefore (all deviſing of Idols caſt aſide) a worthy Temple and place of prayer was to be erected unto him, and he to be worſhipped without any figure at all therein.

Strabo. l. 16.

Now concerning the Egyptian wiſdom, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moſes, ſaying, That Moſes was learned in all the wiſdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in his works and words; the ſame is corrected (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes, Laertius, Iamblicus, Philo Judæus, and Euſebius Cæſarienſis, and divided into four parts, viz. Mathematical, Natural, Divine, and Moral. Acts. 7. 23.

In the Mathematical part, which is diſtinguiſh'd into Geometry, Aſtronomy, Arithmetick, and Muſick, the antient Egyptians exceed all others. For Geometry which is by interpretation, Meaſuring of grounds, was uſeful unto them: becauſe it conſiſting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yearly overflown and confounded, ſo as no man could know what in right belonged unto him.

For the ſecond part, to wit, Aſtronomy, the ſite of the Countrey being a level and ſpacious Plain, free and clear from the clouds, yielded them delight with eaſe, in obſerving and contemplating the riſings, fallings, and motions of the Stars.

Arithmetick alſo, which is the knowledg of numbers, they ſtudied; becauſe without it, in Geometry and Aſtronomy, nothing can be demonſtrated or concluded. But of Muſick they made no other account, nor deſired farther knowledg, than ſeemed to them ſufficient to ſerve and magnifie their gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Natural part of this Wiſdom, which handleth the principles, cauſes, elements, and operations of natural things, differs little from Peripatetical Philoſophy; teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies, and living creatures have their being; that Heaven is round like a Globe; that all Stars have a certain fovent heat, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that rains proceed and be from mutations in the air; that the Planets have their proper ſouls, &c.

The Divine part of this wiſdom, which is called Theology, teacheth and believeth that the world had a beginning, and ſhall periſh; that men had their firſt original in Egypt; partly by means of the temperateneſs of that Countrey, where neither Winter with cold, nor Summer with heat, are offenſive; and partly through the fertility, that Nilus giveth in thoſe places: That the ſoul is immortal, and hath tranſmigration from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all gods, and that from this God, other gods are, as the Sun and Moon, whom they worſhipped by the names of Oſiris and Iſis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and divers Images, becauſe the true ſimilitudes of the gods is not known; that many of the gods have been in the eſtate of mortal men, and after death, for their virtues and benefits beſtowed on mankind, have been Deified; that thoſe beaſts, whoſe Images and Forms the Kings did carry in their Arms, when they obtained victory, were adored for gods: becauſe under thoſe Enſigns they prevailed over their enemies. Moreover the Egyptian Divines had a peculiar kind of writing, myſtical, and ſecret, wherein the higheſt points of their Religion and worſhip of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar ſort, were obſcured.

Clem Stron l. 5. Clemens diſtributeth the whole ſum of this later Egyptian learning into three ſeveral ſorts, viz. Epiſtolar, which is uſed in writing common Epiſtles; Sacerdotal, which is peculiar to their Prieſts; and Sacred, which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kinds: the one proper, which is expreſſed by letters Alphabetical in obſcure and figurative words; as for example, where it is written: The Ibis by the Hornet participateth the beauty of the Hawke; which is read thus: The Moon doth by the Sun borrow part of the light of God: becauſe Light is an Image of Divine beauty; the other ſymbolical, or by ſignatures, which is threefold, viz. Imitative, Tropical, and Ænygmatical: Imitative, which deſigneth things by characters, like to the things ſignified, as by a Circle, the Sun; and by the Horns of the Moon, the Moon it ſelf: Tropical or transferent, which applys the divers forms and figures of natural bodies or creatures, to ſignifie the dignities, fortunes, conditions, virtues, vices, affections, and actions of their gods, and of men. So with the Egyptian Divines, the Image of an Hawke ſignifieth God, the figure of the Hornet ſignifieth the Sun, the picture of the Bird Ibis ſignifieth the Moon: by the form of a Man, Prudence, and Skilfulneſs: by a Lion, Fortitude: by a Horſe, Liberty: by a Crocodile, Impudency: by a Fiſh, Hatred is to be underſtood: Ænigmatical is a compoſition, or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which ſence, the monſtrous Image of a Lions body having a Mans head, was graven on their Temples and Altars, to ſignifie, that to men all divine things are Ænigmatical and obſcure. So the Image of the Sun ſet on the head of a Crocodile, (which liveth as well in the Waters, as on Land) expreſſeth, that the Sun nouriſheth Meteors in the Air, aſwell from the Waters, as from the Earth. So a Scepter, at the top whereof is made an Eye, and an Ear, ſignifieth God, Hearing, Seeing, and governing all things. The Scythians are thought to have been delighted with this kind of writing. For Pherecides Syrius reporteth, That when Darius ſending letters, threatned Idanthura, King of the Scythians, with ruine and deſtruction of his Kingdom, unleſs he would acknowledge ſubjection: Idanthura returned to him a Mouſe, a Frog, a Bird, a Dart, and a Ploughſhare: which Orontopagas, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to ſignifie, that by the Mouſe, their dwellings: by the Frog, their waters: by the Bird, their air: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough, their Lands were ſignified to be ready to be delivered to Darius, as their Soveraign Lord. But Xyphodres made another conſtruction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his men did haſten away, as a Bird through the aire, or creep into holes as a Mouſe, or run into the waters which they had paſſed as a Frog, they ſhould not eſcape his arms, but either be ſlain, or, being made Captives, till his grounds. The ſame Hiſtory is with little difference reported by Herodotus. Herod. l. 4.

The fourth and laſt part, which is Moral and Politick, doth contain eſpecially the Laws, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Triſmegiſtus, or Ter Maximus deviſed: who in his Books or Dialogues of Pimander and Aſclepius, hath written ſo many things of God, worthy of admiration; aſwell (ſaith Sixtus Senenſis of the Trinity, and of the coming of Chriſt, as of the laſt and fearfull day of Judgment: that (as ſaith the ſame Author, the opinion being alſo antient) he is not onely to be accounted a Philoſopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Iamblicus in his Books of Myſteries of the Egyptians, taking two very antient Hiſtorians for their Authors, to wit, Seleucus and Menætus, affirmeth, that this Mercury was not only the Inventor of the Egyptian Philoſophy, but of all other learning, called the Wiſdom of the Egyptians, before remembred: and that he wrote of that ſubject 36525. Books or Pages. Of which there were numbred, of Fiery Spirits, one hundred Books; of Aereal Spirits as many, and of Spirits Celeſtial a thouſand; which becauſe they were out of the Egyptians language converted by certain learned Philoſophers into natural Greek, they ſeemed to have been firſt written in that Tongue. Clemens Alexandrinus writeth, Clem. Stron l. 6.

writeth, that among the Books of Hermes, to wit, of the Wisdom of the Egyptians, there were extant in his time 36. Of Physick, six Books; of the orders of Priests, ten; and of Astrology, four.

§. VIII.

A Brief of the History of Josua; and of the space between him and Othoniel: and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of some Contemporaries to Josua: and of the breach of Faith.

After the death of Moses, and in the one and fortieth year of the Egression, in the first moneth called Nisan, or March, Josua, the son of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of wisdom, took on him the government of Israel: God giving him comfort, and encouraging him to pass the River of Jordan, and to possess and divide among the Israelites, the land promised.

The beginning of Josua's rule, Saint Augustine dates with the reign of Amyntas, the eighteenth King in Assyria; with Corax the sixteenth King in Sicyonia, when Danaus governed the Argives; and Erichthonius, Athens. Lib 18. de civit. Dei. c. 11.

Josua, imitating in all things his Predecessor, sent over Jordan certain discoverers to view the seat and strength of Jericho, the next City unto him on the other side of the River, which he was to pass over. Which discoverers being sayed, and sent back by Rahab, a woman of ill fame, because she kept a Tavern or Victualling-house, made Josua know, that the inhabitants of Jericho, and those of the Country about it, hearing of the approach of Israel, had lost courage. Whereupon the day after the return of the Spies, which was the sixth day of the one and fortieth year after the Egression, Josua removed from Sittim in the plains of Moab, and drew down his Army to the banks of the River Jordan; and gave them commandment to put themselves in order to follow the Ark of God, when the Levites took it up, and moved towards the River, giving them withal this forcible encouragement, That they should thereby assure themselves of his favour and presence, who is Lord of all the world, when the River of Jordan should be cut off and divided, and the waters coming from above should stand still in a heap, whereby those below towards the Dead Sea wanting supply, they might pass over into the Land of Canaan with dry feet. Jos. 2. 1. Jos. 2. 11. Jos. 3. 1. Jos. 3. 3. Jos. 3. 13.

He also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasse, to prepare themselves (according to their Covenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest, and, as we call it in this age, to lead in the Vaunt-guard, which through all the Desarts of Arabia, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Juda had performed. For these Tribes being already provided of their habitations, and Country, and Cities of the Amorites by the help of the rest, conquered for them: it agreed with justice and equality, that Reuben, Gad, and the half of Manasse should also assist their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies possession. Jos. 1. 12.

On the banks of Jordan they rested themselves from the sixth day to the ninth; and on the tenth day of the first moneth Nisan, or March, they pass'd over to the other side, taking with them twelve stones from the dry ground in the midst of the River: which, for a memory of that miracle by God wrought, they set up at Gilgal, on the East-side of the city of Jerico, where they incamped the first night. At which place Josua gave commandment, that all born in the last fortieth year in the Desarts should be circumcised, which ceremony to that day had been omitted. Of the neglect whereof S. Augustine giveth for cause, The peoples contempt of their Superiours. Thomas excuseth it in this sort; That the Israelites knew not the certain time of their removing from one place to another: Damascen, That it was not needfull by circumcision to distinguish them from other Nations, at such times as they lived by themselves, and a-part from all Nations. Jos. 4. 19. Jos. 5. 2. Aug. q. 3. in Jos. Thom. part. 3. quæst 70. art. 4. ad. 3.

On the fourteenth day of the same moneth, the children of Israel celebrated the Passover now the third time; first, at their leaving Egypt; secondly, at Mount Sinai; and now at Gilgal. After which, being desirous to taste of the fruits of the Country, and having, as it were, surfetted on Manna, they parched of the Corn of the Land, being not yet full ripe, and eat thereof. Jos. 5. 10.

And as Moses began to distribute those Regions beyond Jordan, to wit, the Lands of the Amorites, which Og of Basan, and Sehon held, so did Josua perform the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, he gave to each Tribe his portion by lot. But this partition and distribution was not done at once, but at three several times; first, by Moses to Gad, Reuben, and the half Tribe of Manasse, of the Lands over Jordan; secondly, by Josua, to the Tribe of Juda, Ephraim, and the other half Tribe of Manasse, about the fifth year of his government; proved in the 14. of Josua. v. 10. and a third division was made to the other seven Tribes at Shilo, where Josua seated the Tabernacle of the Congregation. Jos. 14. 5. Jos. 18.

The

The victories of Josua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set down in his own books, as I shall not need to lengthen this part by their repetition. In whose Story I chiefly note these particulars. First, how in the beginning of the war, those little kings, or reguli of the Canaanites, had not so much understanding, as to unite themselves together against the Israelites; but according to the custom of those estates, from whose Governours God hath taken away all wisdom and foresight, they left those of their own Nation, which were next the invaders, to themselvs, and to their own defences; hoping that the fire kindled somewhat far off, might again have been quenched, ere it could spread it self so far as their own Territories and Cities. But after such time as Jerico and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities consumed; five of those 31 Kings (all which at length perished in that war) joyned themselves together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendred themselves to Josua. Onely five (the rest looking on to the success) namely, the King of the Jebusites, in Jebus, or Hierusalem, the Kings of Hebron, Jarmoth, Lachis, and Eglon, addrest themselves for resistance: whose Army being by Josua surprized and broken, themselves despairing to escape by flight, and hopeless of mercy by submission, creeping into a Cave under ground, were thence by Josua drawn forth and hanged. In the prosecution of which victory he also took Makkedath, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the relief whereof Horam King of Gezar hastened, and perished. After which Josua possest himself of Eglon, Hebron, and Debir, destroying the Cities with their Princes.

Jos. 10.

Jos. 10.

In the end, and when the South Countries were possest, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings and People made dust: the rest of the Canaanites, guided by the over-late counsels of necessity, united themselves, to make one gross strength and body of an Army: which Jabin, King of Hazor, practised and gathered together, by Josua discovered, as the same rested neer the Lake of Merom, he used such diligence, as he came on them unawares; and obtaining absolute victory over them, he prosecuted the same to the utmost effect. And, besides the slaughter of the defendants, he entred their Cities, of which he burnt Hazor onely, reserving the rest for Israel to inhabit and enjoy.

Secondly, I note, that Josua shewed himself a skilful man of War, for that in those antient times he used the stratagem of an ambush in taking of Ai; and in that he broke the Armies of the first five Kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon by surprise. For he marched all night from his Camp at Gilgal, and set on them early the next day; when he overthrew Jabin and his confederates. After which, making the best profit of his victory, he assaulted the great City of Hazor.

Jos. 10.3.

Thirdly, the miracles which God wrought during this war, were exceeding admirable as the stay of the River Jordan at the Springs, so as the Army of Israel past it with a dry foot; the fall of Jerico by the sound of the Horns; the showers of Hale-stones, which fell upon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, wherby more of them perished than by the sword of Israel: again, the arrest of the Sun in the firmament, whereby the day was so much the more lightened, as the Israelites had time to execute all those which fled after the overthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a work only proper to the all-powerfull God.

Jos 3. 13. & 10 v. 11.

Fourthly, out of the passage between Josua and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faith is so plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all evasion, it admitteth no intrusion, nor leaveth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiousnes, and horrible deceit of this latter age, called Equivocation. For, notwithstanding that these Gibeonites were a people of the Hevites, expressly and by name, by the commandment of God to be rooted out, and notwithstanding that they were liars, and deceivers, and counterfeits, and that they did over-reach, and as it were, deride Josua, and the Princes of Israel, by feigning to be sent as Embassadours from a far Country, in which travel their cloths were worn, their bread mouldie, which they avowed to have been warm for newnes when they first set out; their barrels and bottles of wine broken; their shoos patch'd; and their sacks rent and ragged: Yet Josua having sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel, he durst not, though urged by the multitude of the people, to lay violent hands on them; but he spared both their lives, and the Cities of their inheritance.

Jos. 9.7.

Jos 9. from the 5. to the 13.

Now if ever man had warrant to break faith, and to retract his promise made, Josua had it. For first, the commandment which he received from God to root out this Nation among the rest, preceded by far the peace which he had granted them. Secondly, he might justly have put these men to the sword, and have sack'd their Cities, if there be any evasion from a promise made, whereof the living God is called to witness. For it was not to the Gibeonites he gave peace, because cause he knew them to be a people hated of God. He told them, that if they were of

Jos. 9. 7. the Hevites, it was not in his power to make a league with them. But it was to a strange people that he gave faith, and to a Nation which came from far, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Israel had done
Jos. 9. 14. in Egypt and over Jordan, sought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, the accord, which Israel made with these crafty Canaanites, was without warrant. For it is written in the same place, That the Israelites accepted their tale, that is, believed what they had said, and counselled not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, these men who were known Idolaters, and served those Puppets of the Heathen, men of an apish Religion, as all Worshippers of Images are, could not challenge the witness of the true God, in whom they believed not. I say therefore, that if ever man might have served himself by any evasion or distinction, Josua might justly have done it. For he needed not in this case the help of Æquivocation or Mental Reservation. For what he sware, he sware in good Faith; but he sware nothing, nor made any promise at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithless subtilty of man should borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promises he made in the Name of God, were made to the living God, and not to the dying man, he held them firm and inviolable, notwithstanding that they, to whom he had sworn it, were worshippers of the Devil.

For it is not, as faithless men take it, that he which sweareth to a Man, to a Society, to a State, or to a King, and sweareth by the Name of the living Lord, and in his presence, That this promise (if it be broken) is broken to a Man, to a Society, to a State, or to a Prince; but the Promise in the Name of God made, is broken to God. It is God that we therein neglect: we therein profess that we fear him not, and that we set him at naught, and defie him. If he that without reservation of Honour, giveth a lie in the presence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth, in point of Honour, give the lie to the King himself, or to his Superiour; how much more doth he break Faith with God, that giveth Faith in the presence of God, promiseth in his Name, and makes him a witness of the Covenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearfull thing for a Son to break the Promise, Will, or Deed of the Father; for a State, or Kingdom, to break those Contracts which have been made in former times, and confirmed by publick faith. For though it were 400 years after Josua, that Saul, even out of devotion, slaughtered some of those people descended of the Gibeonites: yet God, who forgat not what the Predecessors and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Israelites had sworn in his Name, afflicted the whole Nation with a consuming famine; and could not be appeased, till seven of Sauls sons were delivered to the Gibeonites grieved, and by them hanged up.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the help of a ridiculous distinction, or by a God-mocking equivocation, to swear one thing by the Name of the living God, and to reserve in silence a contrary intent: the life of man, the estates of men, the faith of Subjects to Kings, of Servants to their Masters, of Vassals to their Lords, of Wives to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trials of right, will not onely be made uncertain, but all the chains whereby free-men are tied in the world, be torn asunder. It is by oath (when Kings and Armies cannot pass) that we enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies: it is by oath that wars take end, which weapons cannot end. And what is it, or ought it to be, that makes an oath thus powerful, but this; That he that sweareth by the Name of God, doth assure others that his words are true, as the Lord of all the World is true, whom he calleth for a Witness, and in whose presence he that taketh the oath hath promised? I am not ignorant of their poor evasions, which play with the severity of Gods Commandments in this kind: But this indeed is the best answer, That he breaks no faith, that hath none to break. For whosoever hath faith and the fear of God, dares not do it.

The Christians in the Holy Land, when they were at the greatest, and had brought the Caliph of Egypt to pay them tribute, did not onely loose it again, but were soon after beaten out of the Holy Land it self: by reason (saith William of Tyre, a reverend Bishop which wrote that Story) that Almerick the fiftieth King after Godfrey brake faith with the Caliph Elhadech, and his Vicegerent. The Soldan Sanar, who being suddenly invaded by Almerick, drew in the Turk Syracon to their aid: whose Nephew Seladine, after he had made Egypt his own, beat the Christians out of the Holy Land; neither would the wooden Cross (the very Cross, say they, that Christ died on) give them victory over Seladine, when they brought it into the field as their last refuge, seeing they had forsworn themselves in his Name that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from Psal 5.6. Wisd. 1.11. the Holy Ghost, That he that speaketh lies, shall be destroyed, and that the mouth which uttereth them, slayeth the soul: how much more perillous is it (if any peril be greater than to destroy the soul) to swear a lie? It was Eugenius the Pope, that persuaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungary after his great victory over Amurath the Turk, and when the said King had compelled him to peace, the most advantagious that ever was made for the Christians, to break his Faith, and to provoke the Turk to renew the war. And though the said King was far stronger in the field than ever; yet he lost the battel with 30000. Christians, and his own life. But I will stay my hand: For this first volume will not hold the repetition of Gods judgments upon faith-breakers; be it against Infidels, Turks, or Christians of divers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of oaths now-a-dayes, is rather made a matter of custom, than of conscience.

It is also very remarkable, That it pleased God to leave so many Cities of the Canaanites unconquered by Israel, to scourge and afflict them, by fore-seeing their Idolatry, and, as it is said in the Scriptures, To be thorns in their eyes to prove them, and to teach them to make War. For these Cities hereafter named did not onely remain in the Canaanites possession all the time of Josua; but soon after his death the children of Dan were beaten out of the plain Countries, and enforc'd to inhabit the Mountains, and places of hardest access. And those of Juda were not able to be masters of their own Vallies; because as it is written in the Judges, The Canaanites had Chariots of Iron. And those principal Cities which stood on the Sea-side, adjoyning unto Juda, were still held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philistims: as Azzah, Gath, Asdod; out of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembred in Samuel.

Josh. 23. Judg 1. & Judg. 3.2. Judg 1.34 Judg. 1.19 Josh. 11.19 1 Sam. 17. 4.

Neither did the children of Manasse over Jordan expel the Geshurites, nor the Maachathites; which inhabited the North parts of Basan, afterward Traconitis.

Nor the Nepthalims possess themselves of Bethshemish, nor of Bethanah; but they inforc'd those Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did Asher expel the Zidonians, nor those of Acho, or Acon, Athlab, Achzib, Heblah, Aphike, & Rehob, nor inforc'd them to tribute.

Josh. 13.13 Judg 1.31

No more could Zabulon enjoy Kitron, and Nahalol, but received tribute from them. Also the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among the Ephraims: and among the children of Manasse, on the West of Jordan, the Canaanites held Bethshean, Taacnak, Dor, Ibleam, and Megaddo; yea Hierusalem it self did the Jebusites defend above four hundred years, even till David's time.

Josh. 16.10. Jud. 2.27.

Now Josua lived one hundred and ten years, eighteen of which he governed Israel, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not expressed in the Scriptures, which causeth divers to conjecture diversly of the continuance. Josephus gives him five and twenty years: Seder Ollam Rabbi the Authors of the Hebrew Chronologie eight and twenty; and Massius six and twenty: Maimonius cited by Massius, fourteen: Joannes Lucidus, seventeen: Cajetanus, ten: Eusebius giveth him seven and twenty: and so doth S. Augustine: Melanthon, two and thirty: Codoman, five and twenty. But whereas there passed 480. years from the delivery of Israel out of Egypt, unto the building of the Temple, it is necessary that we allow to Josua onely eighteen of them; as finding the rest supplyed otherwise, which to me seems the most likely, and, as I think, a well approved opinion.

The same necessity of retaining precisely 480. years from the departure out of Egypt unto the building of the Temple, convinceth of errour, such as have inserted years between Josua and Othoniel, of whom Eusebius finds eight years, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which he giveth his reason in his four and twentieth and last Chapters upon Josua: Bunting reckons it nine years: Bucolzer and Reusner but one; Codoman, twenty; and Nicephorus no less than three and thirty: whereas following the sure direction of these 480. years, there can be no void years found between Josua and Othoniel, unless they be taken out of those eighteen ascribed unto Josua by the account already specified. The praises and acts of Josua are briefly written in the six and fortieth Chapter of Ecclesiasticus, where among many other things it is said of him, Who was there before him like to him, for he fought the battels of the Lord?

Euseb. Præp. Evang.

That he wrote the book called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, because it is said in the last Chapter, verse 26. And Josua wrote these words in the book of the Law of God: which seemeth rather to have been meant by the covenant which Josua made with Israel in Sichem, where they all promised to serve and obey the Lord: which promise Josua caused to be written in the book of the Law: and of this opinion were Cajetan and Abulensis: Theodoret doth likewise conceive, that the book of Josua was collected out of an antient Volume, intituled Liber Justorum, remembred by Josua himself; and others, that it was the work

1 Sam. 10. 13. Joſ. 5. 24, 26. of Samuel: for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion upon theſe words of the 26. Verſe, And Joſua wrote theſe words, &c. this place hath nothing in it to prove it: for when the people had anſwered Joſua; The Lord our God will we ſerve, and his voyce will we obey, it followeth that Joſua made a covenant with the people, and wrote the ſame in the book of the Law of God.

There lived at once with Joſua, Erichthonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke beaſts together, thereby to till the ground with more eaſe and ſpeed: And about the ſame time the fifty Daughters of Danaus (as it is ſaid) ſlew the fifty ſons of Egyptus, all but Lynceus, who ſucceeded Danaus, if the tale be true. There lived alſo with Joſua, Phœnix, and Cadmus, and neer the end of Joſua's life, Jupiter is ſaid to have raviſhed Europa the daughter of Phœnix (afterward married to Aſterius King of Creta) and begat on her Minos, Radamanthus, and Sarpedon. But S. Auguſtine reports this raviſhment to be committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sons of Jupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was father to Deucalion, and Deucalion to Idomeneus, who was an old man at the war of Troy, and Sarpedon was in perſon a young or ſtrong man at the ſame Trojan war. And ſo doth Neſtor reckon up in the Councel of the Greeks, Theſeus, and Peritheus for men of Antiquity and of Ages paſt: Minos being yet more antient than any of theſe. But hereof elſewhere.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Tribes of Iſrael that were planted in the borders of Phœnicia, with ſundry Stories depending upon thoſe places.

§. I.

The Proœme to the deſcription of the whole Land of Canaan; with an Expoſition of the name of Syria.

THE Story of the Judges ought to follow that of Joſua, after whom the Common-wealth of the Jews was governed by Kings, of which ſo many of them as ruled the ten Tribes, ſhall be remembred when we come to the deſcription of Samaria: but becauſe the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whereon the greateſt part of the Story paſt, with that which followeth, hath been acted, I think it very pertinent (for the better underſtanding of both) to make a Geographical deſcription of thoſe Regions: that all things therein performed by the places known, may the better be underſtood, and conceived. To which purpoſe (beſides the addition of the neighbour Countries) I have beſtowed on every Tribe his proper portion: and do ſhew what Cities and Places of ſtrength were by the Jews obtained: and what numbers it pleaſed God to leave unconquered; by whom he might correct and ſcourge them, when ungrateful for his many graces, they at ſundry times forgat or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored thoſe deaf and dead Idols of the Heathen. Divina bonitas (ſaith Auguſtine) ideo maximè iraſcitur in hoc ſeculo, ne iraſcatur in futuro: & miſericorditer temporalem adhibet ſeveritatem, ne æternam juſtè inferat ultionem; The divine goodneſs is eſpecially therefore angry in this world, that it may not be angry in the world to come, and doth mercifully uſe temporal ſeverity, that it may not juſtly bring upon us eternal vengeance.

To the Cities herein deſcribed, I have added a ſhort Story of the beginnings and ends of divers Kingdoms and Common-weals: and to help my ſelf herein, I have peruſed divers of the beſt Authors upon this ſubject: among whom, becauſe I find ſo great diſagreement in many particulars, I have rather in ſuch caſes adventured to follow mine own reaſon, than to borrow any one of their old patterns.

And becauſe Canaan, with Paleſtina of the Philiſtims, and the Lands of Og and Sehon Kings of Baſan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but ſmall Provinces of Syria: it ſhall be neceſſary, firſt to divide and bound the general, and ſo to deſcend to this particular, now called the Holy Land.

Ptol. Asiæ tab 4. Ptol 5.

Syria, now Soria, according to the largest description, and as it was antiently taken, imbraced all those Regions from the Euxine Sea, to the Red Sea: and therefore were the Cappadocians, which look into Pontus, called Leucosyrians, or white Syrians. But taking it shorter, and from the coast of Cilicia, which is the North border, unto Idumæa, towards the South, Tigris towards the Sunrising, and the Mediterran Sea Westward: it then containeth besides Babylonia, Chaldæa, Arabia the Desart, and Arabia Petræa, that Region also which the Greeks call Mesopotamia, the Hebrews Syria, of the two Rivers, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for so Aran Naharajim is expounded: also Padan Aram; that is, Jugum Syriæ, because the two Rivers go along in it as it were in a yoke.

Aurogallas

Edessa, sometime Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria taken largely, there were many small Provinces, as Cœlosyria, which the Latins call Syria Cava, because it lay in that fruitfull Valley between the Mountains of Lybanus, and Antilybanus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others, were seated. Then Damascena, or Syria Lybanica, taking name of the City Damascus, and the Mountains of Lybanus, the Regal seat of the Adades, the first Kings of Syria. Adjoyning to it was the Province of Sophene, or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobal: over which Adadezer commanded in Solomon's time. Then Phœnicia, and the people Syraphœnicies: and lastly, Syria Palæstina bordering Egypt: of which Ptolomy maketh Judæa also a part: and to that Province which Moses calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Mela giveth the name of Syrea Judæa.

§. II.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan, and of the promises touching this Land.

BUt that Land which was antiently Canaan, taketh a part of Phœnicia, and stretcheth from behind Lybanus to the great Desarts between Idumæa and Egypt: bounded by the Mid-land Sea on the West, and the Mountains of Hermon, Galaad, and Arnon towards the East: the same Hills which Strabo calleth Traconi, or Traconitæ, and Ptolemie, Hippus. The name of Canaan it had from Canaan the Son of Cham: Et lingua appellata fuit Canaan; The language was also called Canaan, saith Montanus: and after Hebræa of the Hebrews: who took name from Heber, the Son of Sale, according to Saint Augustine. But Arias Montanus not so well allowing of this derivation, makes it a common name to all those of Noah's Sons, who past over Euphrates towards the West Sea. For the word Heber, saith he, is as much as transiens, or transmittens of going, or passing over. And because the children of Abraham had for a long time no certain abiding: therefore, as he thinks, they were by the Egyptians called Hebræi, as it were passengers, which is also the opinion of C. Sigonius, and of Eusebius long before them both. It had also the name of Judæa from Juda; and then afterwards intituled the Holy Land, because therein our Saviour Christ was Born, and Buried. Now this part of Syria was again divided into four; namely, into Edom, (otherwise Seir, or Edumæa) Galilee, Samaria, and Judæa. Galilee is double, the superiour called Gentium, and the inferiour: and that Galilee and Judæa are distinguished, it is plain in the Evangelists, though both of them belong to Phœnicia.

Matth. 3. Luke 2. John 4.

Now besides these Provinces of Phœnicia, and Palæstina (both which the River of Jordan boundeth; saving that Phœnicia stretcheth a little more Easterly towards Damascus) that part also of the East of Jordan, and within the Mountains of Hermon, Gilead, and Arnon, otherwise Traconi, fell to the possession of half Manasse, Gad, and Ruben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan also: as well because antiently possest by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enjoyed by the Israelites; which Eastermost parts are again divided into Basan, or Batanea, into Gilead, Moab, Midian, Ammon, and the Territories of the Macbati, Gessuri, Argobe, Hus. They are known to the later Cosmographers by the name of Arabia in general: and by the names of Traconitis, Pieria Batanea, &c. of which I will speak in their proper places.

But where Moses describeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Genesis, he maketh no mention of the later Provinces, which fell to Manasse, Gad, and Reuben, for these be his words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou comest to Gerar untill Azzah (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Countrie North and South: then it followeth in the Text; And as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorah, and Admah, and Seboiim, even unto Lasha: by which words Moses seteth down the breadth, to wit, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterran. But in Deuteronomy it seemeth to be far more large: For it is therein written; All the places whereon the soal of your feet shall tread, shall be yours: your coast shall be from the Wilderness, ness, and from Libanon, and from the River Perah, unto the uttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Countrie North and South, this discription agreeth with the former: only Libanon is put for Zidon; and the Wilderness for Gerar and Azza, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Perah be taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretcheth it self both over Arabia Petræa, and the Desart, as far as the border of Babylon: which the Israelites never possest; nor at any time did so much as invade or attempt. And therefore Vadianus doth conceive, that by the River Perah was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this place of Josua: Behold, I have divided unto you by lot these Nations, that remain to be an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Jordan with all the Nations that I have destroyed, even unto the great Sea Westward. Ios. 23. 4.

And though it be true, that David greatly enlarged the Territory of the Holy Land: yet as Vadianus well noteth, if Perah in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it put per in gentes amicitiam receptas. For David did not at any time enter so far to the East as Assyria, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countries give advantage to those that would make any irreligious cavill, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites unperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his worship and service, it pleased him not onely to include them within that Territory, which was for so many people exceeding narrow; but therein and elsewhere to subject them unto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish gods themselves also served and obeyed. And sure the promise by which the Hebrews claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the lasting enjoying thereof, to wit, as long as the heavens were above the earth, was tied to those conditions, both in the Verses preceeding, and subsequent; which the Israelites never performed. And therefore they could not hope for other than all mankind could or can expect; who knew that all sorts of comforts from the merciful goodness of God looked for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to be attended, then while we persevere in his love, service, and obedience. So in the eighth Verse of the eleventh of Deuteronomy, the keeping of Gods Commandments was a condition joyned to the prosperity of Israel. For therein it is written; Therefore shall ye keep all the Commandements which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and go in, and possess the Land, whither ye go to possess it. Also that you may prolong your daies in the Land which the Lord sware unto your fathers, &c. Vadian. Epitom. trium terrapartium c. Palæstin. Deut. 11. 11. Deut. 11.

The like condition was also annexed to the enjoying of the Land conquered, and the possession thereof, so long as the heavens were above the earth. For if ye keep diligently, saith he, all these commandments, which I command you to do, that is, to love the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these Nations before you, and ye shall possess great Nations, and mightier than you. And here, though it be manifest, that by reason of the breach of Gods Commandments, and their falling away from the worship of his allpowerfull Majestie, to the Idolatry of the Heathen, the conditional promises of God were absolutely void, as depending upon obedience unperformed: yet I cannot mislike that exposition of Melanchon: For, saith he, Ostendit promissionem præcipuam non esse de hoc politico Regno; He sheweth that his chief promise is not of a civil Kingdom. To which agrees that answer which S. Hierome made to a certain Heretick in his Epistle ad Dardanum, who accused S. Hierome, that he overthrew the reputation of the Jews Story, and brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, and ad illam duntaxat viventium terram quæ in cœlis est; (that is) Onely to that land of the living which is in heaven. Quoniam tota Judæorum Regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, ut vix longitudinem habeat 160. milliarium, latitudinem verò 40. & in his etiam regiones, loca, urbes, & oppida sunt plurima, nunquam à Judæis occupata, sed tantùm divina pollicitatione promissa; Because the whole Countrey of the Jews is so narrow in compass, that it scarce hath 160. miles in length, and 40. miles in breadth, and in these are countries, places, cities, and many towns, which the Jews never possest, but were onely granted by divine promise. In like manner the same Father speaketh upon Esay, touching the blessings promised unto Hierusalem, where he hath these words: De quo discimus Hieruſalem nequaquam in Palæstinæ regione petendam, qua totius Provinciæ, deterrima est: & saxosis montibus asperatur, & penuriam patitur sitis: ita ut cœlestibus utatur pluviis, & raritatem fontium cisternarum extructione soletur: sed in Dei manibus, ad quam dicitur, festinaverunt structores tui; From whence, saith he, we learn, that Hierusalem is not to be sought in that region of Palæstina, which is the worst of the whole Province, and ragged with craggie mountains, and suffereth the penury of thirst: so as it preserveth rain water, and supplieth the scarsity of Wells by building of cisterns; but this Hierusalem Deut. 11. Sap 49 14.

salem is in Gods hands, to which it is said, Thy builders have hastened: so far St. Hierome; where also to prevent mistaking, he thus expoundeth himself: Neque hoc dico in suggillationem terræ Judææ, ut hæreticus Sycophanta mentitur: aut quo auferam historiæ veritatem, quæ fundamentum est intelligentiæ spiritualis: sed ut decutiam supercilium Judæorum, qui Synagogæ angustias latitudini Ecclesiæ præferunt: Si enim occidentem tantum sequuntur literam, & non spiritum vivificantem, ostendant terram promissionis lacte & melle manantem; Neither (saith he) say I this to disgrace the land of Judæa, as the heretical Sycophant doth belie me: or to take away the truth of the history, which is the foundation of spiritual understanding: but to beat down the pride of the Jews, which enlarge the straits of the Synogogue farther than the breadth of the Church: For if they follow only the killing letter, and not the quickening spirit, let them shew the Land of promise, flowing with Milk and Honey.

By this it may also be gathered, howsoever it be unlikely (seeing the West-bound in the place, Deut. 11. 24. had his truth in the litteral sense, that Euphrates or Perath, which is made the East-bound, should be taken only in a spiritual sense) yet nevertheless that Hierom's opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perath were not to be understood for Euphrates, and that the promise it self was never so large: much less the plantation and conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land, because Asher, Nephtalim, and Zabulon held the Northermost part, and were seated in Phœnicia, I will begin with these three, taking Asher for the first: of which Tribe yet before I spake, I must admonish the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many names, by reason of the divers fancies of Translators, are diversly expressed, so that to the unskilfull they may seem divers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diversity (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly because the antient Editions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Translators imagined other vowels than now the Hebrew Editions have; and partly, because the Antient expressed or omitted divers consonants, otherwise than the later do think fit.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF ASHER.

¶. I.

The bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

THE Asherites descended of Asher the son of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Egypt, to the number of 41500. and odd persons, all men above twenty years of age, and able to bear arms, at the time when they were mustered by Moses at Mount Sinai: all which number perishing in the Desarts, there remained of their issues, besides women and children, 53400. bodies fit for the wars: which past the river of Arnon into the Plains of Moab, and after the conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phœnicia, from Zidon and the fields of Libanus, unto Ptolomais Acon alongst the Sea-coast, containing thirty English miles, or thereabout: and from the Mid-land Sea to the East border some twelve miles: though Antoninus makes it some what larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitful, abounding in Wine, Oyl, and Wheat, besides the Balsamum, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Prophecy, Asher pinguis panis: Concerning Asher, his bread shall be fat: And he shall give pleasures for a King. Ant. Itin. Gen. 40.

¶. II.

Of Zidon.

THE first City seated on the North border of the Territory of Asher, was Zidon, which Josua calleth the great Zidon, both for strength and magnitude. The Greeks and Q. Curtius make Agenor the founder thereof: and Justine derives the name from the abundance of fish found on those shores: whereof it hath been called Zidona. But that it was far more antient, Moses, Josua, and Josephus witness, the same being founded by Zidon the eldest of Canaan's sons: and so strong it was in Josua's time, as neither did himself attempt it, neither could the Asserites, or any of their successours master it: but it continued all the time of the Judges and Kings, even unto the coming of Christ; a City interchangeably governed, by their own Princes or other Magistrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets, Esay, Hieremie, Ezechiel, and Zacharie, it was often afflicted, both by the enemies Justin. l. 18. Gen. 10. Joseph. Esa. 23. Hier. 47. Ezek. 28. & 32. Zac. 9.

enemies Sword, and by the Pestilence.

Zidon is seated on the very wash of the Phœnician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterran or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the City of Berythus, and the River Leontis: and to the South Sarepta, or Sarphat, which standeth between it and Tyre: the distance between which two great and famous Cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is 14. thousand paces, saith Seiglerus: but Vadianus makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Weissinburie in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make five and twenty miles. This difference of distance as well between these two known Cities, as all the rest, make it over-difficult to divise any new Scale to the Map and Description of the Holy Land.

Paleſt. Seig. f. 19. Vadian. Phen. f. 278. Strabo. l. 16.

What Kings it had till Agenors time there is no memory: the story which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time consumed and lost. It seemeth to be more antient than Tyre; which was also built by the Zidonians. For as * Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memory of Tyre, because it was but a member of Zidon; and a City subject to the Kings thereof: though it be true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacy, and became far more renowned, opulent, and strong: From Zidon had Solomon and Zorobabel their principal workmen, both in Timber and Stone, for the building of the Temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of learning, so did it in all other Mechanical Arts or Trades: the Prophet Zachary calling them the wise Zidonians. The City was both by nature and art exceeding strong, having a Castle or Citadell on the North-side, standing upon an unaccessible Rock, and compassed by the Sea, which after the Citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order: and another Castle it hath on the South-side by the Port of Egypt, which the Templers guarded. It also sent many other Colonies beside that of Tyre, into places remote: as unto Thebes, and Sephyra, Cities of Bœotia in Greece. Strabo and Pliny give the Zidonians the invention of * Glass, which they used to make of those Sands which are taken out of the River Belus, falling into the Mediterran Sea, neer Ptolomais, or Acon: and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those cleer Glasses which they make at Murana: of which St. Hierom and Pliny: Zidon insignis artifex vitri: Zidon vitrariis officinis nobilis; Zidon a famous Glass-maker, or a skilful worker in Glass-houses.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal and Astaroth: which Idols though common to the other of the issue of Canaan (as Pineda gathers out of 1 Sam. 31.10. and Judg. 10.6.) yet especially and peculiarly were accounted the gods of the Zidonians: as appears 1 Reg. 11. 5. in the story of Solomons Idolatry: where Astaroth is called the god of the Zidonians: and 1 Reg. 16. 33. in the story of Achab, the chief worshipper of Baal, where it is said, that he marrying Jezabel the daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal. Divers Baals and divers Astaroths in their Idolatries they acknowledged: as it appears by the plural names of Baalim, and Astaroth, 1 Sam. 12. 10. and elsewhere: for even the name Astaroth, as I am informed by a skillful Hebritian, is plural; the singular being Astoreth: whence Judg. 2. 13. the Septuagint read ἐλάτρευσαν ταῖς ἀστάρταις· They worshipped the Astarties. The occasion of this their multiplying of their Baals and Astoreths, may be diversly understood: either in respect of the diversity of the forms of the Images, or of the worship in divers places, or of the stories depending upon them: which (as fables use to be) were doubtless in divers Cities divers. Augustine quæst. 19. in Judg. thinks Baal and Astarte to be Jupiter and Juno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrians) call Juno by such a name as Astarte. Tully, lib. 3. de Nat. Dearum, making divers Goddesses of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to be Astarte: whom he makes to be born of Tyrus and Syria, and to have been the wife of Adonis: as also Macrob. 2. Saturn. cap. 21. sayes, that Adonis was with great veneration commonly worshipped of the Assyrians: and Hierome upon Ezek. 8.44. notes that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewail) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seem that in the worship of Astarte or Venus, they did bewail her husband Adonis: as also the Grecians did in their songs of Adonis: Mourn for Adonis the fair, dead is Adonis the fair. Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Osiris in the sacrifice of Isis: whose loss of her Husband Osiris, was as famous in the Egyptian Idolatry, as with the Grecians, Venus loss of Adonis. And to this agreeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iside & Osiride; that Osiris with the Egyptians is called Ammuz: which word may seem to be the same with Ezekiels Thammuz. But howsoever these Zidonians were thus antiently fostered with the milk of Idolatry: yet they were more apt to receive the Doctrine

The form of Astoreth (or Astarte) seemeth to have been a sheep, for Deut 7.13. the word in the plural number signifieth sheep and this may confirm Augustines opinion, that Astarte was Juno: for the form of her husband Jupiter Hammon was a Ram.

* It seems that even in Josua's time they practised glass-making, whence Junius for Misphreboth majim which ad verbum is as much as combusti ones aquarum, reads fornaces vitrarias, Jos. 11.8. as it seems because those fornaces were where there was store of water, either for the moving of the bellows by the force of the water, or for other necessary uses. But there are others that take them for salt-pits, and others again for hot baths.

of the Gospel of Christ after his Ascension, than the Jews: who had been taught by Moses and the Prophets so many years, whereof our Saviour in Matthew and Luke: Woe be to thee Corazin, &c. for if the great works which were done in thee, had been done in Tyrus and Zidon, they had repented long agone, &c. but I say unto you, it shall be easier for Tyrus and Zidon, at the day of judgment, than for you. Mat. 11 21

It received a Christian Bishop with the first: who was afterward of the Dioceſs of Tyre. But in the year of our Redemption 636. it fell into the hands of the Saracens, and continued in their possession till Baldwinus the first, then King of Hierusalem: in the year 1111. by the help of the Danes and Norwaies, who came with a Fleet to visit the Holy Land, and took Port at Joppa, it was again recovered, the commandment thereof being given to Eustace Gremer, a Noble man of that Country. And again in the year 1250. it was re-edified and strengthened by Lodowick the French King: while he spent four year in the War of the Holy Land. Lastly, in the year 1289. it was reconquered by the Saracens: and is now in possession of the Turk, and hath the name of Zai. Tyr. 11. Bell. Sacr. 14. Vitriac. c 27. Niger. Postellus.

§. III.

Of Sarepta, with a brief History of Tyre in the same Coast.

SArepta, or after the Hebrew, Sarphath, is the next City Southward from Zidon, between it and the River called Naar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a City very famous for the excellent Wine growing neer it: of which Sidonius:

Vina mihi non sunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna, Quæque Sareptano palmite missa bibas.

I have no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for the drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This City had also a Bishop, of the Dioceſs of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turks, as the rest: and is now called Saphet, saith Postellus.

Not far from Sarepta was scituate that sometime famous City of Tyre, whose fleets of ships commanded, and gave the law over all the Mediterran Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatness and power, the Tyrians erected Utica, Leptis, and Carthage in Africa, of which Virgil. Urbs antiqua fuit, Tyrii tenuere Coloni, Carthago. And Carthage was therefore called Punica quasi Phœnicum, a Colony of the Phœnicians. In Spain they founded Gades, now Caliz. In Italy, Nola: in Asia the less Dromos Achillis, which City the Scholiast of Apollonius placeeth neer the River Phyllis, in Bythinia. Virgil. l. 1. Plin. l. 5. c. 19. Marcelin. l. 22.

It had antiently the name of Zor, or Tzor: and so it is written in Josua the 19. taking name from the scituation; because built on a high Rock, sharp at one end. The Latines, as it seems, knew it by the name of Sarra: for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, Ostrum Sarranum, by which name Juvenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it upon a high hill, whereof many ruins remain to this day; the place being still known by the name of the antient Tyre: and because it was a Colony of the Zidonians, the Prophet Esay calleth it the Daughter of Zidon; which Trogus also confirmeth, though Berosus by affinity of name makes Thiras the son of Japhet to be the Parent thereof: and though no doubt it was very antient (for so much the Prophet Esay also witnesseth, Is not this your glorious Citie, whose antiquity is of antient days?) yet that Thiras the son of Japhet set himself in the bosom of the Canaanites who built Zidon, and peopled all that Region, I see nothing to persuade me. Gellius l. 4. c. 6. Cap. 23. Cap. 13.

But that new Tyre in after-times so renowned, seemeth to be the work of Agenor: and of this opinion was Curtius: and Josephus and Eusebius make this City elder than Solomon's Temple 240 years: Cedrenus 361. who also addeth, that Tyrus the wife of Agenor, gave it her name: but of Agenor I will speak more at large in the story of their Kings. Justin l. 18. Curt. l. 4. Euseb. in Chron. Joseph. ant. l. 8. cap. 2. Cedren. p. 27.

For strength and for the commodity of the harbour, and the better to receive Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Island 700. paces from the Continent; and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the middest of the Seas, as some read, or as others, in the inner-most part of the Sea, whence he called it scituate at the entry of the Sea, as also the same Prophet calleth it, the Mart of the people for many Isles: and Esay, a Mart of the Nations: and so proud, wealthy, and magnificent was this City, as the Prophet Esay calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the World. Ezek. 28. 12. 27. vers. 3. Esay 23. 3. 27. 8.

It excelled both in learning, and in manufacture: especially in the making and dying of Purple, and Scarlet-cloth: which, saith Julius Pollux, was first found out by Hercules Dog, who passing along the Sea-coast, and eating of the Fish Conchilis or Purpura, the the hair of his lips became of that colour. It worshipped the Idols that Zidon did: saving that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrians presented him with a Crown of gold, and other gifts, desiring to remain his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a sacrifice to Hercules, the Defendor of their City, and the Ancestor of the Macedonian Kings: and must therefore enter it. Whereupon they sent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountain of old Tyre: where he might perform that ceremony. But this availed not: for Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitious; he desired to enter the Town, which being denied, he, as one whom no peril could fear, nor labour weary, gathered together as many ships as he could, and brought from Libanus so great a number of Cedars, & so many weighty stones from the old City of Tyre adjoyning, as notwithstanding that his materials were often washt away with the strength of the Sea and the Tides, yet he never rested, till he had made a foot-passage from the Continent to the Island: and having once approached their walls, he overtopt them with Turrets of wood, and other frames: from whence (having filled the body of force with the violent moving spirit of resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the Sword that resisted; after which, he caused 2000. more to be hung up in a rank all alongst the Sea-shore: which execution upon cold bloud he performed (as some Authors affirm) upon the issues of those slaves which had formerly slain all their Masters, taking their Wives, Children, Riches, and power of Government to themselves. This victory of Alexander over the Tyrians, Josephus remembreth: and how Sanaballat revolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000. Souldiers: who was the last Satrapa or Provincial Governour, which Darius seated in Samaria: the same who having married his Daughter to Manasse, brother to Jaddas the high Priest of Hierusalem, obtained of Alexander, that a Temple might be built on the Mountain Garizim over Samaria: that the forces of the Jews being divided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The honour of which Priesthood he bestowed on his son in law Manasse, whom the Jews oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander besieged Gaza, Sanaballat, whom Guil. Tyrius called Sanabula, died.

Joseph. ant. jud. l. 11. c. 8.

De bell. sacr. l. 13. c. 4.

Long before this desolation of Tyre by the cruelty of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanasser the Assyrian King: when the growing pride of the Assyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the rest of Syria, became envious of the beauty, riches, and power of that city. He besieged it both on the Land-side, and with threescore ships of war held the Port: to the end that neither any victuals nor any supply of men might enter it: but the Tyrians with twelve sail scattered that fleet, and took 500. prisoners of the Assyrians: notwithstanding, the Assyrian continued his resolution, and lay before it by his Lievtenants five years, but with ill success. And this siege Menander Ephesius, cited by Josephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as he found the Story among the Annals of the Tyrians (which the said Menander converted into Greek) adding, that Elulæus, whom Tyrius called Helisæus, was then King of Tyre, having governed the same six and twenty years. Soon after this repulse of Salmanasser; and about 200. years before the victory of Alexander, Nabuchodonosor, at such time as he destroyed Hierusalem with the Temple, came before this City: who indeed gave to Alexander the example of that despairful work, of joyning it to the Continent. For Nabuchodonosor had formerly done it: though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the strength of the Sea, the same cawsey and passage was again broken down, and demolished.

Joseph. ant. lib. 9. c. 14.

Et conte Ap. 1. Guil Tyr. de Bell. Sacr. 13. 14. Joseph ant. lib. 9. c. 15.

Against Nabuchodonosor, for many years, the Tyrians defended themselves: for so long did those Babylonians continue before it, As every head was made bald, and every shoulder made bare, saith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Esay had manifestly foretold the destruction of this proud place. In the end, and after 13. years siege or more, the Tyrians despoyled of all their hopes, and remembring over-late the predictions and threatnings of Gods Prophets, having prepared a convenient number of ships, abandoned their City, transporting with themselvs the ablest of all that remained: and with their wives, children, and portable riches, sayled thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritimate Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: so as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to satisfie so many labours and perils, or any person upon whom to avenge themselves for the loss of so many bodies in that War: It pleased God in recompence thereof (who strengthened this resolution, as in a work of his own) to make Nabuchodonosor victorious over the Egyptians: and gave him that Kingdom and the spoil thereof, as it were, in wages for his Army. Whereupon Saint Hierom noteth, that God leaveth not the good deeds of the Heathen unrewarded: who though they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action, to attain unto that eternal happiness reserved for his Servants and Saints: yet such is the boundless goodness of God, as he often repayeth them with many worldly gifts and temporal blessings.

Joseph. ant l.10. c. 13. Now of this enterprise of Nabuchodonosor's against Tyre, prophane Historians have not been silent. For both Diocles, and Philostratus (as Josephus citeth them) the one in his second Book, the other in his Phœnician Histories remember it.

After these two great Vastations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon, this City of Tyre, repaired and recovered it self again: and continued in great glory about 300. years, even to the coming of our Saviour Christ: and after him flourished in the Christian Faith neer 600. years: the Archbishop whereof gave place to none but to the Patriarch of Hierusalem onely, who within his own Dioceis had fourteen great Cities, with their Bishops and Suffragans: namely Caipha, Guil. Tyr. bell. sac. otherwise Porphiria, Acon, or Ptolomais, Sarepta, Zidon, Cæsarea Philippi, Berytus, Byblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthosia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus, (or Tortosa) and Maraclea. But in the year 636. it was with the rest of that beautiful Region of Phœnicia and Palestina, subjected to the cruel and faithless Saracen: under the burthen and yoke of whose tyranny it suffered, with the other Palestine Cities, 488. years.

Guil. Tyr. 11. Bell: sacr. 17. In the year 1112. it was attempted by Baldwine King of Hierusalem; but in vain: yet in the year 1124. by Guaremonde, Patriarch of Hierusalem, Vicegerent to Baldwine the second, with the assistance of the Venetians, and their fleet of Gallies, it was again recovered, and subjected to the Kings of Hierusalem, and so it remained 165. years.

Finally, in the year 1189. Saladine having first taken Hierusalem, removed his whole Army, and sate down before Tyre: drawing his fleet of Ships and Gallies from Alexandria into the Port, this City as then onely remaining in the Christian power.

The Citizens finding themselves reduced into great famine, and many other miseries, they at once with certain rafters of timber, fiered, burnt, and brake the Saracens fleet, and sallyed out resolvedly upon his Army, slew so great numbers of them; and followed their victory with such fury, as that the Saracens forsaking their Trenches and Tents, removed in great disorder and dishonour. Two years after which victory the body of that famous Frederick Barharossa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Christians enemies over a River unfoordable perished by the weight of his armour therein) was brought and interred in the Cathedral Church of Tyre, neer unto that glorious Sepulchre of Origen, garnished and graven with guilt pillers of Marble, 940. years before therein buried: but in the year 1289. the Saracens again attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subject to the Turks.

‖. IV.

Of Ptolomais or Acon.

THe third City alongst the coast of the Sea, which the Asserites could not obtain, on the South bound of Asser was Acho, which was the antient name thereof after Hierome, though other good Authours affirm, that it took name from Acon the brother of Ptolomie. Pliny calleth it Ace: and otherwise the Colony of Claudius. It had also the name of Coth, or Cod, and by Zeiglerus it is called Hactipos. Plin. l.5. c.19. In descrip. terr. sanct.

But lastly, it was intituled Ptolomais, after the name of one of the Egyptian Ptolomies: which City also, as it is 1 Mac. 11. another of the Ptolomies, infideliously wrested from his son in law Alexander, which called himself the son of Antiochus Epiphanes: the same Alexander having married Cleopatra, daughter of the said Ptolomie, not long before. Therein also was Jonathan Machabæus treacherously surprised and slain, as it is 1 Mac. 12. 48. by the perfidiousnes of Tryphon, whom soon after Antiochus pursued, as it is in the Story ensuing: and, by like reason, about the same time was the aforesaid Alexander in the war against Demetrius, one of the sons of Antiochus the great, with whom Ptolomy joyned, overthrown and treacherously murthered by Zabdiel the Arabian: to whom he fled for succour: and his head presented unto his father in law Ptolomie: who enjoyed not the glory of his victory and treason above three daies, for God struck him by death. Ptolomeus Philometer. 1 Mac. 1. 10. 1 Mac. 11. 18.

For the beauty and strength of this City, this Alexander made it his regal seat; two parts of the same being invironed by the Sea, and the Port, for safety and capacity, not inferiour to any other in all that Tract. This City is distant from Hierusalem some four and thirty miles: four miles to the North from the Mountain Carmel, and as much to the South from Castrum Lamberti: from Tyre, Antonius maketh it two and thirty Italian miles. *Ant. miles. In the middest of the City there was a Tower of great strength, sometime the Temple of Bel-zebub: and therefore called the Castle of Flies, on the top whereof there was mantained a perpetual light like unto that called Pharus in Egypt: to give comfort in the night to those ships which came neer and sought that part. It had in it a Bishops seat of the Dioceſs of Tyre, after it became Christian: but in the year 636. (a fatal year to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Haomarus the Saracen. In the year 1104. it was regained by Baldwine the first, by the help of the Gallies of Genoa: to whom a third of the revenue was given in recompence. Again, in the year of our Lord God, one thousand one hundred fourscore and seven, Saladine King of Egypt and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the year of Christ, one thousand one hundred ninety and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France, it was repossessed and redelivered to the Christians. Lastly, in the year 1291. it was by the fury of the Saracens besieged with an Army of 150000. entered, sack'd, and utterly demolished: though in some sort afterward reedified, and it is now Turkish.

Of the Castle of Saint George.

FIve miles from Ptolomais towards the East, is a Castle of St. George seated, in which he was born: the Valley adjoyning bearing the same name. And though for the credit of Saint Georges killing the Dragon, I leave every man to his own belief: yet I cannot but think, that if the Kings of England had not some probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successors royally have continued, should have born his name, seeing the World had not that scarcity of Saints in those daies, as that the English were driven to make such an erection upon a fable, or person feigned. The place is described by Adricomius in his description of Asser, to have been in the fields of Libanus, between the River Adonis, and Zidon: his own words are these: Hoc loco qui ab incolis Cappadocia appellatur, non longè à Beryto, memorant inclytum Christi Militem D. Georgium, Regis filiam ab immanissimo Dracone asservâsse: eamque mactata bestia parenti restituisse. In cujus rei memoriam Ecclesia postmodum fuit ædificata; In this place, which by the Inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not far from Berytus, men say that the famous Knight of Christ, Saint George, did rescue the Kings daughter from a huge Dragon: and having killed the beast, delivered the Virgin to her Parent. In memory of which deed a Church was after built there: Thus far Adricomius. His Authors he citeth Lodovicus Roman, Patric. Navigationum l. 1. c. 3 and Bridenbach Itin. 5. The Valley under this Castle sometime called Asser, was afterward called the Valley of Saint George. If this authority suffice not, we may rather make the Story allegorical, figuring the victory of Christ, than except of George the Arrian Bishop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

BEtween Ptolomais and Tyre alongst the Sea-coast, was the strong City of Acziba, or Achazib, which S. Hierome called Achziph, and Josephus Ecdippos, Plinie Ecdippa, one of those which defended it self against the Asserites. Belforrest finds Acziba and Sandalium, or the Castle of Alexander to be one, but I know not from whence he had it.

The twelve Searchers of the Land which Moses sent from Cadesbarn, travelled as far to the North as Roob, or Rechob, in the Tribe of Asser, which Rechob, as also Berothæ, which by Ezechiel, cap. 47. ver. 16. is placed in these North borders, belonging in Davids time to the King Hadarhezer, as it may be gathered out of the second of Samuel, chap. 8. ver. 8. and chap. 10. ver. 6. and it defended it self against the Asserites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achziph, Ptolomais, Alab, Helbah, and Aphek did.

This Aphek it was, whose wall falling down, slew seven and twenty thousand of Benhadads Souldiers, after that a hundred thousand had been slaughtered by the Israelites, under the conduct of Ahab. Here Junius finds that the Philistims encamped a little before the battel at Gilboa, though in his note upon the first of Samuel the 9. & 1. he takes Aphek there mentioned (at which battel the Ark was taken) to have been in Juda. Of which Jos. 15. and 53. & in the second of Kings 13. 17. he reads, Fortiter, for, in Aphek. Where others covert it, Perentiens Syros in Aphek.

1 King. 20 29. 1 Sam. 29. 1.

The next place alongst the coast is Sandalium, first called Schandalium of Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it when he besieged Tyre: and set it on a point of Land which extendeth it self into the Sea, between Acziba and Tyre: which Castle Baldwine the first rebuilt and fortified; in the year of Christ 1157. when he undertook the recovery of Tyre.

Not much above a mile from this Castle, there ariseth that most plentiful Spring of water, which Solomon remembreth, called the Well of living Water: from whence not only all the fields and plains about Tyre are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawn: but the same Spring, which hath not above a bow-shot of ground to travel till it recover the Sea, driveth six great Mills in that short passage, saith Brochard.

Jos. 12. 20 Within the Land, and to the East of Acziba, and Sandalium, standeth Hosa: and beyond it, under the Mountains of Tyre, the City of Achsaph, or Axab, or after S. Hierome, Aciſap, a City of great strength, whose King, amongst the rest, was slain by Josua, at the waters of Merom.

¶. VII.

Of Thoron, Giscala, and some other places.

FUrther into the Land, towards Jordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Hugo de Sancto Abdemare built on the Eastermost hills of Tyre, in the year 1107. thereby to restrain the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians: the place adjoyning being very fruitful, and exceeding pleasant. From this Castle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the story of the Wars for the recovery of the Holy Land, derive their names, and take their Nobility. It had in it a curious Chappel, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, in which Humfrey of Thoron, Constable to Baldwine the 3. King of Hierusalem, lieth buried: There were five Castles besides this within the Territory of Asser: whereof four are seated almost of equal distance from each other: to wit, Castrum, Lamperti, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Castrum Regium and Belfort: the first neer the Sea under the hills of Saron, the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort, and Regium, stand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brotherhood and fellowship of the Teutonici, or Dutch Knights (by which they defended themselves, and gave succour to other Christians at such time as the Saracens possest the best part of the upper Galilee) the chief of which Order was in Ptolomais Achon. The first fortress was for beauty and strength called Belfort, seated in the high ground upon the River Naar, neer the City Rama: of which in this Tribe Jos. 19. 29. for which the Vulgar reads Horma: making the article a part of the word, and mistaking the vowels: from the siege of this Castle of Belfort, the great Saladine King of Syria and Egypt, was by the Christians Army raised, and with great loss and dishonour repulsed. Herold. l. 2. c. 4. Continuationis, Bell. ac.

To the East of Belfort, is the strong City of Alab (or Achlab) which S. Hierome calleth Chalab, one of those that defended themselves against Asser, as Roob (or Rechob) not far thence did.

Towards the South from Roob they place Gabala (which Herod surnamed the Ascalonite rebuilt) making it of the Territory of Chabol, Quod Syrorum lingua dispicere significat (saith Weishenburg) so called, because Hiram of Tyre was ill pleased with those twenty Cities, seated hereabout, which Solomon presented unto him in recompence of those provisions sent him for the building of the Temple. Others think this Chabol (or Cabul) containing a circuit of those twenty Cities given to Hiram, to have been without the compass of the Holy Land, though bordering Asher on the North side: as it is said, 1 Reg. 9. 11. That they were in Regione limitis: that is, in limite Regionis, in the border of the Countrey: for as it was not lawful, say they, to give to strangers any part of the possessions allotted to the Israelites: howsoever, that after Hiram had refused them, they were peopled by the Israelites, it appears, 2 Chron. 8. 14. And it seems they were conquered by David from the Syri Rechobeæ, whose City Roob, or Rechob, was in these parts. Joseph. ant. 19. 21 & 15. 10. Jun. annot. in 1 Reg. 9. 11. 2 Sam. 10. 6.

Almost of equal distance from the Castle of Thoron, they place the Cities of Giscala, and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed over Jordan: Giscala was made famous by John the son of Levi, who from a mean estate gathering together four hundred Thieves, greatly troubled all the upper Galilee, at such time as the Romans attempted the conquest of Judæa: by whose practice Josephus, who then commanded in the upper Galilee, was greatly indangered: whereof himself hath written at large, in his second Book of those Wars. This John betraying, in all he could, the City of Giscala (whereof he was native) to the Roman State: and finding a resistance in the City, gave opportunity, during the contention, to the Tyrians and Gadarins, to surprize it: who at the same time forc't it, and burnt it to the ground: but being by Josephus authority rebuilt, it was afterward rendred to Titus by composition. They finde also the Cities of Cana Major, and * Cades (or Cadessa) Cap. 26. * See Kedesh in Nephthalim Matth. 15. Mark 7. Macca. 1. 73. Josephus Antiq. 13. c. 8.

of the first was that Syro-phœnician, whose Daughter Christ delivered of the evil spirit. Neer the other, they say, it was that Jonathas Machabeus overthrew the Army of Demetrius.

There are, besides these fore-named Cities, within the Tribe of Asser, divers others: as on the South border, and near the Sea, Mesall, or Misheall: within the Land (a) Besara, (b) Bethdagon, and Bethemec, standing on the South border between Asher and Zabulon: on the North side joyning to Syrophœnicia, is the City of Hethalon, or Chethlon, the utmost of the Holy Land that way: under which, towards the Sea, is Chali, and then (c) Enoch, supposed to be built by Cain, and named of his son Enoch, but without probability, as I have formerly proved. There are others also besides these, as Ammon, or Chammon, of which Jos. 19. 28. where also we read of Nehiel, Rama, Alamelec, and Beron: the Cities of Alcath, or Chelcath, Habdon, and Rechob, and Misheal, which we have already mentioned, were by the Asserites given to the Levites. Of others held by the Canaanites, mention is made, Judg. 1. 30. to which out of Josua we may add Ebron, Amhad, and others, on which no story dependeth; and therefore I will not pester the description with them.

§. VIII.

Of the Rivers and Mountains of Asser.

THE Rivers to the North of Asser, are Adonis, afterward Canis, to which Zeigler joyneth Lycus; Ptolomy, Leantis: both which fall into the Sea neer Berytus: which River of Leontis, Montanus draws neer unto Zidon: finding his head notwithstanding where Ptolomy doth, between Zidon and Tyre. It hath also a River called Fons hortorum Libani, which Adrichome out of Brochard intituleth Eleutherus: for which he also citeth Pliny, and the first of Machabees the eleventh Chapter; but neither of those authorities prove Eleutherus to be in Asser: for this River falleth into the Sea at the Isle of Aradus: not far from Balanæa, witness Ptolomy: and therefore Pinetus calleth it Valania, and Postellus, Velana; which River boundeth Phœnicia on the North-side: to which Strabo also agreeth: but this principal River of Asser, Arias Montanus calleth Gabatus. Christianus Chrot out of the mouth and papers of Peter Laicstan (which Laicstan in this our age both viewed and described the Holy Land) calleth the main River Fons hortorum Libani: and one of the streams which runneth into it from the North-side, Naar, and another from the South-west, Chabul: of the city adjoyning of the same name: for Eleutherus it cannot be. There is also another River described by Adrichome, named Jepthael, which I find in no other Author, and for which he citeth Jos. 19. but the word [a] Ghe, which is added there to Jepthael, is not taken for a River, but for a Valley: and for a Valley the Vulgar, the Geneva, and Arias Montanus turn it. There is also found in Asser the River of Belus, remembred by Josephus and Tacitus, which is also called Pagidas, saith * Pliny: out of the sands of this River are made the best Glass, which sometimes the Zidonians practised: and now the Venetians at Murana. Arias Montanus makes Belus to be a branch of Chedumim, which it cannot be: for Belus is known to flow from out the Lake Cendevia, as all Cosmographers, both Ancient and Modern, and the later Travellers into those parts witness. It is true that the River of Chison taketh water from Chedumim, but not in that fashion which Montanus hath described it: neither doth it find the Sea at Ptolomais Acon, according to Montanus but farther to the South between Caiphas and Sicaminum, witness Zeigler, Adrichomius, and Schrot.

Besides these Rivers there are divers famous Springs and Fountains, as that of living waters adjoyning to Tyre: and [b] Maserephot, or after S. Hierome, Maserephotmaim, whose Well filled by the flood of the Sea adjoyning (they say) the Inhabitants by seething the water make salt thereof, as at Nantwitch.

The Mountains which bound Asser on the North, are those of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Cœlosyria: two great ledges of Hills, which from the Sea of Phœnicia and Syria, extend themselves far into the Land Eastward, 400. stadia, or furlongs, according to Strabo: for that length he giveth to the Valley of Cœlosyria, which those Mountains incluse: but Pliny gives them 1500. furlongs in length from the West (where they begin at Theipsophon, or Dei facies, near Tripolis to the Mountains of Arabia beyond Damascus: where Anti-Libanus turneth towards the South. These ledges where they begin to part Traconitis and Basan, from the Desart Arabia, are called Hermon: which Moses also nameth Sion, the Phœnicians, Syrion; and the Amorites, Sanir; neither is this any one Mountain apart, but a continuation of Hills: which running farther Southerly, is in the Scriptures called Galaad, or Gilead: the same being still a part of Libanus, as the Prophet

[a] The word Nachal is ambiguous, either for a Valley or for a River: but this word Ghe is alway a valley, as in Gehinnon and Gesemanim. Joseph. l. 2. Bell. Jud. c. 3.

In Jos. c. 19. v. 26. it is called Sichor, of which name many understand another stream Jos. 13 3. which running by Petra of Arabia, falleth into the Lake Sirbonis, and divideth Egypt from the promised Land, wherea. bout they place Rhinocolura, for which city Junius taketh Sichor in that place of Josua: but howsoever whether this Sichor, Jos. 15. 3. be a River or a City, it appears that this name is found both in the North bound of the Holy Land, Jos. 19. 26 and in the South bound, Jos. 13. 3.

Hieremy

Hieremy proveth: Galaad tu mihi caput Libani: noting, that this Galaad is the higheſt of thoſe Hills of Libanus. Strabo knows them by the name of Traconitæ: and Ptolomy by Hippus. Arius Montanus calleth theſe Mountains bordering Aſſer; Libanus, for Anti-libanus, contrary to all other Coſmographers, but he giveth no reaſon of his opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops, becauſe (according to Tacitus) the higheſt of them are covered with ſnow all the Summer: the Hebrew word Libanos, (ſaith Weiſſenburg) ſignifieth whiteneſs. Others call them by that name of the Frankincence which thoſe Trees yeild: becauſe λιβάνος is alſo the Greek word for that Gum.

Niger out of Aphrodiſeus affirmeth, that on Libanus there falleth a kind of honey dew, which is by the Sun congealed into hard Sugar, which the Inhabitants call Sacchar, from whence came the Latine word Saccarum.

The Rivers which Libanus beſtoweth on the neighbour Regions, are, Chryſorrhoas, Jordan, Eleutherus, Leontes, Lycus, Adonis, Fons hortorum Libani, and others.

The reſt of the Mountains of Aſſer, are thoſe Hills above Tyre, and the Hills of Saron, both exceeding fruitful: but thoſe are but of a low ſtature, compared with Libanus: for from Nebo, or the Mountain of Abarim in Reuben, Moſes beheld Libanus threeſcore miles diſtant.

THE TRIBE OF NEPHTALIM.

¶. I.

Of the bounds of Nephtalim, and of Heliopolis, and Abila.

THE next portion of the Land of Canaan bordering Aſher, was the upper Galilee: the greateſt part whereof fell to the lot of Nephtalim, the ſon of Jacob by Bilha, the hand-maid of Rachel: who while they abode in Egypt, were increaſed to the number of 53400. perſons, able men to bear arms, numbred at Mount Sinai: all which leaving their bodies in the Deſarts, there entred the Holy Land of their ſons, 45400. beſides Infants, Women, and Children, under twenty years of age. The Land of Nephtalim took beginning on the North part, from the Fountains of Jordan, and the Hill of Libanus adjoyning, as far South as the Sea of Galilee, bounded on the Weſt by Aſher, and on the Eaſt and South-Eaſt by Jordan.

On the North-ſide of Libanus, and adjoyning to this Territory of Nephtalim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) alſo inhabit, in which Tract, and under Libanus, was the city of Heliopolis: which the heighth of the Monntains adjoyning ſhadowed from the Sun the better part of the day. Poſtellus calls it Balbec; Niger, Marbech; and Leonclavius, Beallebeca.

Of this name of Heliopolis, there are two great cities in Egypt: the firſt called On, by the Hebrews, and the Chaldæan Paraphraſt; otherwiſe Bethſemes, or after the Latines, Solis oppidum, or Domus Solis; The City of the Sun: into which, ſaith Ulpian, Severus the Roman Emperour ſent a Colony: the other Geſtelius nameth Dealmarach: and of this name Stephanus alſo findeth a city in Thrace, and Glycas in Phrygia.

There is alſo in the ſame Valley adjoyning to Nephtalim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalcis of whom the region towards Palmyrena hath the name of Chalcidica, over which Herod Agrippa, and Bernice the Queen commanded.

Abila alſo gave name to the region adjoyning, of which Lyſanius the ſon of Herod the elder, became Tetrarch or Governour: whereof Ptolomy gave it the addition of Lyſanii, and called it Abila Lyſanii. Volaterran names it Aphila, of which he notes, that one Diogenes, a famous Sophiſter was native, who by Volaterran is intituled Apuleius, not Abileus. After that this city of Abila or Aphila, had received the Chriſtian Faith, Priſcillinus became the Biſhop thereof: ſlain afterward by our Britiſh Maximus at Trever. For diſtinction of this city (if it be not the ſame, as it may be thought to be the ſame) it is to be remembred, that in the Tribe of [a] Manaſſe, joyning upon the bounds of the Tribe of Nephtalim, there is another city of the ſame name, ſaving that it is written with an (E) for an (I) and called Abela, remembred in the 20. chapter of the ſecond of Samuel. The ſame Joſephus calls Abelmachea, and Hierome, Bethmacha. In the place of Samuel, for diſtinction ſake, it is written Abel Beth-Mahaca, (for belike it was the Town of Mahaca the wife of Macir, the ſon of Manaſſe, the father of Gilead) in the Chronicles it is called Abel-Majim. This city Joab beſieged, becauſe Seba the ſon of Bichri, who rebelled againſt David, fled thereinto for ſuccour: but a certain wiſe woman of the city perſwading the people to caſt Seba his head over the wall, Joab retired his Army. The ſame city was afterward taken by the King of Damaſcus, Benadad: and after a while by Teglatphalaſar.

[a] Alſo a third in Ephraim, called Abel-Mechola and a 4th in Reuben, called Abel-Sittim, alſo Abel-Miſraim, at the Foord of Jordan, and (as it ſeems) in the ſame Tribe of Reuben, of all which in that which follows: to which alſo we may add Abel-Mognum, the name, as ſome think, of a city, otherwiſe called Bethſhemei, near the border of the Philiſtims, or according to others, of the great ſtone in the border. *1 Sam. 6. 18. The word Abel may be expounded, either to signifie bewailing, or a plain ground; and therefore no marvel that many Towns (with some addition for distinction sake) were thus called: for even of bewailing, many places took name; as Bochim, Judg. 2. 4. and so doutless * Abel-Misraim, Gen. 50. 11. and yet Junius in his notes upon Num. 33. 49. thinks that Abel-Sittim was so called, rather by reason of the plain ground there, (to wit, in the Land of Moab) and so perhaps Abel-Meholah in the Tribe of Ephraim: the Town of Elisha the Prophet: also Abel-Vinearum of the Ammonites, whither Jephta pursued them.

Of Hazor.

IN the Tribe of Nephtalim was that famous City of Jabin, in Josua's time called Asor, (or after the Chaldæan Paraphrast, Haszor) by Josephus, Asora; by Junius, * Chatzor: which Laicstan names Hesron; the Regal City, and Metropolis of Canaan: seated in the West part of Nephtalim, towards Asher. In this city was that great Rendevous and Assembly of those four and twenty Kings against Josua: who being all overthrown, slain, and scattered, this their powerful city was by Josua taken and burnt to dust. But in process of time the same being re-built by the Canaanites, a second King Iabin, 137. years after the death of this first Iabin, invaded the Israelites: and being ordained of God to punish their Idolatry, he prevailed against them, and held them in a miserable servitude 20. years; till Debora the Propheteſs overthrew Sisera, Iabins Lievtenant, and his Army, near the Mountain Tabor. This city Solomon restored at such time as he also re-edified Gezar, burnt by Pharao of Egypt, with [c] Megiddo, Bethoron, and other cities; but about 260. years after, it fell into the hands of Teglatphalasar, King of the Assyrians. It is now, saith Adricomius, called Antiopia: it was one of the principal cities of Decapolis. There is another city of this name in the Territory of Benjamin, seated on the confines of Ascalon, called the new Hazor, saith [d] Hierome.

* Of two other Cities of this name in Juda, see c. 9. sect. 1. Of a 4th in Benjamin, see that which follows in this place: of a fifth in this Tribe of Nephtalim, called Hen-Chatsor, we read Jos. 19. 27. whereto we may add Chatsor-Henan, in the uttermost North-east of Manasse, over Jordan, Eze. 47 Num. 34. 8. Of Cæsarea Philippi.

THere was also on the border, and within the Territory of Nephtalim, that renowned city of Lais, or Lajisch, as Junius writes it, or Leschen; which city the children of Dan (being straitned in their Territory under Juda) invaded and mastered; and gave it the name of their own Parent Dan: and by that name it is written in Genes. 14. at which place Abraham surprised Chedorlaomer and his confederates, and followed his victory as far as Sobah, formerly remembred in the division of Syria, otherwise called Sophena. And after the possession of the Danites, it had the joynt name of Leschem-Dan. Weissenburg writes it Lacis, the Geneva, Laish; Josephus, Dana, Benjamin, Balina; Breidenbach, Belena: but the now Inhabitants know it by the name of Belina to this day: witness Neubrigensis, Tyrius, Volaterranus, Brochard the Monk, and Postellus: who also taketh this city to be the same, which in Matth. 15. 39. in the Vulgar is called Magedan, for which the Greek Text hath Magdala in that place; and in S. Mark, speaking of the same story, Dalmanutha. At such time as the children of Dan obtained this place, it seemeth that it was either a free city, of the alliance and confederacy of the Zidonians, or else subject unto the Kings thereof; for it is written Judg. 18. And there was none to help, because Lais was far from Zidon: and they had no business with other men: for it was above thirty English miles from the Mediterran Sea, and from Zidon.

Plin. l. 5. c. 15.

In after-times when these regions became subject to the state of Rome, it had the name of Paneas, from a Fountain adjoyning so called: and therefore Ptolomy calls it Cæsarea Paniæ. Hegesippus calls it Parnium, saith Weissenburg: but he had read it in a corrupt copy; for in Hegesippus, set out by Badius, it is written Paneum without an (R): and at such time as Philip the son of the elder Herod, brother to Herod, Tetrarch of Galilee, became Governour of Traconitis, sometime Basan: this city was by him amplified and fortified; and both to give memory to his own name, and to flatter Tyberius Cæsar, he called it * Cæsarea Philippi: and so it became the Metropolis, and head city of Traconitis, and one of the first cities of Decapolis. And being by Agrippa in the succeeding age greatly adorned; by him in honour of Nero, it was called Neronia, or Neroniada. But as nothing remained with that Emperour, but the memory of his impiety: so in S. Hieroms time the Citizens remembred their former Paneas, and so re-called it, with the Territory adjoyning by the ancient name. Of this City was that woman whom Christ healed of a bloody issue, by touching the hem of his garment with a constant Faith: who afterward, ward, as she was a woman of great wealth and ability, being mindful of Gods goodness, and no less grateful for the same, as Eusebius and Nicephorus report, caused two Statues to be cast in pure Copper: the one representing Christ, as near as it could be moulded: the other made like her self, kneeling at his feet, and holding up her hands towards him. These she mounted upon two great Bases or Pedestals of the same metal, which she placed by a Fountain near her own house: both which (saith Eusebius) remained in their first perfection, even to his own time: which himself had seen, who lived in the reign of Constantine the Great. But in the year after Christ 363. that Monster Julian Apostata, caused that worthy Monument to be cast down and defaced: setting up the like of his own in the same place: which Image of his was with fire from Heaven broken into fitters: the head, body, and other parts sundered and scattered, to the great admiration of the people at that time living. The truth of this accident is also confirmed by Sozomenus Salaminius, in his fifth Book and twentieth Chapter.

This City built by the Danites, was near the joyning together of those two Rivers, which arising from the springs of Jor and Dan, the two [a] apparent Fountains of Jordan, in a soil exceeding fruitful and pleasant: for, as it is written, Judges 18. it is a place which doth want nothing that is in the world. In the fields belonging to this City it was that S. Peter acknowledged Christ to be the Son of God: whereupon it was answered, Tu es Petrus, & super hanc Petram, &c. After this City received the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seat: and it ran the same fortune with the rest, for it was after taken and re-taken by the Saracens, and Christians: under Fulch the fourth King of Hierusalem, and after the death of Godfrey of Bullion, the King of Damascus wrested it from the Christians; and shortly after by them again it was recovered. Lastly, now it remaineth with all that part of the World subjected to the Turk.

[a] Josephus in the book of the Jewish war, ch. 18. saith, that Philip the Tetrarch cast chaffe into a Fountain called Phiala, distant 120. stadia North east from Cæsarea, which chaffe being carried under ground, was cast up again at Panium or Dan, whereby it is conjectured, that the first Spring of Jordan is from this Fountain called Phiala, from whence Jor and Dan receive their waters.

¶. IV.

Of Capernaum, and the Cities of Decapolis.

AMong the remarkable Cities within this Tribe, Caphernaum is not the least: so often remembred by the Evangelists. This City had the honour of Christs presence three years: who for that time was a Citizen thereof, in which he first preached and taught the doctrine of our salvation: according to that notable Prophecy of Esay 9. The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light: they that dwelt in the Land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined.

Caphernaum was seated on Iordan, even where it entreth into the Sea of Galilee, in an excellent and rich soil: of whose destruction Christ himself prophesied in these words, And thou Caphernaum which art lifted up unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell, &c. which shewed the pride and greatness of that City: for it was one of the principal Cities of Decapolis, and the Metropolis of Galilee. And although there were some marks of this Cities magnificence in Saint Hieroms time, as himself confesseth; it being then a reasonable Burge or Town: yet those that have since, and long since seen it, as Brochard, Breidenbech, and Saliniac affirm, that it then consisted but of six poor Fishermens houses.

The Region of ten principal Cities, called Decapolitana, or Decapolis, is in this description often mentioned, and in S. Matthew, Mark and Luke also remembred; but I find no agreement between the Cosmographers, what proper limits it had: and so Pliny himself confesseth; for Marius Niger, speaking from others, bounds it on the North by the Mountain Casius in Casiotis: and endeth it to the South at Egypt and Arabia; by which description it imbraceth Phœnicia, a part of Cœlosyria, all Palestina, and Indæa.

Pliny also makes it large, and for the ten Cities of which it taketh name, he numbreth four of them to be situated towards Arabia: to wit, first these three, Damascus, Opotos, Raphana, then Philadelphia (which was first called Amana, saith Stephanus, or as I ghess, Amona rather, because it was the chief City of the Ammonites, known by the name of Rabbah, before Ptolo. Philadelphus gave it this later and new name.) Then Scythopolis, sometime Nisa, built (as is said) by Baccus, in memory of his Nurse, who died therein, anciently known by the name of Bethsan; for the sixth he setteth Gadara (not that Gadara in Cœlosyria, which was also called Antioch and Selensia:) but it is Gadara in Basan, which Pliny in this place meaneth, seated on an high hill, near the River of Hieromaix. This River Ortelius takes to be the River Jaboc: which bounded Gad and Manasse over Jordan: but he mistaketh it; for Hieromaix falleth into the Sea of Galilee, between Hippos and Gerasa, whereas Jaboc entreth the same Sea betwen Ephron and Phanuel. For the seventh he nameth * Hippos, or Hippion, a City so called of a Colony of Horsmen there garrison'd by by Herod, on the East-side of the Galilean Sea, described hereafter in the Tribe of Manasse over Jordan. For the eighth Pella, which is also called Butis, and Berenice, seated in the South border of the Region over Jordan, called Peræa. For the ninth Gelasa, which Josephus takes to be Gerasa: and Gerasa is found in Cœlosyra by Josephus, Hegesippus, and Stephanus: but by Ptolomy (whom I rather follow) in Phœnicia. The tenth and last, Pliny nameth Canatha, and so doth Suetonius and Stephanus, which Volaterran calls Gamala, but Hegesippus rightly Camala, a City in the Region of Basan over Jordan, so called, because those two Hills on which it is seated, have the shape of a Camel. But the Collection of these ten Cities, whereof this Region took name, is better gathered out of Brochard, Breidenbach, and Saligniac, which make them to be these; Cæsarea Philippi, and Asor, before remembred, Cedes, Nephtalim, Sephet, Corazin, Capharnaum, Bethsaida, Jotapata, Tiberias, and Scythopolis, or Bethsan. For all other Authors disagree herein, and give no reason for their opinion. One place of the Evangelist S. Mathew makes it manifest, that this Region called Decapolitana, was all that Tract between Zidon, and the Sea of Galilee. For thus it is written: And he departed again from the coasts of Tyrus and Zidon, and came unto the Sea of Galilee, through the middest of the coasts of Decapolis: so that it was bounded by Damascus and Libanus on the North: by the Phœnician Sea, between Zidon and Ptolomais on the West: by the Hils of Gelbo and Bethsan on the South: and by the Mountains Tracones, otherwise Hermon, Sanir, and Galaad, on the East: which is from East to West the whole breadth of the Holy Land: and from the North to the South, neer the same distance, which may be each way forty English miles.

§. V.

Of Hamath.

BUt to look back again towards Libanus, there is seated neer the foot thereof the City of* Hammath or Chammath, of which (as they say) the Country adjoyning taketh name: the same which Josephus calleth Amathitis, and Amathensis: [a] Jacobus Zeigler, Ituræa. Ituræa Regio tenet borealia tribus Nephthali, per montem Libanum usque Trachones. The Country of Ituræa, saith he, containeth the North parts of the Tribe of Nepthali, along the Mount Libanus to Trachones. But herein following Strabo, who calls Trachonitis Ituræa, he mistakes the seat of this Region: and so doth Mercator. For indeed were Ituræa (which Hegesippus calls Peræa, and G. Tyrius, Baccar) the same with Traconitis, yet Traconitis it self is far more to the East than Hammath in Nephtalim: for Traconitis lieth between Cæsarea Philippi, and the Mountains Trachones: which the Hebrews call Gilead: and this Hammath or Chammath is seated under Cæsarea, towards the Sea West-ward. And it seemeth that this mistaking grew by confounding Emath or Hamath the great in Cœlosyria, beyond the Mountains Trachones, which [b] Hierom upon Amos calls Antiochia, with Hammath or Hamath the lesser in Phœnicia, and Nephtalim, which he calleth Epiphania: for this Hammath, or in our Translation Hamath, (and not that which is commonly called Emath, which 2 Chron. 8. 3. is set far from the North border of Canaan in Syria Soba) is remembred in Numb. 34. 8. & Num. 13. 22. & in Ezek. 47. 16. In the first of which places it bordereth the Land of promise, these being the words: From Mount Hor you shall point (that is, direct or draw a line) untill it come to Hamath: In the second place thus: So they went up, and searched out the Land from the Wilderness of Sin, unto Rehob to go to Hamath: Then in Ezekiel; The West part also shall be the great Sea from the border, till a man come over against Hamath: that is, the coast of the Sea shall be the West border from the Southermost part of the Holy Land, till you come directly over against Hamath Northward: from whence if a line be drawn to the Sea, it will touch the walls of Zidon: which is the [c] Northwest corner of the Holy Land. Now that this Hamath, or Hammath, which Moses also made the confine of the Holy Land, is that of Nephthalim, both the reference which it hath to the West Sea, and the City of [d] Rehob adjoyning, prove it: the [b] So Hierome in his Comment on Amos 6. 2. where there is mention of Hamath the great, as it seems for distinction from the other in Nephthalim, though Mat Beroaldus, rejecting Hierome, rather follows the opinion of Zeigler above mentioned, as indeed it cannot easily be justified that either one or other of these is either Antiochia or Epiphania, howbeit that the same City which in Joshua 19 35. is called Chammath, and placed in Nephthalim, was also called Chamath (whence the word Hamath and Emath, were framed) may be gathered, partly because the other Hamath, 2 Chron. 8. 3. for distinction is called Chamath Tseba, as this (as it may seem by Jos. 21. 32.) was Chamath-Dor, and Chamath Judæ, as we have noted, 2 Reg. 24. Secondly, because Numbers 34 8. and also Ezek 47 10. Chamath in the North side of the Holy Land is placed too neer the West corner, to be that Chamath Tsoba: for in the line which should make the North border which begins at the great Sea, they make Moses to name never a place, East-ward along all the breadth of the Holy Land until we come to Hermon (for so they expound Mount Hor. Num. 34. 7.) and beyond Hermon East-ward in this North side, they make him to name divers Towns, first Chamath, then Tseda, then Ziphron, and lastly, Chasar henan, a thing most unlikely: seeing Israel had little or nothing East-ward beyond Hermon. Therefore we must needs expound Hor to be one of the Hills neer Sidon, and so those Towns as they are named, to lie in order on the North side of Asher, Nephthalim, and Manasses: and in like manner those in Ezekiel, first, Cheelon, then Chamath, and so in order, Berotha, Sibraim, Tsedad, Chauran, Chasar-henan.

[c] Of which Josh. 19. 35. [d] Which Rehob, or Rechob, in Jos. 19. 28. is placed in Asher towards Zidon, in the confines of Nephthalim.

*The Septuagint write it Ammath, Hierome Emath, Josephus Amath: Jos 19. 35.

[a] Zeigler in Nephtal.

other Hamath, or Emath (being far removed, and beyond the fore-named Mountains, which incloſe all thoſe Lands which Iſrael ever had poſſeſſion of) is that Emath, which is alſo called Ituræa, witneſs [e] Stella and Laicſtan; and not that in Nephthalim, where [f] Jonathas Macchabæus attended the Army of Demetrius, who fled from him, and removed by night, [e] Tilemanus, Stella and Peter Laicſtan in their tables of the Holy land.

[f] Joſ ant. 13. 8.

For though Traconitis be comprehended within Ituræa (and therefore it is ſaid to be finitima Galileæ Gentium) yet it hath beginning over the Mountains Traconis, and ſo it ſtretcheth into the Plains of the Territory of Ituræa; whence Philip the brother of Herod was Tetrach, or Preſident, both of Ituræa and Trachonitis: both which are over Jordan towards the Eaſt. But Chemath in Nephtalim, is on the Weſt ſide of Jordan towards the Mediterran Sea.

* That it doth properly belong to Arabia, the name of Jethur Iſmaels ſon, whoſe iſſue ſetled in the Arabia's, may in part give witneſs. Alſo the place of the 1 Chr. 5. 19. confirms it, where Jethur is named among the Hagarens, againſt whom the Reubenites and Gadites made war, and whoſe country they poſſeſt in the time of Jeroboam. as their fore-fathers had done in the time of Saul after his conqueſt of the Amalekites, 1 Chron 5. 10. where the country is placed at the Eaſt of Gilead.
[a] Of the larger promiſe expreſt, Deut. 1. 7 where Euphrates is named for one of the bounds: See chap 7 ſect. 2.

The Country Ituræa was ſo called of Jethur, one of the ſons of Iſmael; it is placed in the bounds of Cœloſyria, and Arabia * the Deſart.

The people Ituræi were valiant and warlike men, and excellent Archers: Of whom Virgil:

Ituræos Taxi torquentur in arcus.

Of Eugh the Ituræans bows were made.

This City Chamath, or Hamath in Nephtalim, ſeems to have been as ancient as the other in Ituræa, both built by Amatheus the eleventh ſon of Canaan. Whether in the time of David, this, or the other had Tohu for King, it is not certain; for Hamath or Emath beyond the Mountains, and Hammath in Nephtalim, were both neighbours to Damaſcus: of whoſe ſubjugation Tohu rejoyced, becauſe Hadadeſer, whom the Damaſceni came to help, was his enemy. This Tohu fearing the ſtrength and proſperity of David, hearing of his approach towards his Territory, bought his peace with many rich preſents, and with many ancient veſſels of gold, ſilver, and braſs.

But it ſeemeth that David in ſuch great ſucceſs would not have had peace with Tohu, if he had been King of any place in Nephtalim, and therefore it is probable that he ruled in Tſoba: which City Solomon after his Fathers death made himſelf Maſter of, as a part of the lands (a in the larger and conditional promiſe) allotted by God to the children of Iſrael.

But this Hammath of Nephtalim, in the end, and after divers mutations and changes, both of name and fortune, being, as it hath been ſaid, poſſeſſed by Antiochus Epiphanes, it was called Epiphania.

While S. Hierome lived, it remained a City well peopled, known to the Syrians by the name Amathe, and to the Greeks by Epiphania.

§. VI.

Of Reblatha & Rama, and divers other Towns.

IN the border of Hamath or Emath, towards Jordan, ſtandeth the City Reblatha, or Ribla, watered from the fountain Daphnis: which falleth into the Lake of Merom. Hereunto was Zedekias brought priſoner, after his ſurprize in the fields of Jericho: & delivered to Nebuchodonoſor: who to be avenged of Zedekia's infidelity, beyond the proportion of piety, firſt cauſed the Princes his children to be ſlain in his preſence: and to the end that this miſerable ſpectacle might be the laſt that ever he ſhould behold in this world, and ſo the moſt remembred, he commanded both his eyes preſently to be thruſt out: & binding him in Iron chains, he was led a ſlave to Babylon, in which ſtate he ended his life. Of which ſeldom exampled calamity, though not in expreſs words, Jeremy the Prophet foretold him in Hieruſalem not long before: But Ezekiel thus directly ſpeaking in the perſon of God; I will bring him to Babel, to the Land of the Chaldæans, yet ſhall he not ſee it, though he ſhall die therein. Hieron. ſt. 11, &c. Ezek. 12. 12.

There are, beſides theſe before remembred, many other ſtrong Cities in Nephthalim, as that which is called (a) Cedes; there are two other of the ſame name, one in (b) Iſſachar, another in Juda, of which Joſ. 15. 23. and therefore to diſtinguiſh it, it is known by the addition of (c) Nephtalim, as Jud. 4. It is ſeated on a high hill, whence Joſ. 20. 7. Kedeſh in Galilea in monte Nephtali: Joſephus calls it Cedeſis, and in S. Hieromes time it was called Cidiſſus. Belforeſt greatly miſtakes this Cedes, and confounds it with Cades in the Deſart of Pharan.

After the King thereof, among other of the Canaanites, periſhed by the hand of Joſua, it was made a City of refuge, and given to the Levites. Herein was Barac born; who overthrew the Army of the ſecond Jabin of Hazor, at the Mount Tabor. It was ſometime poſſeſt by Teglatphalaſſer, when he waſted all Nephtalim: afterward by the Romans, and numbred for one of the ten Cities of the Decapolitan Region: When it had imbraced the Chriſtian faith, it was honoured with a Biſhops ſeat, but in time it fell with the reſt into the

the power of the Saracens and Turks, and by them it was demolished.

From Cedes some four Italian miles towards the South-west, standeth Sephet, otherwise Zephet, which was also one of the ten Decapolitan Cities: a place exceeding strong, and for many years the inexpugnable Fortress of the Christians, and afterward of the Saracens; for from hence they conquered all the neighbour Cities of those Regions, both In-land and Maritimate, neer it. Touching Rama of Nephtalim, seated Northward neer Sephet, this is to be noted, that there are () divers places of this name in Palæstine, all scituate on hils: and therefore called Rama (Rama Hebræis excelsum; Ramath with the Hebrews is high.) Also that from this Rama, Jos. 19.36. they read Arama, making the Article (which it hath in the Hebrew, as being a name of divers Towns) to be a part of the word: whence casting away the aspiration, they read Arema. From Sephet towards the West, they place * Bethsemes, of which Jos. 19.38. which defended it self against Nephtalim, Jud. 1.33. but paid them tribute. On the other side of Sephet, towards the East, was Bethanath, who also kept their Citie from the Nephtalims.

() See in Benjamin, and in Ephraim.

* Other Cities there were of this name, (which is as much as domus solis) as that in Juda, 2 Kin. 14. 15. where Joash King of the ten Tribes overcame Amasia of Juda, of which also understand the place, Jos. 21.16. & 1 Sam. 6. 14. & 2 Chro. 29. 18. A third, as it seems was in Dan. 1 Kin 4.9. which Jos 19.41. is written Hirshemes, which is as much as Civitas solis. Jud. 1.31.

Adjoyning to which standeth Carthan, (d) or Kiriathajim, a City of the Levites, not far from the Mountain out of which the springs of Capharnaum arise, called Mons Christi, a place by our Saviour often frequented: as also then when calling his Disciples together, he made choice of twelve, which he called and ordained to be his Apostles or Messengers: of which place, or the acts therein done, there is often mention in the (e) Evangelists.

Adjoyning to these are Magdalel, a place of strength, (f) and Mesaloth, of which we read, that it was forced by Bacchides in the time of the (g) Macchabees: also (according to Adrichomius) one of the two Berotha's of Nephtalim. For Adrichomius maketh two of this name in this Tribe, (h) one neer Chamath in the North border, of which Ezek. 47.6. another (upon a weak conjecture out of Joseph. ant. l. 5. c. 2.) he therefore placeth in this tract neer the waters of Merom; because the Kings that joyned with Jabin against Josua, which incamped at the waters of Merom, Jos. 11.5. are by Josephus said to have encamped at the City Berotha in Galilee, not far from Cedesa superiour, which is also in Galilee: all which may be true of that Berotha of which Ezek. seeing it is in that Galilee which is called the upper Galilee, or Galilee of the Gentiles. The same Adrichomius placeth the Region of Berim neer Abela (of which Abela, or Abel-Beth Mahacah, we have spoken already) this he doth upon a conjecture touching the place, 2 Sam 20. 14. where some read Abel & Bethmahacah, & omnia loca Berim: but the better reading is, & omnes Berim, that is, with all the Beræi: for Shebah being of Benjamin (in which Tribe also there is a City called Berotha, or Beeroth) drew the men of that City after him.

Adrichomius both here and elsewhere, deceived by the double name, makes two of one: although I deny not but that there was another Kiriathajim in Reuben, of which Jos. 13 9. e Mark 3. Matth. 10. Acts 1. Matth. 5.6,7. f Jos. 19.38 g 1 Mac 9 2. h Barathena Ptolomeo in fine Arabiæ desertæ: Junio eadem cum Berothai una civitatum Hadadezeris, 2 Sam. 8.8. Jos. 18.25.

To the North of Berotha of Nephtalim standeth Sebarim under Libanus, remembred by Ezek. 47. and Aroseth gentium, neer the waters of Merom, or Samochonitis, the City of Sisara, Lieutenant of the Army of the second Jabin: from whence not far off, towards the Sea of Galilee, is Edrai, or Edrehi, a strong City: besides many others, whereof I find no particular story of importance: as Ser in Jos. c. 19. v. 35. called Triddim-Tzer, and named for the first of their fenced Cities: whence they make two Cities, Assedim and Ser. Then Adama, which they call Edama: also Hion, which they call Ahion, of which in the books of Kings. Then the strong City of Cinnereth, after called Gennezareth, whence we read of the Land and Lake of Gennezareth, the same Lake which is also called the Sea of Tiberius. In the body of the Land they place Galgala to the South border: of which * 1 Mac. 9.2. also divers others, named Jos. 19. as Ucuca, or Chukkok, Horem and Azanothtabor (which they place towards the East parts) and out of the same place of Josua, Jerzon, Lakkum Jepnael, Heleb, and (k) Raccath; which two last they place neer Cæsarea Philippi: To these they add out of Josua, Nekeb, and Adami: for which two Junius readeth Fossa Adamæi, making it no Town, but a Ditch cast by some of Adameth, as it seems; or at least the custody of which March or Limit belonging to the Town. To these out of Num. 34. 10. they add Sephana, which 1 Sam. 30. 21. seems to be called Sipmoth. As for Tichon and Helon, whereof the former they fetch out of Ezek. 47. 16. and the latter out of Jos. 19.33. it may appear by Junius his Translation, that neither are to be taken for Cities: for the former he readeth Mediana, and for the later Quercetum. The City of (l) Nephthalim, which they make the native place of Tobie, and Naason neer unto it, they fetch out of the Vulgar Translation, Tob. 7.7. but in the Greek Text there is no sign, neither of the one nor of the other.

* This place of the Macchab. warrants no Galgala, or Gilgal, in Nephtali, but may well be understood of Gilgal in Benjamin, or in Manasse.

k This Reccath or Racath, Junius thinks that it is the same with Karthan (one of these being made of the other by transposition of letters) of which Karthan we have noted already, that it is also Kiria thajim. l In the place, 1 Reg. 4. it is, which also they bring to prove that there was a City called Nephtalim, as is evident by the following Verses: the Tribe of Nephtalim is meant, and not any City of that name.

§. V.

THE TRIBE OF ZABULON.

OF Zabulon, or Zebulon, another of the sons of Jacob by Lea, there were mustered at Mount Sinai, 57400. able men, besides women, children, and aged unable persons: all which dying in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their issues 65000. fit to bear arms: who inhabited that part of Canaan, from Asher to the River Chison South-ward, and from the Sea of Galilee to the Mediteran East and West.

The Cities within this Tribe which border Asher, are Sicaminum on the Sea shore; of which Joseph. Ant. 13. c. 19. Debbaset, of * which Jos. 19. 11. Jekonam, or Jockneham (whose King was (a) slain by Josua, and the City was given to the Levites:) and Gaba, after called the City of Horsemen, of a Regiment there garrison'd by Herod. Then the City which beareth the name of Zabulon, or the city of men, exceeding ancient and magnificent, (b) burnt to the ground by Cestius, Lietvenant of the Roman Army. Adricomius makes it the birth-City of (c) Elon Judge of Israel, because he is called Zabulonita: not marking that in the same place, he is said to be buried at Ajalon.

* Jos. 12. 22.
a Jos. 2. bel. 19.
b Jos. 2. bel. 22.
c Judg. 12. 11.

To the East of this City of Zabulon is Cateth, of which Jos. 19. 15. on the border of Asher: and beyond it the lesser (d) Cana of Galilee, where Christ converted water into wine: the native City of Nathaniel, and, as it is thought of Simon Zelotes. Beyond it begin the Mountains of Zabulon: and then the City of Cethron (in Zeigler, Ghiltron) which defended it self against Zabulon. Then Bersabe, which standeth in the partition of the upper and nether Galilee, fortified by Josephus against the Romans. Not far from hence standeth Shimron of Meron, whose King was slain by Josua.

d The greater Cana is in the Tribe of Asher. Jos 22. 2. Nathaniel is said to be of Cana in Galilee. Of Simon it may be doubted: for Angelus Caninius reads Mat. 10. 4. Simon Cannites, which word (Luke 6.) he thinketh to be expounded by Zelotes.

Then Damna, or Dimna, a City of the Levites: then Noa, or rather Neha, of which Jos. 19. 13. Then Dothan, or Dothain, where Joseph found his brethren feeding their flocks: the same wherein Elizæas, besieged by the Syrians, struck them all blind.

Beyond it, towards the East, they imagine (e) Amthar, or Amathar: then Remmon of the Levites. The last of the Cities on the North border of Zabulon is Bethsaida, one of the ten Cities of Decapolis, scituate on the Galilæan Sea, and watered by the springs of Capharnaum, the native City of the Apostles, Peter, Andrew, and Philip. Herein Christ did many miracles, but these people being no less incredulous than the Capharnaims, and others, received the same Curse of threatned miseries, as, Wo be unto thee Bethsaida, &c.

e The Hebrew Hammethoar, (for which the Vulgar hath Anithar, Jos. 19 13. Vatablus expounds, quæ gyrat: Junius joyns it with the word going before it, & reads Rimmonemo Methoarum, Mat 8. 11. Mark 1. 6. Luke 4. 10

Alongst the West border of Galilee, towards the South from Bethsaida, was the strong Castle of Magdalum, the habitation of Mary Magdalen, not long since standing.

And beyond it the strong and high seated City of Jotapata, fortified by Josephus in the Roman war: but in the end, after a long siege, surprised by Vespatian, who slaughtered many thousand of the Citizens, and held 1200. prisoners, whereof Josephus the Historian was one.

The last and greatest of the Cities on that * Sea, and the Lake of Genezzareth, within Zabulon, was that of Tiberias, from whence afterward the Galilæan Sea also changed name, and was called the Sea of the City Tiberias, so named in the honour of Tiberius Cæsar; it was one of the ten Cities, and the Metropolis of the Region Decapolitan, and the greatest and last of the lower Galilee. From hence our Saviour called Matthew from the Toll or Custom-house, to be an Apostle; and neer unto it raised the daughter of Jairus from death: it was built (as Josephus reports) by Herod the Tetrach, the brother of Philip, in the beginning of the raign of Tiberius Cæsar, in the most fruitful part of Galilee; but in a ground full of Sepulchres: Quam juxta nostras leges (saith he) ad septem dies impurus habeatur, qui in talibus locis habitet; Whereas by our law he should be seven daies held as unclean, who inhabited in such a place: by which words, and by the whole place of Josephus it appears, that this Tiberias is not (as some have thought) the same as the old Cinnereth, which was seated, not in Zabulon, but in Nephtalim.

* The names of the chief Cities seated about this sea, or lake, thorow which Jordan runneth, were Capernaum, Tyberias, Bethsaida, Gadara, Tarichea, and they add Cinnereth, which in fore-times gave name to the Lake and Conntry. Matth 9. Luke 5. Jose. Ant. 18. 3. Joseph, to. 15. Adrich. in Zab.

Neer unto this Tiberias, at Emaus, there were hot baths, where Vespatian the Emperour encamped against Tiberias. More into the Land toward the South-west, is Bethulia, seated on a very high hill, and of great strength, famous by the story of Holofernes and Judith, such as it is. Neer which standeth Bethleem of Zabulon: and adjoyning unto it Capharath, fortified by Josephus against the Romans: and Japha, an exceeding strong place, afterward forced by Titus: who in the entrance, and afterward in fury slew 15000 of the Citizens; and carried away above two thousand prisoners.

Jos in vit. sua. Joseph. 2. Bel. 25.

On the South side are the Cities of Cartha of the Levites, and Gabara, of which Josephus in his own life, then Jasie, according to Adrichomius (of which Jos. 19. 12.) for he thinks that it is not that Japha of which we spake but now out of Josephus. Jideala, of which Jos. 19. 15. Hierome calls it Jadela: under it

Jos 21. 35. otherwise K. Sloth Thabor, as Junius thinks upon Jos. 19 12. whence 1 Chro 6. 77. it is called Thabor.

West-

Westward, Legio, (afterward a Bishops seat) and the City Belma, in ancient times exceeding strong, remembred Judith 7.3. otherwise Chelma. Between Legio and Nazeret is the City Saffa, or Saffra, the birth-city of Zebedæus, Alphæus, James and John: Then Sephoris, or Sephora, according to Josephus: Sephorum according to Brochard: which afterward, saith Hegesippus, and Hierome, was called Diocæsarea, the city of Joachim and Anna, the Parents of the Virgin Mary; it was called by Herod the Tetrarch, and by him, as Josephus speaks, made the head and defence of Galilee: in another place he saith, Urbium Galilææarum maximæ Sephoris & Tiberias. This Sephoris greatly vexed Vespasian ere he wan it. Herod Antipas, when he made it the Regal seat of the nether Galilee, and surrounded it with a strong wall, called it Autocratorida, which is as much to say as Imperial, saith Josephus; and it is now but a Castle called Zaphet.

Johan. de Montevilla, c.4. & 20.

Joseph. ant. 18.3 & in vita sua.

To the South-west of this Sephoris, or Diocæsarea, was that blessed place of Nazareth, the city of Mary the Mother of Christ; in which he himself was conceived: it standeth between Mount Tabor, and the Mediterran Sea. In this city he abode chiefly four and twenty years, and was therefore called a Nazarite, as the Christians afterward were for many years. It was erected into an Archbishoprick in the following age. Near unto it are the cities Buria (afterward well defended against the Turks) and Nahalal, of which Ios. 19.15. and Iudg. 1.30. where it is called Nahalol: and Ios. 21.35. where it is a city of the Levites; near the Sea, adjoyning to the River of Chison is Sarid, noted in Iosua for the uttermost of Zabulon.

In this Territory of Zabulon there are divers small Mountains: but Tabor is the most renowned, by the apparition of Moses and Elias: and by the Transfiguration of Christ in the presence of Peter, Iames, and Iohn: unto whom Moses and Elias appeared; in memory whereof, on the top of the Mountain, the Empress Helen built a sumptuous Chappel.

In the chief River of Zabulon is Chison, which rising out of Tabor, runneth with one stream Eastward to the Sea of Galilee, and with another stream Westward into the great Sea. This River of Chison where it riseth, and so far as it runneth Southward, is called Chedumim, or Cadumim: and for mine own opinion, I take it to be the same which Ptolomy calleth Chorseus: though others distinguish them, and set Chorseus by Cæsaria Palestinæ. There is a second Torrent or Brook that riseth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdalum: and the third is a branch of a river rising out of the Fountains of Caphernaum, which falleth also into the same Sea, and near Magdalum; which Torrent they call Dotham, from the name of the city, from which it passeth Eastward to Bethsaida, and so joyning with Jordanis parvus, which runneth from the Valley of Jephthael, which Josua reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon: it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

See Laistans Map in Ortelius Jos. 19.14.

§. VI.

THE TRIBE OF ISSACHAR.

THE next adjoyning Territory to Zabulon, to the South and Southwest, was Issachar, who inhabited a part of the nether Galilee, within Jordan: of whom there were increased in Egypt, as appeared by their musters at mount Sinai, 54400. able and warlike men, who leaving their bodies with the rest in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land 64300.

The first city of this Tribe near the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, distant from Tiberias eight English miles, or somewhat more; a city wherein the Jews (by the practice of a certain mutinous upstart, John the son of Levi) took arms against Josephus the Historian, then Governour of both Galilees. This city was first taken by Cassius, and 3000. Jews carried thence captive; and afterward with great difficulty by Vespasian, who entred it by the Sea-side, having first beaten the Jews in a Sea-fight upon the Lake or Sea of Galilee: he put to the sword all sorts of people, and of all ages; saving that his fury being quenched with the Rivers of blood running through every street, he reserved the remainder for slaves and bond-men.

Tarichea is Sunon.

Next to Tarichea is placed Cession, or Cishion of the Levites, and then Issachar, remembred in the first of Kings, *c.*4.*v.*17. then Abes, or Ebets, Ios. 19.20. and Remeth, of which Ios. 19.21. otherwise Ramoth, 1 Chron. 6.37. or Iarmuth, Ios. 21.19. this also was a city of the Levites, from whose Territory the Mountains of Gilboe take beginning: and range themselves to the Mediterran sea, and towards the West as far as the City of Iezrael, between which and Ramoth, are the cities of Bethpheses, or Bethpasses, according to Zeigler; and Enadda, or Hen-chadda, near which Saul slew himself: under those, Aphec, or Apheca, which Adrichomius placeth in Issachar: between which and Suna, he saith, that the Philistims incamped against Israel, and afterward against Saul: a Land thirsty of blood, for Jos 21.28. Kishion, which 1 Chr. 6 72. is called Kedesh. Josua 19. 1 Sam. 4 1. 1 Sam. 3.19. 1 Kings 20. 26. In the later two places Junius makes Aphec in Asher, according to Jos. 19. 30. in the first he placeth it in Juda, out of Jos. 15. 53.

for herein alſo, ſaith he, the Syrians with two and thirty Reguli aſſiſting Benhadad, incountered Achab, and were overthrown and ſlaughtered: to whom the King of Iſrael made a moſt memorable anſwer, when Benhadad vaunted before the victory: which 1 King. 20. was, Tell Benhadad, Let not him that girdeth his harneſs boaſt himſelf as he that putteth it off: meaning, that glory followed after victory, but ought not to precede it. In the year following, in the fields, as they ſay, adjoyning to this city, was the ſame vain-glorious Syrian utterly broken and diſcomfited by Achab: and 100000. footmen of the Aramites, or Syrians, ſlain: before which overthrow the ſervants and counſellors of Benhadad (in deriſion of the God of Iſrael) told him, That the Gods of Iſrael were Gods of the Mountains: and therefore if they fought with them in the 1 Kings 20. 23. Plains, they ſhould overcome them.

Under Aphec towards the Sea, they ſet the city of Eſdrelon, in the Plains of Galilee;
Judith 1. 8 & 7. 3. called alſo the great field of Eſdrelon, and Maggeddo: in the border whereof are the ruines of Aphec to be ſeen, ſaith Brochard, and 1 Chron 6. 73. Breidenbach. After theſe are the cities of Joſ. 21. 9. Caſaloth, of which 1 Mac. 9. 2. Anem, or Hen-Gannim, of the Levites, and Sceſima, or Shabatſima, the Weſt border of Iſſachar, of which Ioſ. 19. 22. From hence ranging the Sea coaſt, there is found the Caſtle of Pilgrims: a ſtrong Caſtle, invironed with the Sea, ſometime the ſtorehouſe and Magazine of the Chriſtians, and built by the Earl of Saint Giles, or Tolouſe.

From the Caſtle of Pilgrims, the Sea maketh a great Bay towards the North, and the farthermoſt ſhore beginneth Mount Carmel, not far from the River Chiſon, where Elijah aſſembled all the Prophets and Prieſts of Baal, and prayed King Achab, and the people aſſembled, to make trial whether the God of Iſrael, or the Idol of Baal were to be worſhipped, by laying a ſacrifice without fire on the Altar: which done, the Prieſts of Baal prayed, and cut their own fleſh after their manner, but the fire kindled not, while Elijah in deriſion told them, that their God was either in purſuit of his enemies, not at leiſure, or perchance aſleep, &c. but at the prayer of Elijah the fire kindled, notwithſtanding that he had cauſed the people to caſt many veſſels of water thereon: by which miracle the people incenſed, ſlew all thoſe Idolaters on the banks of Chiſon adjoyning.

At the foot of this Mountain to the North, ſtandeth Caiphas, built, as they ſay, by Caiphas the high Prieſt. It is alſo known by the name of Porſina, and Porphyria, ſometime a Suffragane Biſhops ſeat. Returning again from the Sea-coaſt towards Tiberias, by the banks of Chiſon, there are found the city of Hapharaim, or Aphraim, and the Caſtles of Mezra and Saba: of which Brochard and Breidenbach: and then Naim on the River Chiſon: a beautiful city while it ſtood, in the Gates whereof Chriſt raiſed from death the Luke 7. widows onely ſon.

Then Seon or Shion, named Ioſ. 19. between the two Hills of Hermon, in Iſachar: beyond it ſtandeth Endor, famous by reaſon of the Inchantreſs that undertook to raiſe up the body of Samuel at the inſtigation of Saul.

Beyond it ſtands Anaharath and Rabbith, named Ioſ. 19. v. 19, 20. Then Dabarath, as it is named, Ioſ. 21. 28. or Dobratha, as it is named, 1 Chron. 6. 71. This city (which ſtretcheth it ſelf over Chiſon) was a city of refuge belonging to the Levites.

Next to Dabarath is Arbela ſituate, near the Caves of thoſe two Theeves which ſo greatly moleſted Galilee in Herods time. It joyneth on one ſide to the Mountain of Iſachar, or Hermon, and on the other to the * Called Campus Magnus. 1 Mac 12. 49. and Harbatha for Barabath. 1 Mac. 5. 23. & 9. 2. Judg. 6. 1 Sam. 31. 1 King. 20.
Valley of Jeſrael: which Valley continueth it ſelf from Bethſan, or Scythopolis, the Eaſt border of Iſachar, even to the Mediterran Sea: two parts whereof are incloſed by the Mountains of Gilboe on the South, and by Hermon and the River Chiſon on the North. In theſe *Plains Gideon overthrew the Midianites, and herein, they think, Saul fought againſt the Philiſtims, Achab againſt the Syrians, and the Tartars againſt the Saracens.

§. VII.

THE HALF OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

¶. I.

Of the bounds of this half Tribe: and of Scythopolis, Salem, Therſa, and others.

THE next Tribe which joyneth it ſelf to Iſachar towards the South, is the half of Manaſſe, on the Weſt ſide of Jordan. Manaſſes was the firſt begotten of Joſeph, the eleventh ſon of Jacob. His mother was an Egyptian, the daughter of Putiphar, Prieſt and Prince of Heliopolis: which Manaſſes, with his brother Ephraim, the grand-children of Jacob, were by adoption numbred amongſt the ſons of Jacob, and made up the number of the twelve Patriarchs.

Of Manaſſe there were increaſed in Egypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 32200. able men: all which being conſumed in the Deſarts, there entred of their iſſues, 52700. bearing arms. The Territory which fell on this one half of Manasse, was bounded by Jordan on the East, and Dora upon the Mediterran Sea on the West, Jesrael on the North, and Machmata is the South border.

The first and principal City which stood in this Territory was Bethsan, sometime Nysa, saith Pliny, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurse there buried, of the same name, which Solinus confirms. Afterward when the Scythians invaded Asia the less, and pierc't into the South, to the uttermost of Cœlosyria, they built this City a-new, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the City of Scythians, given by the Greeks.

Plin. l. 5. c. 18.

These barbarous Northern people constrained the Jews to fight against their own Nation and kinred, by whose hands when they had obtained victory, they themselves set on the Jews which served them, and slew them all. Stephanus makes it the utmost towards the South of Cœlosyria: and Strabo joyns it to Galilee. It is seated between Jordan and the Hills of Gilboe, in aulone ad montes acrabitenæ, saith Zeigler. But I find it in the East part of the Valley of Jesrael near Jordan: after that Jordan strengtheneth it self again into a River, leaving the Sea, or Lake Genezareth. Notwithstanding Montanus describes it far to the West, and towards the Mediterran Sea, near Endor, contrary to Stella, Laicstan, Adrichome, and all other the best Authors. This City was the greatest of all those of Decapolis: but the children of Manasse could not expel the Inhabitants thereof: and therefore called it Sane, an enemy, or Beth-san, the house of an enemy.

Judg. 1. Jos. 17. de Bell. Jud.

Over the walls of this Beth-san the Philistims hung the body of Saul, and his sons slain at Gilboe. It had, while the Christian religion flourished in those parts, an Archbishop, who had nine other Bishops of his Dioceses, numbred by Tyrius, in his 14. Book and 12. Chapter: but the same was afterward translated to Nazareth. The later travellers in those parts affirm, that there is daily taken out among the rubble and the ruines of that City, goodly pillers, and other pieces of excellent Marble, which witness the stately buildings, and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poor and desolate Village.

Hierom. in Epist. ad Evagr. & in Loc. Heb.

From Beth-san keeping the way by Jordan, they find an ancient City called Salem, which City the ancient Rabbines, saith Hierome, do not find to be the same with Hierusalem: there being in the time of Hierome and since, a town of that name, near Scythopolis before remembred, which if the place of Scripture, Gen. 13. 18. do not confirm, where the Vulgar readeth transivitque in Salem urbem Sichemorum, (for which others read venit incolumis ad Civitatem Sechemum, making the word Shalem not to be a proper name, but an adjective) yet the place John 3. 13. where it is said, that John was baptizing in Ænon near Salem, may somewhat strengthen this opinion, and yet it is not unlikely that this Salem of which S. John speaketh, is but contracted of Shahalim, of which in the Tribe of Benjamin, 1 Sam. 9. 4. This word Junius maketh to be the plural of Shuhal: of which we read, 1 Sam 13. 17. for as for that which is added out of Canticles 6. 12. of Shulammitis, as if it had been as much as a Woman of this Salem near Ænon, it hath no probability.

Not far from thence where they place Salem, they find Bezech the City of Adonibezec, Josephus calls it Bala: here it was that Saul assembled the strength of Israel and Juda, to the number of 330000. when he meant to relieve Jabesh Gilead, against Naash the Ammonite: who would give them no other conditions of peace, than to suffer their right eyes to be thrust out. Near Bezech is the City of Bethbera, or rather Beth-bara, of which Judg. 7. 24. in the story of Gideon: and then Ephra, or Hophra, wherein Gideon inhabited: in the border whereof stood an Altar consecrated to Baal, which he pulled down and defaced; and near it that stone, on which Abimelech the Bastard slew his 70. brothers; a Heathenish cruelty, practised by the Turk to this day: and not far hence, between the Village of Asophon and Jordan, Ptolomeus Lathurus overthrew Alexander King of the Jews, and slaughtered, as Josephus numbereth them, 3000. but according to Timagenes 50000. after which victory, as Ptolomy past by the Villages of the Jews, he slew all their women, and caused the young children to be sod in great Caldrons, that the rest of the Iews might thereby think that the Egyptians were grown to be men-eaters, and strike them with the greater terror.

This City Bezek, by the place Judg 1. 5. seemeth to have been in Juda. Joseph. ant. 6. c. 5. 1 Sam. c. 11

Jos. l. 13. c. 21. ant.

Towards the West and on the border of Isachar, they place the Cities of * Aner of the Levites, and Abel-Meholа, which Junius, Judg. 7. 22. placeth in Ephraim: it was the habitation of Helisæus the Prophet, numbred among those places, 1 Reg. 4. 12. which were given in charge to Baana by Solomon, to whose charge also Tahanac belonged, a place of great strength, which at the first resisted Josua, though their King was afterward hanged, and their City given to the Levites.

* This Aner Junius upon 1 Chr. 6. 70 makes to be the same with Tahanac, of which Jos. 21. 25. Hierome names it from Aner the Conderate of Abraham. Gen. 14. 13. Jos. 12. 17

In the body of this Territory of Manasse, but somewhat nearer Jordan than to the Mediterran

diterran Sea, were three great Cities, to wit, Thersa, whose King was one of those that Josua flew: which the Kings of Israel used for their Regal seat, till such time as Samaria was built. From hence the wife of Jeroboam went to Achia to enquire of her sons health: who knowing her, though she were disguised, told her of her sons death. 1 Kings 14

The second was Thebes near Samaria, of which name there are both in Egypt and Greece, of great fame: in the assault of the Tower of this Town, whereinto the Citizens retired, the Bastard Abimelec was wounded by a weighty stone, thrown by a woman over the wall, who despairing of his recovery, commanded his Page to slay him outright, because it should not be said that he perished by the stroke of a woman. But others set this City in Ephraim near Sichem, or Neapolis. Judg. 9 53, 54.

The third is Acrabata, of which the Territory adjoyning is called Acrabatena, (one of the ten Toparchies, or governments in Judæa) for which Hierome, 1 Mac. 5. reads Arabathena: but in the Greek it is Acrabatine: Isidore calls it Agrabat. This City had one of the largest Territories of all Palæstine belonging to the Governour thereof. Josephus remembreth it often, as in his second book of the Jews wars, c. 11. 25, 28. and elsewhere. Hier. Mac. 1 c. 5.

The difference between a Tetrarchy and a Toparchy, was, that the first was taken for a Province, and the other for a City with some lesser Territory adjoyning; and a Tetrarch is the same with Prases in Latine, and President in English, being commonly the fourth part of a Kingdom; and thereof so called. Plin. l. 5. Pliny nameth seventeen Tetrarchies in Syria: the Holy Land had four, and so hath the Kingdom of Ireland to this day, Lemster, Ulster, Connath, and Munster. Eusseb in Chron.

To the South-west of Acrabata they place the Cities of Balaam, or Bilham, and Gethremmon of the Levites: but Junius out of Jos. 21. 25. and 1 Chron. 6. 70. gathers that these two are but one; and that Jibleham, Jos. 16. 11. is another name of the same City.

Then is Jezael a Regal City, set at the foot of the Mountains of Gilboe, towards the South-west: herein Jezabel, by a false accusation, caused Naboth to be stoned, to the end she might possess his Vineyard adjoyning to the City, which Naboth refused to sell, because it was his inheritance from his father.

Joram also was cast unburied into the same field: for which his mother Jezabel murthered Naboth. 2 Kings 2.

Toward the Sea from Jezael is the City which they call Gaber: in whose ascent as Ahaziah King of Juda fled from Jehu, when he had slain Joram, he was wounded with the shot of an arrow, of which wound he died at Maggeddo adjoyning. The Scripture calls this City of Gaber, Gur. 2 Kings 9. 27.

Then Adadremmon, near unto which the good King Josias was slain by Necho King of Egypt, in a war unadvisedly undertaken. For Necho marched towards Assyria against the King thereof, by the commandment of God; whom Josias thought to resist in his passage. It was afterward called Maximianoplis.

A neighbour City to Adadremmon was Maggeddo, often remembred in the Scriptures; whose King was slain among the rest by Josua: yet they defended their City for a long time against Manasse. The River which passeth by the Town, may perhaps be the same which Ptolomy calleth Chorseus: and not that of which we have spoken in Zabulon. For because this name is not found in the Scriptures, many of those that have described the Holy Land, delineate no such River. Moore only sets it down in his Geography of the twelve Tribes: but the River which passeth by Maggeddo, he understandeth to be but a branch, falling thereinto. Laicstan and Schrot make a great confluence of waters in this place, agreeable to this Scripture in the fifth of Judges: Then fought the Kings of Canaan in Tanaac by the waters of Maggeddo. But these Authors, and with them Stella, give it no other name than the Torrent so called. Judg. 1. 5. Jos. 12. 17.

But seeing that ancient Cosmographers stretch out the bounds of Phœnicia even to Sebaste, or Samaria; and Strabo far beyond it on the Sea-coast: And Josephus calls Cæsaria Palæstinæ, a City of Phœnicia: yea, Laurentius Corvinus extendeth Phœnicia as far as Geza: seeing also Ptolomy sets down Chorseus for the partition of Phœnicia and Judæa, this river running East and West parallel with Samaria: it is very probable that this Torrent called Maggeddo, after the name of the City which it watereth, is the same which Ptolomy in his fourth Table of Asia, calleth Chorseus. The later travellers of the Holy Land call Maggeddo Subimbre at this day. Strab. l. 16. Joseph. l. 15 c. 13. Niger.

||. II.

Of Cesaria Palæstinæ, and some other Towns.

FRom Maggeddo toward the West, and near the Mediterran Sea, was that glorious City of Cæsaria Palæstinæ: first, the Tower of Straton: the same which Pliny calls Apollonia: though Ptolomy sets Apollonia elsewhere, and toward Egypt, between this City and Joppe, to which Vespasian gave the name of Flavia

Flavia Colonia. It was by Herod re-built, who therein laboured to exceed all the works in that part of the world. For besides the edifices, which he reared within the Walls, of cut and polish't marbles, the Theater and Amphitheater, from whence he might look over the Seas far away, with the high and stately Towers and Gates: he forced a Harborow of great capacity, being in former times but an open Bay: and the wind blowing from the Sea, the Merchants haunting that Port, had no other hope, but in the strength of their Cables and Anchors. This work he performed with such charge and labour, as the like of that hath not been found in any Kingdom, nor in any age: which, because the Materials were fetcht from far, and the weight of the stones was such, as it exceedeth belief, I have added Josephus own words of this work, which are these: Hanc locorum Joseph. l. 15. c. 13. in commoditatem correcturus, cerculum portus circumduxit, quantum putaret magnæ classi recipiendæ sufficere: & in viginti ulnarum profundum, prægrandia saxa demisit: quorum pleraque pedum quinquaginta longitudinis, latitudinis verò octodecim, altitudine novempedali: fuerunt quædam etiam majora, minora alia; To mend this inconvenience of place (saith Josephus) he compast in a Bay wherein a great Fleet might well ride: and let down great stones twenty fadome deep: whereof some were fifty foot long, eighteen foot broad, and nine foot thick: and some bigger, some lesser. To this he added an arm or cawsie of two hundred foot long, to break the waves: the rest he strengthened with a stone wall, with divers stately Towers thereon builded: of which the most magnificent he called Drusus, after the name of Drusus the son in law of Cæsar: in whose honour he intituled the City it self, Cæsaria of Palæstine: all which he performed in twelve years time. It was the first of the Eastern Cities that received a Bishop: afterward erected into an Archbishoprick, Lib. 4. c. 12 bel. sacr. commanding twenty others under it, saith Tyrius.

S. Hierome nameth Theophilus, Eusebius, Acacius, Euzorus, and Galasius, to have been Bishops thereof. In this City was Cornelius the Centurion baptised by Saint Peter: and herein dwelt Philip the Apostle. S. Paul was herein two years prisoner, under the President Felix, unto the time and government of Porcius Festus: by whom making his appeal, he was sent to Cæsar. Here, when Herod Agrippa was passing on to celebrate the Quinquennalia, taking delight to be called a god by his flatterers, he was stricken with an Angel unto death, saith Josephus.

To the North of Cesaria standeth Dora, or Naphoth Dor, as some read, Jos. 1. 2. so called (saith Adrichomius) because it joyneth to the Sea, whose King was slain by Josua. But Junius, for in Naphoth Dor, reads in tractibus Dor: and so the Vulgar, in regionibus Dor, although 1 Reg. 4. 11. for the like speech in the Hebrew it readeth omnis Nephath Dor: The Septuagint in the place of Josua call it Nephith-Dor, and in the other of the Kings, Nepha-Dor: but the true name by other places (as Jos. 12. 23. Judg. 1. 27.) may seem to be Dor. It was a strong and powerful City, and the fourth in account of those twelve Principalities, or Sitarchies, which Solomon erected. Junius upon Macc. 15. 11. placeth this between the Hill Carmel, and the mouth of the river Cherseus: for so some name the river Chorseus, of which we have spoken already.

Into this City, for the strength thereof, Tryphon fled from Antiochus the son of Demetrius, where he was by the same Antiochus besieged with 12000. foot-men, and 8000. horse: the same perfidious villain that received 200. talents for the ransom of Jonathan Macchabæus (whom he had taken by treachery) and then slew him: and after him slew his own Master, usurping for a while the Kingdom of Syria. It had also a Bishops seat of the Dioces of Cesaria. Mac. 1. 13. 15.

From Cesaria towards the South, they place the Cities of Caphernaum, Gabe, and Galgal: for besides that Capharnaum famous in the Evangelists, they find in these parts near the West Sea, another of the same name. Of Gabe, Hierome in locis Hebraicis. The famous Galgal, or Gilgal, was in Benjamin: but this Gilgal, they say, it was whose King was slain by Josua. Gul. Tyr. de bell. sacr. l. 10. c 6.

Then Antipatris, so called of Herod, in honour of his Father: but in the time of the Macchabees, it was called Capharsalama: in the fields whereof Judas Macchabæus overthrew a part of the Army of Nicanor, Lievtenant to Demetrius: an Army drawn into Judæa by a traiterous Jew, called Alcimus: who contended for the Priest-hood, first under Bacchides, and then under Nicanor. To this was Saint Paul carried prisoner from Hierusalem, conducted by 470. souldiers, to defend him from the fury of the Jews. In after-times the Army of Godfrey of Bullion attempted it in vain: yet was it taken by Baldwine. It was honoured in those dayes with a Bishops seat, but it is now a poor Village, called Assur, saith Brochard. Near unto this City the Prophet Jonas was three dayes preserved in the body of a Whale. Mac. 17. 31

Into the Land, from Antipatris and Cæsaria, ria, standeth Narbata, whereof the Territory taketh name: which Cestius the Roman wasted with fire and sword, because the Jews which dwelt at Cæsaria fled thence, and carried with them the Books of Moses. Neer unto it is the Mountain of Abdia, the Steward of King Achab: wherein he hid an hundred Prophets, and fed them: after which he himself is said to have obtained from God the Spirit of Prophecy also.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Kingdom of Phœnicia.

§. I.

The bounds and chief Cities, and Founders, and Name of this Kingdom: and of the invention of Letters ascribed to them.

BEcause these five Tribes, of Asser, Nephtalim, Zabulon, Issachar, and the half of Manasse, possest the better part of that ancient Kingdom of Phœnicia, to wit, of so much as lay to the South part of Anti-libanus; I have therefore gathered a brief of those Kings which have governed therein: at least so many of them as time (which devoureth all things) hath left to posterity: and that the rest perished, it is not strange: seeing so many Volumes of excellent learning in so long a race and revolution, and in so many changes of Estates, and Conquest of Heathen Princes have been torn, cast away, or otherwise consumed.

The limits of this Kingdom, as touching the South parts, are very uncertain: but all Cosmographers do in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the North, where that part of Syria, which is called Casiotis, ends: most of them bounding it by Orthosia, to the North of Tripolis. Ptolomy makes it a little larger, as reaching from the River Eleutherus that falls into the Sea at the Island of Aradus, somewhat to the North of Orthosia, and stretching from thence alongst the coast of the Mediterran Sea, as far as the River of Chorseus; which seems to be that which the Jews call the Torrent, or River of Maggeddo. Pliny extends it further, and comprehends Joppe within it: Corvinus and Budæus, Joppe and Gaza. Phœnicia apud priscos appellata (saith Budæus) quæ nunc Palæstina Syriæ dicitur; It was called Phœnicia of old (saith he) which now is called Palæstina of Syria.

Ptol. 4 tab. Asiæ.

Strab. l. 16. Bude. de Ass. l. 4.

Strabo comprehends in this Country of Phœnicia all the Sea-side of Judæa, and Palestina, even unto Pelusium, the first Port of Egypt. On the contrary, Diodorus Siculus foldeth it up in Cœlosyria, which he boundeth not. But for my self, I take a middle course, and like best of Ptolomies description, who was seldom deceived in his own art. It had in it these famous Maritimate Cities (besides all those of the Islands) to wit, Aradus, Orthosia, Tripolis, Botrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomais (or Acon) Dora, and Cæsaria Palestinæ: and by reason of the many Ports and goodly Sea-towns, it anciently commanded the Trades of the Eastern world: and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterran Sea.

The ancient Regal Seat of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first son of Canaan: and the people then subject to that people were called Zidonians; the same state continuing even unto Josua's time. For till then, it is probable that there was but one King of all that Region; afterward called Phœnicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his second Book of Vandals wars. But in process of time the City of Tyre adjoyning, became the more magnificent: yet, according to the Prophet, it was but a daughter of Zidon, and by them first built, and peopled. Esay 23.

But after the death of Moses, and while Josua yet governed Israel, Agenor an Egyptian of Thebes, or a Phœnician bred in Egypt, came thence with his sons Cadmus, Phœnix, Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cedrenus and Curtius) and built and possest the Cities of Tyre and Zidon: to wit, the new Tyrus, and brought into Phœnicia (so called after the name of his second son) the use of Letters: which also Cadmus in his pursuit after his sister Europa, taught the Grecians. For Taurus King of Crete, when when he surprised Tyre, had stolne her thence: of which the Poets devised the fable of Jupiters transformation into a Bull, by whom that stealth was also supposed to be made. Pomponius Sabinus makes Belus the first King of Phœnicia; and finds Cadmus his Successor, whom he calleth his grand-child: and it seemeth that Belus was the father of Agenor, and not Neptune: because the successours of Dido held that name alwaies in reverence, making it a part of their own, as Asdrubal, Hannibal: whose memory Virgil also toucheth in these Verses.

Hic Regina gravem gemmis auroque poposcit,
Implevitq; mero pateram: quam Belus & omnes
A Belo soliti.

The Queen anon commands the weighty bowl
(Weighty with precious stones and massie gold)
To flow with wine. This Belus us'd of old,
And all of Belus Line.

Whether this Belus were father or grandfather to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it seems to me by comparing of times, that Belus was Ancestor to these Phœnicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Jupiter Belus, the son of Neptune by Lybia the daughter of Epaphus, or were he the son of Thelegonus, according to Eusebius; yet it is agreed that Cecrops then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Cecrops time, saith Saint Augustine, Moses left Egypt: Agenors successour living at once with Josua. Now that Agenor returned about the same time into the Territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither do I deny, but that he gave that Region the name of Phœnicia, in honour of his son. But instead of the building of Tyre and Zidon, it is probable that he repaired and fortified both: and therefore was called a Founder, as Semiramis and Nebuchodonosor were of Babylon.

For be it true, that Agenor was of the same Nation, and brought up in Egypt: where he learnt the use of Letters (Egypt flourished in all kind of learning in Moses time) or were he by Nation an Egyptian, yet it is very likely that either he came to save his own Territory; or otherwise to defend the coast of Canaan from the Israelites: who were by Moses led out of Egypt, to the great loss and dishonour of that Nation: and by Joshua conducted over Jordan, to conquer and possess the Canaanites Land. For though the Egyptians, by reason of the loss which they received by the hand of God in the Red Sea, and by the ten plagues cast on them before that, and by the slaughter of so many of the male children at the same time, could not hinder the Hebrews from invading Canaan by land: which also they knew had so many powerful Nations to defend it: the Desarts inter-jacent, and the strong Edomites, Moabites, Amorites, and Ammonites their borderers: yet Egypt having such Vessels or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in use, did not in all probability neglect to garrison the Sea-coast, or assist Agenor with such forces as they had to spare; and which they might perform with the greater facility, in that the Philistims, which held the shores of Canaan next adjoyning unto them, were their Friends and Confederates.

Now, as it appeareth by the course of the story, those Cities of Phœnicia, which Agenor was said to have built (that is, to have fortified and defended against Josua, and against the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Josua called the strong City Accho, afterward Ptolomais, Achzib, and Dor) were all that Phœnicia had in those daies. Chap. 19. 29.

That the Kings of Phœnicia were mighty, especially by Sea, it appears, first by their defence against Israel: secondly, by this, that David and Solomon could not master them, but were glad of their alliance: thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Reguli, defended it self 13. years against a King of Kings, Nebuchadonosor: and that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the providence of God, seemed unresistable) spent more time in the recovery of Tyre, than in the conquest of all the Cities in Asia.

Other opinions there are, as that of Berosus out of Josephus, who conceives that Tyre was founded by Tyrus the son of Japhet. And for the Region it self, though Calisthenes derive it, ab arbore dactylorum; and the Greeks from the word Phonos, of slaughter, because the Phœnicians slew all that came on their coasts; yet for my self, I take it that Phœnix the son of Agenor gave it that name. But that either Agenor in Phœnicia, or Cadmus his son in Greece, were the Inventors of Letters, it is ridiculous: and therefore the dispute unnecessary.

The Ethiopians affirm, that Atlas, Orion, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the first light of all those Arts, Sciences, and civil Policies, which they afterwards profest, and taught others: and that Pythagoras himself was instructed by the Lybians: to wit, from the South and superiour Egyptians: from whom those which inhabited neerer the out-let of Nilus, as they say, borrowed their Divinity and Philosophy: and from them the Greeks, then barbarous, received Civility. Again, the Phœnicians challenge this invention of Letters and of Learning: acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all; neither do they allow that Agenor and his sons were Africans; whence Lucan,

3. Mansuram rudibus vocem signare figuris.

Phœnicians first (if fame may credit have)
In rude Characters dar'd our words to grave.

And that Cadmus was the son of Agenor, and was a Phœnician, and not an Egyptian, it appeareth by that answer made by Zeno; when he in a kind of reproach was called a Stranger, and not a Phœnician.

Athen 1. Dipnos. Si patria est Phœnix, quid tum? nam Cadmus & ipse
Phœnix; cui debet Græcia docta libros.

If a Phœnician born I am, what then?
Cadmus was so: to whom Greece owes
The Books of learned men.

Joseph. contra Appionem. Out of doubt the Phœnicians were very ancient: and from the Records and Chronicles of Tyre, Josephus the Historian confirms a great part of his Antiquities. The Thracians again subscribe to none of these reports: but affirm constantly, that the great Zamolxis flourished among them: when Atlas lived in Mauritania: Nilus and Vulcan in Egypt: and Ochus in Phœnicia. Yea, some of the French do not blush to maintain, that the ancient Gaules taught the Greeks the use of Letters, and other Sciences. And do not we know that our Bardes and Druides are as ancient as those Gaules, and that they sent their sons hither to be by them instructed in all kind of learning?

Lastly, whereas others bestow this invention on Moses, the same hath no probability at all; for he lived at such time as Learning and Arts flourished most, both in Egypt and Assyria, and he himself was brought up in all the learning of the Egyptians, from his infancy.

But true it is, that Letters were invented by those excellent Spirits of the first age, and before the general Flood: either by Seth or Enos, or by whom else God knows; from whom all wisdom and understanding hath proceeded. And as the same infinite God is present with all his Creatures, so hath he given the same invention to divers Nations: whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other; as well in this as in many other knowledges: for even in Mexico, when it was first discovered, there was found written Books after the manner of those Hieroglyphicks, anciently used by the Egyptians, and other Nations: and so had those Americans a kind of Heraldry; and their Princes differing in Arms and Scutchions, like unto those used by the Kings and Nobility of other Nations, Jura naturalia communia, & generalia, &c. Natural laws are common, and general. Jurisc.

§. II.

Of the Kings of Tyre.

BUt whatsoever remaineth of the Story and Kings of Phœnicia (the books of Zeno, Sachoniatho, Mnaseas, and others of that Nation, being no where found) the same is to be gathered out of the Scriptures, Josephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor lived at once with Josua, to whom succeeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and so far towards the North as Aradus, took the name of Phœnicia: what King succeeded Phœnix it doth not appear; but at such time as the Grecians besieged Troy, Phasis governed Phœnicia.

In Hieremies time, and while Jehojakim ruled in Juda, the Tyrians had a King apart: for Hieremy speaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of several Kings. Cap. 27. 3.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Army wherewith he invaded Greece, Tetramnestus ruled that part of Phœnicia about Tyre and Zidon: who commanded, as some Writers affirm, Xerxes Fleet, or rather, as I suppose, those 300. Gallies, which himself brought to his aid: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Persian: for being broken into Reguli, and petty Kings in Hieremies time, they were subjected by Nabuchodonosor; of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembred, Hieremie propheſied.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeeded Tetramnestus, remembred by D. Siculus in his 14. Book.

Strato, his successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependency upon Darius, and that his Predecessors had served the East Empire against the Grecians. But divers Kings, of whom there is no memory, came between Tennes and Strato. For there were consumed 130. years and somewhat more, between Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander esteemed the more unworthy of reſtitution, becauſe (ſaith Curtius) he rather ſubmitted himſelf by the inſtigation of his ſubjects (who foreſaw their utter ruine by reſiſtance) than that he had any diſpoſition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians. Lib 4.

Of this Strato, Athenæus out of Theopompus reporteth, that he was a man of ill living, and moſt voluptuous; alſo that he appointed certain games and prizes for women-dancers, and ſingers, whom he to this end chiefly invited, and aſſembled: that having beheld the moſt beautiful and lively among them, he might recover them for his own uſe and delights. Of the ſtrange accident about the death of one Strato King of theſe coaſts, S. Hierome and others make mention: who having heard that the Perſians were neer him with an Army too weighty for his ſtrength, and finding that he was to hope for little grace, becauſe of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhearing to the Egyptians, he determining to kill himſelf, but fainting in the execution, his wife being preſent, wreſted the Sword out of his hand, and ſlew him: which done, ſhe alſo therewith pierced her own body, and died. Athen l. 12. c. 13. Hieron. l. 1. com. Jovin.

After Alexander was poſſeſt of Zidon, and the other Strato driven thence, he gave the Kingdom to Hephæſtion to diſpoſe of: who having received great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whoſe houſe he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith; and willingly offered to eſtabliſh him therein: but this Citizen, no leſs vertuous than rich, deſired Hephæſtion that this honour might be conferred on ſome one of the blood and race of their ancient Kings: and preſented unto him Balonymus, whom Curtius calls Abdolominus, Juſtine, Abdolonius, and Plutarch, Alynomus: who at the very hour that he was called to this regal Eſtate, was with his own hands working in his Garden, ſetting herbs and roots, for his relief and ſuſtenance: though otherwiſe a wiſe man, and exceeding juſt.

Theſe were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whoſe eſtate being afterwards changed into Popular or Ariſtocratical: and by times and turns ſubjected to the Emperours of the Eaſt, there remaineth no further memory of them, than that which is formerly delivered in the Tribe of Aſſer.

The Kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appear: Joſephus the Hiſtorian, as is ſaid, had many things wherewith he garniſhed his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Joſephus and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be gathered a deſcent of ſome twenty Kings of the Tyrians; but theſe Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Menander Epheſius, do in no ſort agree in the times of their reigns, nor in other particulars.

Abibalus is the firſt King of the Tyrians, that Joſephus and Theophilus remember, whom Theophilus calls Abemalus: the ſame perchance that the ſon of Sirach mentioneth in his forty and ſixth Chapter, ſpeaking of the Princes of the Tyrians. Cap. 46.

To this Abibalus, Suron ſucceeded, if he be not one and the ſame with Abibalus. David (ſaith Euſebius out of Eupolemus) conſtrained this Suron to pay him Tribute, of whom alſo David complaineth, Pſal. 83. Præp. Evang. l. 9. c. 4.

Hiram ſucceeded Suron, whom Joſephus calls Irom, and Theophilus ſometime Hieronimus, ſometimes Hieromus, but Tatian and Zonaras, Chiram. He entred into a league with David, and ſent him Cedars, with Maſons and Carpenters, to perform his buildings in Hieruſalem, after he had beaten thence the Jebuſites. The ſame was he that ſo greatly aſſiſted Solomon: whom he not only furniſhed with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raiſing of the Temple, and with great ſums of money, but alſo he joyned with him in his enterprize of the Eaſt India, and of Ophir: and furniſhed Solomon with Marriners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the moſt excellent Navigators: and lent him 120 talents of gold. Of this Hiram, there is not onely mention in divers places of Scripture, but in Joſephus in his Antiquities the 7. and 8. Chap. 2. & 3. in Theophilus his third book, in Tatianus his Oration againſt the Greeks: and in Sonaras, Tome the firſt. This Prince ſeemeth to be very mighty and magnificent, he deſpiſed the 20. Towns which Solomon offered him: he defended himſelf againſt that victorious King David: and gave his daughter in marriage to Solomon, called the Zidonian: for whoſe ſake he was contented to worſhip Aſtaroth, the Idol of the Phœnicians. Hiram lived 53. years. 2 Sam. 5. &c. 2 Sam. c. 5 2 Kin. 1. 9 10. 1 Chro. 14. 2 Chr. 2. 8, 9.

Baleaſtartus, whom Theoph. Antiochenus calleth Bazorus, ſucceeded Hiram King of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned 7. years, according to Joſephus. 1 Kin. 11. Theoph. 17. years.

Abdaſtartus the eldeſt ſon of Baleaſtartus, governed 9. yeares, and lived but 20. years, according to Joſephus: but after Theophilus he reigned 12. years, and lived 54. who being ſlain by the four ſons of his own Nurſe, the eldeſt of them held the Kingdom 12. years.

Aſtartus brother to Abdaſtartus, recovered the Kingdom from this Uſurper, and reigned 12. years.

Aſtarimus, or Atharimus, after Theophilus, a third Joſeph. 54. Theoph. 58 third brother, followed Astartus, and ruled 9. years, and lived in all 54.

Theoph. Phelles the fourth son of Baleastartus, and brother to the three former Kings, slew Astarimus, and reigned 8. moneths, and lived 50. years.

Ithobalus (or Juthobalus, in Theophilus) son to the third brother Astarimus, who was the chief Priest of the Goddess Astarta, which was a dignity next unto the King, revenged the death of his father, and slaughtered his Joseph. 31 Theoph. 12 Uncle Phelles: and reigned 32. years; the same which in the first of Kings, chap. 16. is called Ethbaal, whose daughter Jezebel Achab married.

Badezor, or Bazor, the son of Ithobalus, or Ethbaal, brother to Jezebel, succeeded his 1 Kings 16 31. Father, and reigned 6: years, and lived in Joseph. 6. years. all 45.

Theoph. 26. Mettimus succeeded Badezor, and reigned Joseph. 9. but 9. years (saith Josephus) he had two sons, Theoph. 9 Pygmalion and Barca, and two daughters, Elisa and Anna.

Pygmalion reigned after Mettimus his Father 40. years, and lived 56. In the seventh year of whose reign, Elisa sailed into Africa, and built Carthage, 143. years and 8. moneths after the Temple of Solomon: which by our accompt was 289. years after Troy was taken, and 143. before Rome: and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Æneas and Dido must be far out of square. For Pygmalion, covetous of Sicheus his riches, who had married his sister Elisa, slew him traiterously as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we believe Justin. l 18 Justine and Virgil, at the Altar: whereupon Virgil. l. Elisa fearing to be dispoiled of her husbands treasure, fled by Sea into Africa, as aforesaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to pursue, he was by his mothers tears, and by threats from the Oracle arrested. Barca accompanied his sister, and assisted her, in the erection of Carthage: and from him sprang that noble Family of the Barcæ in Africa, of which race descended many famous Captains, and the great Hannibal. Servius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, because of her man-like acts: others from Jedidia, a surname of Solomon.

Eluleus succeeded Pygmalion, and reigned 36. years: the same that overthrew the Fleet of Salmanasser, in the Port of Tyre: notwithstanding which he continued his siege before it on the Land side five years, but in vain.

After Eluleus, Ethobales governed the Tyrians, who vaunted himself to be as wise as Daniel: and that he knew all secrets (saith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writeth at large in his 28. Chapter: out of whom it was gathered, that this Prince died, or was slain in that long siege of Nabuchodonosor: who surrounded and attempted Tyre 13. years together, ere he prevailed.

Baal followed Ethobales, and reigned 10. years a tributary, perchance, to Nabuchodonosor: for after his death, it was governed by divers Judges, succeeding each other: First by Ecnibalus, then by Chelbis, Abarus the Priest, Mittonus, and Gerastus, who held it among them some 7. years, and odd moneths: after whom Balatorus commanded therein as a King for one year: after him Merbalus sent from Babylon, 4. years: after him Irom, sent thence also, 20. years. In the 17. of whose reign Cyrus began to govern Persia.

§. III.

Of Bozius his conceit, that the Edumæans inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them received and brought into Phœnicia the knowledge of the true God.

OF the great mutations of this Kingdom and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a discourse of divers other Nations, there is one Bozius that hath written a Tract at large, intituled, De ruinis Gentium. And although the great and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea, in all things under heaven, have proceeded from his ordinance, who onely is unchangeable, and the same for ever; yet whereas the said Bozius, inforcing here-hence, that the prosperity and ruine of the Tyrians were fruits of their embracing or forsaking the true Religion; to prove this his assertion, supposeth the Tyrians to have been Edumæans, descended from Esau, Jacobs brother: first, it can hardly be believed, that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glory, was in any sort truly devout and religious. But to this Boz. de ruin. Gent. l. 5. c. 7. end (besides the proof which the Scriptures give of Hirams good affection when Solomon built the Temple) he brings many conjectural arguments; whereof the strongest is their pedigree and descent: it being likely in his opinion, that the posterity of Esau received from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Isaac. That the Tyrians were Edumæans, he endeavours to shew, partly by weak reasons, painfully strained from some affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than weight: partly by authority. For Strabo, Herodotus, Pliny, and others, witness, that the Tyrians came from the Red Sea, in which there were three Illands, called Tyrus, Aradus, and Sidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards given to the Cities of Phœnicia. Considering therefore that all the coast of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) under the Edumæans: as Elah and Esiongabar; or under the Amalekites, who descended of Amalec the Nephew of Esau, whose chief City was Madian, so called of Madian the son of Abraham by Cethura, whose posterity did people it: the consequence appears good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edomites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the children of Israel. Hereunto he adds, that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worship of Astartis, the Idol of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Pherecydes being Phœnicians, themselves differed much in their Philosophy from the Idolatrous customs of the Greeks. That in Teman, a Town of the Edumæans, was an University, wherein, as may appear by Eliphas the Temanite, who disputed with Job, Religion was sincerely taught.

Tyrus,

Such is the discourse of Bozius, who labouring to prove one Paradox by another, deserves in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumæans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his people: neither is it true that they were Edumæans at all. In what Religion Esau brought up his children, it is no where found written; but that himself was a profane man, and disavowed by God, the Scriptures in plain terms express. That his Posterity were Idolaters, is directly proved in the 25. Chapter of the second Book of Chronicles. That the Edomites were perpetual enemies to the house of Israel, save only when David and some of his race, Kings of Juda, held them in subjection, who knows not? or who is ignorant of Davids unfriendly behaviour amongst them, when first they were subdued? surely, it was not any argument of Kinred or Alliance between Tyrus and Mount Seir, that Hiram held such good correspondence with David; even then when Joab slew all the males of Edom: neither was it for their devotion to God, and good affection to Israel, that the Edomites were so ill intreated. It seemeth that the piety and ancient wisdom of Eliphaz the Themanite was then forgotten, and the Edumæans punished, for being such as David in his own dayes found them. Although indeed the City of Teman whence Eliphaz came to reason with Job, is not that in Edumæa, but another of the same name, lying East from the Sea of Galilee, and adjoyning to Hus, the country of Job: and to Sueh the City of Bildad the Suhite; as both such Chorographers who best knew those parts, do plainly shew, and the holy Text maketh manifest. For Job is said to have exceeded in riches, and Solomon in wisdom; all the people of the East; not the Inhabitants of Mount Seir, which lay due South from Palestina. True it is, that Eliphaz the son of Esau had a son called Teman: but that fathers were wont in those dayes to take name of their sons, I no where find. And Ismael also had a son called Thema: of whom it is not unlike, that Theman in the East had the name: for as much as in the 7. Chapter of the Book of Judges, the Midianites, Amalekites, and all they of the East are called Ismaelites. And he that well considers how great and strong a Nation Amalec was, which durst give battel to the Host of Israel, wherein were 600000. able men, will hardly believe that such a people were descended from one of Esau his grand-children. For how powerful and numberless must the forces of all Edom have been: if one Tribe of them, yea, one Family of a Tribe had been so great? surely Mount Seir and all the Regions adjoyning could not have held them. But we no where find that Edom had to do with Amalec, or assisted the Amalekites, when Saul went to root them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of it self, if distinct from the Ismaelites. The like may be said of Midian, that the Founder thereof being son to Abraham by Cethura, doubtless was no Edomite. And thus much in general for all the Seigniory of the Red Sea coast, which Bozius imagines the Edumæans to have held: if the Edomites in after-times held some places, as Elan and Esiongabar on the Red Sea shore, yet in Moses time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moses himself saith, that Israel did compass all the borders of Edom: within which limits had Midian stood, Moses must needs have known it: because he had sojourned long in that Country: and there had left his wife and children, when he went into Egypt.

But conjectural Arguments, how probable soever, are needless in so manifest a case. For in the 83. Psalm, Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as distinct Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sydonians being one people, as all good Authors shew, and Bozius himself confesseth, were Canaanites, as appears, Gen. 10. 15. and 19. appointed by God to have been destroyed, and their Lands given to the children of Aser, Jos. 29. because they were Idolaters, and of the cursed seed of Canaan, not Cousins to Israel, nor professors of the same Religion. For though Hiram said, Blessed be God that hath sent King David a wise son: we cannot infer that he was of Davids Religion. The Turk hath said as much of Christian Princes, his confederates. Certain it is, that the Sydonians then worshipped Astaroth; and drew Solomon also to the same Idolatry.

Whereas Hiram aided Solomon in building the Temple, he did it for his own ends, receiving therefore of Solomon great provision of Corn and Oyl, and the offer of twenty Towns and Villages in Galilee. And if we rightly consider things, it will appear that Hiram in all points dealt Merchant-like with Solomon. He allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is over pestered, being otherwise apt to yeild silks: as the Andarine Silks which come from thence, and other good Commodities: For Corn and Oyl, which he wanted, he gave that which he could well spare to Solomon. Also Gold for Land: wherein Solomon was the wiser; who having got the Gold first, gave to Hiram the worst Villages that he had: with which the Tyrian was ill pleased. But it was a necessary policy which inforced Tyrus to hold league with Israel. For David had subdued Moab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, even to Euphrates: thorow which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carry and re-carry their Wares on Camels, to their Fleets on the Red Sea, and back again to Tyrus: so that Solomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to pass, could have cut off their Trade.

But the Israelites were no Sea-men, and therefore glad to share with the Tyrians in their adventures. Yet Solomon, as Lord of the Sea-towns which his Father had taken from the Philistims, might have greatly distressed the Tyrians, and perhaps have brought them even into subjection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no marvel) that Solomon rather meant, as a man of peace, to imploy his Fathers Treasure in magnificent Works, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore he willingly aided him, and sent him cunning workmen, to increase his delight in goodly Buildings, Imageries, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages between Solomon and Hiram, are no strong arguments of piety in the Tyrians: so those other proofs which Bozius frames negatively upon particular examples are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I think, no man knows. It seems to me, that having more cunning than the Greeks, and being very ambitious, he would fain have purchased divine honours; which his Daughters, Nephews, and others of his house obtained; but his own many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecydes are but single examples: Every salvage Nation hath some wisdom excelleth the Vulgar, even of civil people. Neither did the moral wisdom of these men express any true knowledge of the true God. Onely they made no good mention of the Gods of Greece: whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not known to have taught Idolatry, therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is of force, That Carthage, Utica, Leptis, Cadiz, and all Colonies of the Tyrians (of which, I think, the Islands before mentioned in the Red Sea to have been, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, even from their first beginnings: therefore the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This their Idolatry from Solomons time on-wards is acknowledged by Bozius, who would have us think them to have been formerly a strange kind of devout Edomites. In which fancie he is so peremptory, that he stileth men of contrary opinion, Impios politicos, as if it were impiety to think, that God (who even among the Heathen, which have not known his Name, doth favour Vertue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded moral honesty, with temporal happiness. Doubtless, this doctrine of Bozius would better have agreed with Julian the Apostata, than with Cyril. For if the Assyrians, Greeks, Romans, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most, when they drew neerest unto the true Religion: what may be said of the foul Idolatry which grew in Rome as fast as Rome it self grew: and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost upon every new victory? How few great battels did the Romans win, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new god, or some new honour to one of their old gods? yea, what one Nation, save onely that of the Jews, was subdued by them, whose Gods they did not afterward entertain in their City? Onely the true God, which was the God of the Jews, they rejected, upbraiding the Jews with him, as if he were unworthy of the Roman Majesty: shall we hereupon enforce the lewd and foolish conclusion which Heathen Writers used against the Christians in the Primitive Church: That such Idolatry had caused the City of Rome to flouriſh, and that the decay of thoſe abominations did alſo bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought ſo, if proſperity were a ſign or effect of true Religion. Such is the blind zeal of Bozius, who writing againſt thoſe whom he falſly terms impious, gives ſtrength to ſuch as are impious indeed. But ſuch indiſcretion is uſually found among men of his humour; who having once either fooliſhly embraced the dreams of others, or vainly faſhioned in their own brains any ſtrange Chimera's of Divinity, condemn all ſuch in the pride of their zeal, as Atheiſts and Infidels, that are not tranſported with the like intemperate ignorance. Great pity it is, that ſuch mad dogs are oftentimes incouraged by thoſe, who having the command of many tongues, when they themſelves cannot touch a man in open and generous oppoſition, will wound him ſecretly by the malicious vertue of an Hypocrite.

Rome

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of Ephraim, and of the Kings of the ten Tribes, whoſe head was Ephraim.

§. I.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of Ephraim.

Pſal. 59. 78 108. Par. 25.

HAving now paſt over Phœnicia, we come to the next Territory adjoyning, which is that of Ephraim: ſometimes taken per excellentiam, for the whole Kingdom of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the ſecond ſon of Joſeph, whoſe iſſues when they left Egypt were in number 45000. all which dying in the Deſarts, (Joſua excepted) there entred the Holy Land of their children grown to be able men, 32500. who ſate down on the Weſt ſide of Jordan; between Manaſſe and Benjamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Jordan, and the Mediterran Sea, did by the Eaſt and Weſt.

The firſt and chief City which Ephraim had, was Samaria, the Metropolis of the Kingdom of Iſrael, built by Amris or Homri King thereof, and ſeated on the top of the Mountain Somron, which overlooketh all the bottom, and as far as the Sea-coaſt. It was afterward called Sebaſte, or Auguſta, in honour of Auguſt. Cæſar. This City is often remembred in the Scriptures: and magnificent it was in the firſt building; for as Brochard obſerveth, the ruines which yet remain, and which Brochard found greater than thoſe of Hieruſalem, tell thoſe that behold them, what it was when it ſtood upright: for to this day there are found great ſtore of goodly Marble pillars, with other hewen and carved ſtone in great abundance, among the rubble.

It was beaten to the ground by the ſons of Hircanus the high Prieſt: reſtored and built by the firſt Herod the ſon of Antipater: who to flatter Cæſar called it Sebaſte. Herein were the Prophets Heliſæus and Abdias buried: and ſo was John Baptiſt. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Grecian Monks.

Near Samaria towards the South, is the hill of Bethel, and a Town of that name: on the top of which mountain Jeroboam erected one of his golden calves, to be worſhipped: with which he ſeduced the Iſraelites.

In ſight of this Mountain of Bethel, was that ancient City of Sichem; after the reſtauration called Neapolis, now Peloſa, and Napolaſa: It was deſtroyed by Simeon and Levi, in revenge of the raviſhment of their ſiſter Dina: and after that by Abimelec evened with the ſoil. Jeroboam raiſed it up again: and the Damaſcens a third time caſt it down. Sichar. Joh. 4. 5. Maborthan. Joſeph. 1. 6. ant. 1.

Under Sichem toward the Sea ſtandeth Pharaton or Pirhathon, on the Mountain Amalec, the City of Abdon Judge of Iſrael. And under it Bethoron of the Levites, built as it is ſaid by Sara, the daughter of Ephraim. Near to this City Judas Macchabæus overthrew Seron and Lyſias, Lievtenants to Antiochus. This City had Solomon formerly repaired and fortified. Judg. 12. 15. 2 King. 13.

Betweeen Bethoron and the Sea, ſtandeth Samir, of which Joſ. 10. and Saron, whoſe King was ſlain by Joſua: it is alſo mentioned Acts 9. 35. and of this Saron the Valley taketh Joſ. 12. 18.

keth name, which beginning at Cæſarea Paleſtinæ, extendeth it ſelf alongſt the coaſt as far as Joppe, ſaith Adrichome: though indeed the name Sarona is not particularly given to this Valley, but to every fruitful plain Region; for not onely this Valley is ſo called, to wit, between Cæſarea and Joppæ, but that alſo between the Mountain Tabor and the Sea of Galilee: for ſo S. Hierome upon the five and thirtieth Chapter of Eſay, interprets the word Saron: and ſo doth the ſame Father in his Commentaries upon Abdia, read Saron for Aſſaron: underſtanding thereby a Plaine neer Lidda: which Lidda in his time was called Dioſpolis, or the City of Jupiter, one of the Toparchies of Judæa, the fift in dignity (or the third after Pliny) where S. Peter (non ſua, ſed Chriſti virtute) cured Æneas. Niger calls all that Region from Antilibanus to Joppe, Sarona. This Joppe was burnt to the ground by the Romans, thoſe Ravens and ſpoilers of all Eſtates, diſturbers of Common-weales, uſurpers of other Princes Kingdoms; who with no other reſpect led than to amplifie their own glory, troubled the whole world: and themſelves, after murdering one another, became a prey to the moſt and ſavage barbarous Nations.

Acts 6. Luke 23. Niger. com. 4. Aſiæ, fol. 503. 14.

In Diaſpolis (ſaith Wil. of Tyre) was S. George beheaded, and buried: in whoſe honour and memory Juſtinian the Emperor cauſed a fair Church to be built over his Tombe; theſe be Tyrius his words: Relicta à dextris locis maritimis Antipatride, & Joppe, per latè patentem planitiem Elutheriam pertranſeuntes, Liddam quæ eſt Dioſpolis, ubi & egregii Martyris Georgii uſque hodie Sepulchrum oſtenditur, pervenerunt, ejus Eccleſiam quum ad honorem ejuſdem Martyris, pius & orthodoxus Princeps Romanorum, Auguſtus Juſtinianus multo ſtudio & devotione prompta ædificari præceperat, &c. They having left (ſaith he) on the right hand, the Sea Towns, Antipatris and Joppe, paſſing over the great open Plain of Elutheria, came to Lidda, which is Dioſpolis: where the ſumptuous Tomb of the famous Martyr S. George is at this day ſhewed; whoſe Church when the godly and Orthodox Prince of the Roman, High and mighty Juſtinian, had commanded to be built, with great earneſtneſs and preſent devotion, &c. Thus far Tyrius: by whoſe teſtimony we may conjecture that this S. George was not that Arrian Biſhop of Alexandria; but rather ſome better Chriſtian: for this of Alexandria was ſlain there in an uprore of the people, and his aſhes caſt into the Sea, as Ammianus Marcellinus reports. And yet alſo it may be, that this Georgius was a better Chriſtian than he is commonly thought: for his words of the Temple of Genius, How long ſhall this Sepulchre ſtand? occaſioned the uprore of the people againſt him: as fearing leaſt he would give attempt to overthrow that beautiful Temple. This alſo Marcellinus reports; who though he ſay that this Georgius was alſo deadly hated of the Chriſtians, who elſe might have reſcued him: yet he addeth, that his aſhes, with the aſhes of two others, were therefore caſt into the Sea, leſt if their Reliques had been gathered up, Churches ſhould be built for them, as for others. But for my part, I rather think that it was not Georgius, whoſe name lives in the right honourable order of our Knights of the Garter, but rather another, whom Tyrius abovecited witneſſeth to have been buried at Lidda or Dioſpolis. The ſame alſo is confirmed by Vitriac. S. Hierome affirms that it was ſometime called Tigrida, and while the Chriſtians inhabited the Holy Land, it had a Biſhop Suffragan.

Neer to Lidda or Diaſpolis ſtandeth Ramatha of the Levites, or Aramathia: afterward Rama, and Ramula, the native City of Joſeph, which buried the body of Chriſt. There are many places which bear this name of Rama; one they ſet in the Tribe of Juda neer Thecua in the way of Hebron; another in Nephtalim, not far from Sephet; a third in Zabulon, which they ſay, adjoyneth to Sephoris; a fourth, which they make the ſame with Silo; and a fifth, which is this Rama, in the hills of Ephraim, called Rama-Sophim, where Samuel lived, and wherein he is buried.

From hence to the North alongſt the coaſt are Helon, or Ajalon of the Levites, of which 1 Chron. 6. Apollonia, of which Joſephus in his Antiquities, and in the wars of the Jews. Alſo Balſaliſa for which Junius, 2 Reg. 4. 42. reads planities Shaliſtæ) they place hereabout in this Tribe of Ephraim; but Junius upon 1. Sam. 6. where we read of the Land of Shaliſha, findeth it in Benjamin.

Then Thamnath-ſarah, or according to the Hebrew, Thimnath-Serach: one alſo of the ten Toparchies, or Præſidencies of Judæa, which they call Thamnitica, a goodly City, and ſtrong, ſeated on one of the high Hills of Ephraim; on the North of the Hill called Gaas; which City and Territory Iſrael gave unto their Leader Joſua; who alſo amplified it with buildings, neer which he was buried. Joſ 9 50.

Hieron. in locis Hebr.

that greatest of wonders which God wrought in Josua's time.

In the places adjoyning standeth Adarsa, or Adasa; where Judas Machabæus with three thousand Jews overthrew the Army of Nicanor, Lievtenant of Syria; neer to Gaser, or Gezer, which Josua took, and hung their King; a City of the Levites. It was afterward taken by Pharaoh of Egypt; the people all slain, and the City razed; Solomon rebuilt it.

Mac. 1. 7. 40.

To the East of this place is the Frontier City of Jesleti, of which Jos. 16. 3. otherwise Pelethi, whence David had part of his Prætorian Souldiers, under the charge of Benaia. Then that high and famous Mountain and City of Silo, whereon the Ark of God was kept so many years, till the Philistims got it.

To this they joyn the City of Machmas, or Michmas: in which Jonathan Machabæus inhabited, a place often remembred in the Scriptures. It standeth in the common way from Samaria towards Hierusalem: and is now called Byra.

See in Benjamin. 1 Mac. 9 ult. 1 Kings 4. and see Rama in Benjamin.

Then the Village of Naioth where Saul prophesied; and neer it Ephron, one of those Cities which Abijah recovered from Jeroboam; after the great overthrow given him. Then Kimbtsaim, of the Levites, of which Jos. 21. 22. which Junius thinks to be the same with Jokmeham, of which 1 Chro. 6. 28. As for Absaloms Baalasor, which they find hereabout, Junius reads it, in the Plain of Chatzor; and findes it in the Tribe of Juda; as Jos. 15. we read of two Chatzors in that Tribe; one neer Kedesh, ver. 23. and the other the same as Chetzron, ver. 25.

In this Tribe also they find the City of Mello; whose Citizens, they say, joyned with the Sichemites in making the Bastard Abimelec King: adding that for the building thereof with other Cities, Solomon raised a Tribute upon the people. But it seems that Mello, or Millo is a common name of a strong Fort or Cittadel: and so Junius, for domus Millo, reads incolæ munitionis, and for Solomo ædificavit Millo, he reads ædificabat munitionem, and so the Septuagint read it τὴν ἀκρᾶν in that place. And without doubt the Millo which Solomon built, cannot be that of Sichem, but another in Hierusalem.

Jud. 9. 6. 20. 1 Reg. 11. 27. Vatablus expounds Millo in this place locum publicum necessarium civibus Jerosolymitanis atque Israelites.

The other Cities of mark in Ephraim, are Taphuach, whose King was slain by Josua; and Janoach, or Janoah, spoiled by Teglatphalassar: Pekah then governing Israel, with divers others, but of no great fame. The Mountains of Ephraim sometime signifie the greatest part of the Land of the sons of Joseph, on the West of Jordan: several parts whereof are the Hill of Samrom, or Samaria, 1 Reg. 16. 24. * the Hill of Gahas, Judg. 2. 9. the Hill of Tsalmon, or Salmon, Judg. 9. 48. the Hills of the Region of Tsuph, or Tsophim, Judg. 9. 5. where Rama-Tsophim stood, which was the City of Samuel.

2 King. 15 29. Jos. 17. 15, 16.

The great plenty of fruitful Vines upon the sides of the Mountains, was the occasion that Jacob in the spirit of prophecy, Gen. 49. 22. compared Josephs two branches, Ephraim and Manasse, to the branches of a fruitful Vine planted by the Well side, and spreading her (a) Daughter branches along the Wall: which Allegory also Ezek. 22. in his Lamentation for Ephraim (that is, for the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim) prosecutes: as also in his Lamentation for Juda, he followeth the other Allegory of Jacob, Gen. 49. 9. comparing Juda to a Lion. Upon the top of one of the highest of these Hills of Ephraim, which overlooketh all the Plains on both sides of Jordan, they find the Castle called Dok: which they make to be the same with Dagon, of which Josep. 1. bell. Jud. 2. in which Castle, as it is 1 Mac. 16. Ptolomy most traiterously at a banquet, slew Simon Macchabæus his father-in-law.

Among the Rivers of this Tribe of Ephraim, they name Gaas, remembred in the second of Samuel, c. 23. v. 30. where though Junius read, Hiddai ex una vallium Gahasi: yet the Vulgar and Vatablus read Giddai, of the river of Gaas. Also in this Tribe they place the river of Carith, by which the Prophet Elias abode during the great drought: where he was (b) fed with the Ravens: and after that the River was dried up, he travelled (by the Spirit of God guided) towards Sidon: where he was relieved by the poor widdow of Zarepta, whose dead son he revived, and increased her pittance of Meal and Oil: whereby she sustained her life.

* Also the hill of Phineas, where Eleazar the high Priest the son of Aaron was buried, Jos 24. 33 And the two tops of Hills, Gerizzim, where the blessings, and Hebal, where the cursings were to be read to the people: of which Deut. 11. 27. & Jos. 8 a It seemeth that Jacob in this prophesie the rather useth the word Daughters for branches, thereby the more plainly to signifie Colonies which in the Hebrew phrase are called Daughters of the Metropolis: as in Josua, and elsewhere often.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the ten Tribes, from Jeroboam to Achab.

OF the first Kings of Israel I omit in this place to speak, and reserve it to the Catalogue of the Kings of Juda: of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the Kings of the ten Tribes, but briefly, beginning after the division from Juda and Benjamin, now it followeth to speak. The first of these Kings Jeroboam the son of Nebat, an Ephrathite, of Zereda, who being a man of strength and courage, was by Solomon made overseer of the buildings of the Munition in Hierusalem, for as much as belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim and Manasse: and so many of them as wrought in thoſe works. During which time, as he went to Hieruſalem, he encountered the Prophet Ahijah: who made him know that he was by God deſtined to be King of Iſrael, and to command ten of the twelve tribes. After this, fearing that thoſe things might come to Solomons knowledge, he fled into Egypt to Shiſhak, whom Euſebius calleth Oſochores, whoſe Daughter he married: the Predeceſſor of which Shiſhak (if not the ſame) did likewiſe entertain Adad the Edumæan, when he was carried young into Egypt from the fury of David, and his Captain Joab; which Adad the King of Egypt married to his Wives ſiſter Taphnes; uſing both him and Jeroboam as inſtruments to ſhake the Kingdom of Judæa, that himſelf might the eaſilier ſpoil it, as he did: for in the fifth year of Rehoboam, Shiſhak ſack't the City of Hieruſalem, and carried thence all the treaſure of David and Solomon, and all the ſpoils which David took from Adadezor of Soba, with the preſents of Tohu, King of Hamath, which were of an ineſtimable value. 1 King. 14.

This Jeroboam after the death of Solomon became Lord of the ten Tribes: and though he were permitted by God to govern the Iſraelites, and from a mean man exalted to that State: yet preferring the policies of the world before the ſervice and honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes under his rule ſhould repair to Hieruſalem to do their uſual Sacrifices, they might be drawn from him by degrees) he erected two golden Calves, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worſhip (an imitation of the Egyptian Apis, ſaith S. Ambroſe, or rather of Aarons Calf in Horeb:) further he made election of his Prieſts out of the baſeſt and unlearned people. This King made his chief Seat and Palace at Sichem: He deſpiſed the warning of the Judæan Prophet, whom Joſephus calleth Adon, and Glycas Joel: his hand thereafter withered, and was again reſtored: but continuing in his Idolatry, and hardened, upon occaſion that the Prophet returning, was ſlain by a Lion; Ahijah makes him know that God purpoſed to root out his poſterity.

Ambroſe upon the firſt chapter of the Epiſtle to the Romans

1 King. 11 12, &c. He was afterward overthrown by Abia King of Juda, and died after he had governed two and twenty years; whom Nadab his ſon ſucceeded: who in the ſecond year of his reign, together with all the race of Jeroboam, was ſlain, and rooted out by Baaſha, who reigned in his ſtead: ſo Nadab lived King but two years.

Baaſha the ſon of Ahijah, the third King after the partition, made war with Aſa King of Juda: he ſeated himſelf in Therſa: and fortified Rama againſt Juda, to reſtrain their excurſions. Hereupon Aſa entertained Benhadad of Damaſcus againſt him, who invaded Nepthalim, and deſtroyed many places therein: the mean while Aſa carried away the materials, with which Baaſha intended to fortifie Rama: but being an Idolater, he was threatned by Jehu the Prophet, that it ſhould befall his race, as it did to Jeroboam: which afterward came to paſs: He ruled four and twenty years, and died. 1 King. 15 & 16.

To Baaſha ſucceeded Ela his ſon, who at a feaſt at his Palace of Therſa, was in his cups ſlain by Zambris, after he had reigned two years: and in him the propheſie of Jehu was fulfilled.

Zambris ſucceeded Ela, and aſſumed the name of a King ſeven daies; but Ambris in revenge of the Kings murder, ſet upon Zambris, or Zimri, and incloſed him in Therſa, and inforc't him to burn himſelf. 1 King. 16

Ambris or Homri ſucceeded Ela, and tranſferred the Regal ſeat from Therſa to Samaria: which be bought of Shemer, built, and fortified it. This Ambris was alſo an Idolater no leſs impious than the reſt: and therefore ſubjected to Tabremmon King of Syria, the father of Benhadad, according to Euſebius, Nicephorus, and Zonaras: but how this ſhould ſtand, I do not well conceive; ſeeing Benhadad the ſon of Tabremmon was invited by Aſa King of Juda, to aſſail Baaſha King of Iſrael, the father of Ela, who forewent Ambris. This Ambris reigned twelve years, ſix in Therſa, and ſix in Samaria, and left two children, Achab and Athalia. 1 King. 16 1 King. 15.

§. III.

Of Achab and his Succeſſors, with the captivity of the ten Tribes.

Achab, or Ahab ſucceeded Omri, who not onely upheld the Idolatry of Jeroboam, borrowed of the Egyptians: but he married Jezabel the Zidonian: and as Jeroboam followed the Religion of his Egyptian Wife: ſo did Achab of his Zidonian: and erected an Altar and a Grove to Baal in Samaria. He ſuffered Jezabel to kill the Prophets of the moſt high God. God ſent famine on the land of Iſrael. Achab met Elias: Elias prevailed in the trial of the ſacrifice, and killed the falſe Prophets; and afterward flieth for fear of Jezabel.

Benhadad not long after beſieged Samaria: & taken by Achab, was by him ſet at liberty: for which, the Prophet (whom Glycas calleth Michæas)

Michæas) reproveth him: afterward he caused Naboth by a false accusation to be stoned. Then joyning with Josaphat in the war for the recovery of Ramoth, he was slain, as Michæas had foretold him.

He had three sons named in the Scripture, Ochozias, Joram, and Joas: besides seventy other sons by sundry wives and concubines.

Ochozias succeeded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: he bruised himself by a fall: and sent for counsel to Beelzebub the god of Acharon. Eliah the Prophet meeteth the Messenger on the way: and misliking that Ochozias sought help from that dead Idol, asked the Messenger, if there were not a God in Israel? Ochozias sendeth two Captains, and with each 50. souldiers, to bring Eliah unto him, both which with their Attendants were consumed with fire. The third Captain besought mercy at Eliah's hands, and he spared him, and went with him to the King, avowing it to the King that he must then die; which came to pass in the second year of his reign.

Beelzebub was the same with Belus and Pluto, saith Viginere upon Levi. 2 Kings 1.

Joram, the brother of Ochozias by Jezabel, succeeded: He allured Josaphat King of Juda, and the King of Edom to assist him against the Moabites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 20000. sheep. The three Kings wanted water for themselves and their horses in the Deserts. The Prophet Elisha causeth the ditches to flow. The Moabites are overthrown: their King flieth to Kirharaseth, and being besieged, according to some Expositors, burnt his son on the walls as a sacrifice, whereat the three Kings, moved with compassion, returned and left Moab, wasting and spoiling that Region. Others, as it seems with better reason, understand the Text to speak of the son of the King of Edom, whom they suppose in this irruption to have been taken prisoner by the Moabites, and that the King of Moab shewed him over the walls, threatning, unless the siege were dissolved, that he would offer him in sacrifice to his gods. Whereupon the King of Edom besought those of Juda and Israel to break off the siege for the safety of his son: which when the other Kings refused to yield unto, and that Moab, according to his former threatning, had burnt the King of Edoms son upon the Rampire, that all the Assailants might discern it, the King of Edom being by this sad spectacle inraged, forsook the party of the other Kings, for want of whose assistance the siege was broken up.

2 Kings 3.

After this the King of Aram sent to Joram, to heal Naaman the Captain of his Army of the Leprosie. The answer of Joram was, Am I God to kill, and to give life, that he doth send to heal a man of his Leprosie: adding, that the Aramite sought but matter of quarrel against him. Elisha hearing thereof, willed the King to send Naaman to him; promising that he should know that there was a Prophet in Israel: and so Naaman was healed by washing himself seven times in Jordan. Elisha refused the gifts of Naaman; but his servant Gehazi accepted a part thereof: from whence the sellers of spiritual gifts are called Gehazites, as the buyers are Simonians, of Simon Magus. 2 King 1.5

Afterward Benhadad King of Aram, or Damascus, having heard that this Prophet did discover to the King of Israel whatsoever the Aramite consulted in his secretest counsel, sent a troop of horse to take Elisha: all whom Elisha struck blind, and brought them captives into Samaria: Joram then asked leave of the Prophet to slay them, Elisha forbade him to harm them: but caused them to be fed, and sent back to their own Prince in safety.

The King of Aram, notwithstanding these benefits, did again attempt Samaria, and brought the Citizens to extream famine. Joram imputeth the cause thereof to the Prophet Elisha. Elisha by prayer caused a noise of Chariots and Armour to sound in the air, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the siege. An act of great admiration, as the same is written in the second of Kings. After this, when Azael obtained the Kingdom of Syria by the death of his Master, Joram entring upon his frontier, took Ramoth-Gilead: in which war he received divers wounds, and returned to Jezreel to be cured. But whilest he lay there, Jehu (who commanding the Army of Joram in Gilead, was anointed King by one of the children of the Prophets sent by Elisha) surprised and slew both him and all that belonged unto him, rooting out the whole posterity of Ahab. 2 Kings 7.

Jehu, who reigned after Jehoram, destroyed not onely the race of his fore-goers, but also their religion; for which he received a promise from God, That his seed should occupy the Throne unto the fourth generation. Yet he upheld the Idolatry of Jeroboam, for which he was plagued with grievous war, wherein he was beaten by Hazael the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countries to the East of Jordan: in which war he was slain, saith Cedrenus; whereof the Scriptures are silent. Jehu reigned 28. years. Pag 86.

Joachaz, or Jehoachaz the son of Jehu succeeded his father, whom Azael and his son Benhadad 2 King. 13.

Benhadad often invaded, and in the end ſubjected, leaving him onely 50. horſe, 20. chariots, and 10000. foot: and, as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like duſt beaten into powder. Joachaz reigned 17. years.

After Joachaz, Joas his ſon governed Iſrael, who when he repaired to Eliſha the Prophet as he lay on his death-bed, the Prophet promiſed him three victories over the Aramites: and firſt commanded him to lay his hand on his bow, and Eliſha covered the Kings hands with his, and bad him open the window Weſtward (which was toward Damaſcus) and then ſhoot an arrow thence out. He again willed him to beat the ground with his arrows, who ſmote it thrice, and ceaſed: The Prophet then told him, that he ſhould have ſmitten five or ſix times, and then he ſhould have had ſo many victories over the Aramites as he gave ſtrokes. And ſo it ſucceeded with Joas, who overthrew the Aramites in three battels, and recovered the Cities and Territory from Benhadad the ſon of Azael, which his father
2 Kings 14 Joachaz had loſt. He alſo overthrew Amazia King of Juda, who provoked him to make the war, whereupon he entred Hieruſalem, and ſacked it with the Temple. This Joas reigned ſixteen years, and died; in whoſe time alſo the Prophet Eliſha exchanged this life for a better.

Jeroboam the third from Jehu, followed Joas his father, an Idolater, as his predeceſſors; but he recovered all the reſt of the lands belonging to Iſrael, from Hamath which is near Libanus, to the dead Sea, and reigned one and forty years.

Zacharias the fifth and laſt of the houſe of Jehu, ſlain by Shallum his vaſſal, who reigned in his ſtead, governed ſix moneths. Shallum held the Kingdom but one moneth, being ſlaughtered by Menahem of the Gadites.

Menahem, who took revenge of Shallum,
2 King. 16. 19. uſed great cruelty to thoſe that did not acknowledge him: ripping the bellies of thoſe that were with child. This Menahem being invaded by Phul, bought his peace with ten thouſand talents of ſilver, which he exacted by a Tribute of fifty ſhekels from every man of wealth in Iſrael. Menahem governed twenty years.

Pekahiah, or Phaceia, or after Zonaras, Phaceſia ſucceeded, and after he had ruled
1 Kings 15. 29. two years, he was ſlain by Phaca, or Pekah the Commander of his Army, who reigned in his place. In this Pekah's time, Phulaſſer, or Tiglat-Phylaſſer invaded the Kingdom of Iſrael, and won Jion, Abel-Bethmaacah, Janoach, Kedeſh, Hazor, and Gilead, with all the Cities of Galilee, carrying them captives into Aſſyria: he was drawn in by Achaz King of Judæa, againſt Pekah and Rezin, the laſt of the Adades. For Achas being waſted by Pekah of Iſrael, and by Rezin of Damaſcus, did a third time borrow the Church-riches, and therewith ingaged the Aſſyrian, who firſt ſuppreſſed that Monarchy of Syria and Damaſcus, and then of Iſrael: and this inviting of the great Aſſyrian, was the utter ruine of both States, of Iſrael, and of Judæa. Pekah reigned 20. years.

Then Hoſhea, or Oſea, who ſlew Pekah, became the vaſſal of Salmanaſſer; but hoping to ſhake off the Aſſyrian yoak, he ſought aid from So, or Sua, or Sebicus King of Egypt: which being known to the Aſſyrian, he caſt him into priſon, beſieged Samaria, and maſtered it: carried the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Nineve in Aſſyria, and into Rages in Media, and into other Eaſtern Regions, and there diſperſed them: and re-planted Samaria with divers Nations, and chiefly with the Cuthæ (inhabiting about Cutha, a River in Perſia, or rather in Arabia Deſerta) and with the people Catanei bounding upon Syria, and with thoſe of Sepharvajim (a people of Sephar in Meſopotamia upon Euphrates, of whoſe conqueſt Senacherib vaunteth) alſo with thoſe of Ava, which were of the ancient Avins, who inhabited the Land of the Philiſtims in Abrahams time, dwelling near unto Gaza, whom the Caphtorims rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Deſart, called Havæi, willing to return to their ancient ſeats. To theſe he added thoſe of Chamath, or Ituræa, the ancient enemies of the Iſraelites, and ſometime the Vaſſals of the Adads of Damaſcus, which ſo often afflicted them. And thus did this Aſſyrian adviſe himſelf better than the Romans did. For after Titus and Veſpaſian had waſted the Cities of Judæa and Hieruſalem, they carried the people away captive: but left no others in their places, but a very few ſimple labourers, beſides their own thin Garriſons, which ſoon decayed; and thereby they gave that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Saracens, who never could be driven thence again to this day.

And this tranſmigration, plantation, and diſplantation, happened in the year of the world, 3292. the ſixth year of Ezekiah King of Juda: and the ninth of Hoſea the laſt King of Iſrael.

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable places of Dan, Simeon, Juda, Reuben, Gad, and the other half of Manaſſe.

§. I.

Of Dan, whereof Joppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other Towns.

NOw following the coaſt of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land aſſigned to the Tribe of Dan, joyneth to Ephraim, whereof I ſpake laſt: of which Family there were numbred at Mount Sinai 62700. fighting men, all which leaving their bodies with the reſt in the Deſarts, there entred the Holy Land of their ſons 66400. bearing arms. The firſt famous City in this Tribe on the Sea-coaſt was Joppe, or Japho, as in the 19. of Joſua: one of the moſt ancient of the world, and the moſt famous of others on that coaſt, becauſe it was the Port of Hieruſalem. From hence Jonas imbarked himſelf when he fled from the ſervice of God towards Tharſis in Cilicia. In the time of the Macchabees this City received many changes: and while Judas Macchabæus governed the Jews, the Syrians that were garriſon'd in Joppe, having their Fleet in the Port, invited 200. principal Citizens aboard them, and caſt them all into the Sea: which Judas revenged by firing their Fleet, and putting the companies which ſought to eſcape to the ſword.

Mac. 2, 12.

It was twice taken by the Romans, and by Ceſtius the Lievtenant utterly burnt and ruined. But in the year of Chriſt, 1250. Lodowick the French King gave it new Wals and Towers: It is now the Turks, and called Jaffa. There are certain Rocks in that Port, whereunto it is reported, that Andromeda was faſtned with chains: and from thence delivered from the Sea-monſter by Perſeus. This fable (for ſo I take it) is confirmed by Joſephus, Solinus, and Pliny. Marcus Scaurus during his office of Ædileſhip, ſhewed the bones of this Monſter to the people of Rome. S. Hierome upon Jonas ſpeaks of it indifferently.

Lib. 3. 1. 17. de bel. Jud. Solin. c. 47. Plin. l. 5. cap. 9.

The next unto Joppe was Jamnia, where Judas Macchabæus burnt the reſt of the Syrian Fleet: the fire and flame whereof was ſeen at Hieruſalem, 240. furlongs off. It had ſometime a Biſhops ſeat, ſaith Will. of Tyre; but there is no ſign of it at this time, that ſuch a place there was.

2 Mac. 12. de bel. ſacr.

After Jamnia is the City of Geth, or Gath, ſometime Anthedon, ſaith Volateran. And ſo Montanus ſeems to underſtand it. For he ſets it next to Egypt, of all the Philiſtim Cities, and in the place of Anthedon. But Volateran gives neither reaſon nor authority for his opinion; for Ptolomy ſets Anthedon far to the South of Joppe: and Geth was the firſt and not the laſt (beginning from the North) of all the great Cities of the Philiſtims: and about ſixteen miles from Joppe: where S. Hierome in his time found a great Village of the ſame name. It was ſometime the habitation and Seminary of the Anakims, ſtrong and Giant-like men, whom Joſua could not expel, nor the Danites after him, nor any of the Iſraelites, till Davids time: who ſlew Goliath, as his Captains did divers others not much inferiour in ſtrength and ſtature unto Goliath.

F. 244.

Hierom. in Michæam.

Roboam

Roboam the ſon of Solomon rebuilt Geth: Ozias the ſon of Amazia deſtroyed it again. It was alſo laid waſte by Azael King of Syria. Fulke the fourth King of Hieruſalem, built a Caſtle in the ſame place out of the old ruines. Whether this Geth was the ſame that Will. of Tyre in the Holy war calls Ibilin, I much doubt: the errour growing by taking Geth for Anthedon.

Lib 21. c. 18.

Not far from Geth or Gath ſtandeth Beth-ſemes, or the houſe of the Sun. In the fields adjoyning to this City (as is thought) was the Ark of God brought by a yoak of two Kine, turned looſe by the Philiſtims: and the Bethſemites preſuming to look therein, there were ſlain of the Elders ſeventy, and of the people fifty thouſand, by the ordinance of God. After which ſlaughter, and the great lamentation of the people, it was called the great * Abel, ſaith S. Hierome. Benedictus Theologus findes three other Cities of this name; one in (a) Nephtalim: another in Juda: and another in Iſſachar. Hierome findes a fifth in Benjamin.

1 Sam. 6. 18.

* Or rather not the City it ſelf, but the great ſtone in the field upon which ſtone the Philiſtims ſet the Ark, the change being eaſie from Eben, or Aben, which ſignifieth a ſtone, to Abel which ſignifieth mourning.

Keeping the Sea-coaſt, the ſtrong City of Accaron offereth it ſelf, ſometime one of the five Satrapies, or Governments of the Philiſtims. S. Hierome makes it the ſame with Cæſariæ Paleſtinæ. Pliny confounds it with Apollonia: It was one of thoſe that defended it ſelf againſt the Danites and Idumæans. It worſhipped Beel-zebub, the god of Hornets or Flies. To which Idol it was that Ahaziah King of Iſrael ſent to enquire of his health: whoſe meſſengers Eliah meeting by the way, cauſed them to return with a ſorrowful anſwer to their Maſter. This City is remembred in many places of Scripture.

Chriſtianus Schrot placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron or Ekron. This Azotus or Aſdod, was alſo an habitation of the Anakims, whom Joſua (b) failed to deſtroy, though he once poſſeſt their City. Herein ſtood a ſumptuous Temple, dedicated to the (c) Idol Dagon: the ſame Idol whith fell twice to the ground of it ſelf, after the Ark of God was by the Philiſtims carried into their Temple: and in the ſecond fall, it was utterly broken and defaced. Neer it was that famous (d) Judas Macchabæus ſlain by Bacchides and Alcimus the Lievtenants of Demetrius. Afterward it was taken by Jonathas: and the reſt of the Citizens being put to the ſword, all that fled into the Temple of Dagon, were with their Idol therein conſumed with fire: neer which alſo he overthrew Apollonius.

but was beſieged by Pſammetichus, the father of Pharao Necho for 29. yeers together, whence Jer. 25. 20. ſpeaks of the reſidue of Aſdod, to wit, the greateſt part having periſhed in this ſiege.

Gabinius the Roman rebuilt it. It had a Biſhops ſeat while Chriſtianity flouriſhed in thoſe parts. But in S. Hieroms time it was yet a fair Village. And this was the laſt of the Sea-Towns within the Tribe of Dan.

The Cities which are within the Land Eaſtward from Azotus, and beyond the Fountain of Æthiopia, wherein Philip the Apoſtle baptized the Eunuch, are Iſorah, or Sarxa, and Eſthaol, and between them Caſtra Danis neer Hebron: though this place where Sampſon was born, may ſeem by the words, Judg. 18. 12. to be in the Tribe of Judah, as the other alſo were bordering Towns between Dan and Juda.

After theſe within the bounds of Juda, but belonging to the Danites, they find Gedor, or as it is 1 Mac. 15. Cedron, which Cendebæus the Lievtenant of Antiochus fortified againſt the Jews, and neer which himſelf was by the Macchabees overthrown.

There are beſides theſe the City of Cariathiarim, that is, the City of the woods: ſeated in the border of Juda, Benjamin, and Dan, wherein the Ark of God remained twenty yeers in the houſe of Aminadab: till ſuch time as David carried it thence to Hieruſalem. Of this place (as they ſay) was Zacharias the ſon of Barachias, or Jehoiada, who was ſlain between the Temple and the Altar: alſo Urias, whom Joachim King of Hieruſalem ſlaughtered, as we find in Jeremy. Many other places which they place in this Tribe, rather, as I take it, upon preſumption than warrant, I omit: as that of Caſpin taken with great ſlaughter by Judas Macchabæus: and Lechis, whoſe King was ſlain by Joſua, in which alſo Amaziah was ſlain: The ſame which Senacherib took, Ezekias reigning in Juda.

Of other Cities belonging to this Tribe, ſee in Joſua c. 19. from the ver. 41. where alſo it is added, that the Danites portion was too little for their number of Families: and therefore that they invaded Leſhem, and inhabited it: which City, after amplified by Philip, the brother of Herod Antipas, was called Cæſarea Philippi, as before, and made the Metropolis of Ituræa, and Trachonitis: of which coaſts this Philip was Tetrach: but of this City ſee more in Nephtalim. In this Tribe there are no Mountains of fame.

It hath two Rivers or Torrents: the Norther-moſt riſeth out of the Mountains of Juda: and paſſing by Modin, falleth into the Sea by Sachrona. The other hath the name

§. II.
THE TRIBE OF SIMEON.

THe Tribe of Simeon takes up the rest of the Sea-coast of Canaan, to the border of Egypt: who being the second son of Jacob by Lea, there were increased of that Family while they abode in Egypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 59300. able men, all which ending their lives in the Desarts, there entred the Land of Promise of their issues 22200. bearing arms, who were *in part mixed with Juda, and in part severed, inhabiting a small Territory on the Sea-coast, belonging to Edumæa, of which the first City adjoyning to Dan, was Ascalon.

* And therefore no marvel that divers places named Jos. 15. in the large portion of Juda, be reckoned in this Tribe: see Jos. 19. v. 1. and 9. where thus much is expressly noted Vola. Geog. l. 111. f. 244.

The Reguli, or petty Kings thereof, were called Ascalonitæ: of which Volatteran out of Xanthus, in the History of the Lydians, reports, that Tantalus and Ascalus were the sons of Hymenæus: and that Ascalus being imployed by Aciamus King of the Lydians, with an Army in Syria, falling in love with a young Woman of that Country, built this City, and called it after his own name: The same hath Nicolaus in his History, saith Volatteran.

Diodorus Siculus in his third Book remembreth a Lake neer Ascaion, wherein there hath been a Temple dedicated to Derceto, the Goddess of the Syrians; having the face of a Woman, and the body of a Fish: who, as I have said before in the story of Ninus, was the mother of Semiramis, feigned to be cast into this Lake, and fed and relieved by Doves. And therefore was the Dove worshipped both in Babylonia and Syria, of which Tibullus the Poet:

Alba Palæstino sancta Columba Syro.

The white Dove is for holy held in Syria Palestine.

Vol. ut supra.

It was one of the chiefest and strongest Cities of the Philistims. It bred many learned men (saith Volatteran, as Antiachus, Sosus, Cygnus, Dorotheus the Historian, and Artemidorus, who wrote the story of Bithynia.

In Ascalon, as some say, was that wicked Herod born, that seeking after our Saviour, caused all the Male-children of two years old and under to be slain. In the Christian times it had a Bishop, and after that, when it was by the Saladine defaced, Richard King of England, while he made war in the Holy Land, gave it a new Wall and many buildings. Ejus murus cum Saladinus diruisset, Richardus Anglorum Rex instauravit, saith Adrichomæus.

Adrich. in Trib. Simeon.

In Davids time it was one of the most renowned Cities of the Philistims: for he nameth Gath and Ascalon onely, when he lamenteth the death of Saul and Jonathan: not speaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it not in the streets of Ascalon: It is now called Scalone. Gabinius restored it as he did Azotus and Gaza.

2 Sam. 1.

Next to Ascalon stood Gaza, or Gazera, which the Hebrews call Hazza, the Syrians, Azan, of Azonus (as they say) the son of Hercules. Other profane writers affirm, that it was built by Jupiter. Pomp. Mela gives the building thereof to Cambyses the Persian; because belike he re-built it, and Gaza in the Persian tongue is as much to say, as Treasure. This Gaza was the first of the five Satrapies of the Philistims, and the South bound of the land of Canaan towards Egypt. But this City was far more ancient than Cambyses, as it is proved by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb: but the strength of the Anakims put him from it. At such time as Alexander Macedon invaded the Empire of Persia, it received a Garrison for Darius: in despight whereof it was by the Macedonians after a long siege demolished, and was called Gaza of the Desart.

Alexander Janeus King of the Jews surprised it, and slew five hundred Senators in the Temple of Apollo, which fled thither for Sanctuary: but this Gaza was not set up in the same place again, to wit, on the foundations which Alexander Macedon had overturned, but somewhat neerer the Sea side: though the other was but two mile off. It was a Town of great account in the time of the Machabees, and gave many wounds to the Jews, till it was forst by Simon: of which he made so great account, as that he purposed to reside therein himself, and in his absence left John his Son and Successour to be Governour. In Brochard his time it was still a goodly City, and known by the name of Gazara.

At the very out-let of the River of Besor, standeth Majoma the Port of Gaza: to which the priviledge of a City was given by the great Constantine, and the place called Constance, after the name of the Emperours Son. But Julian the Apostata soon after favouring the Gazeans, made it subject unto them, and commanded it to be called Gaza maritima.

Then Raphia, where Philopater overthrew the great Antiochus: and beyond it Rhinocura, whose Torrent is known in the Scriptures by the name of * the Torrent of Egypt, till the Septuagint converted it Rinocura: to difference it, *Es.*27. 12. giving the name of the City to the Torrent that watereth it. Pliny calls it Rhinocolura: and Josephus Rhinocorura: (a) Epiphanius reports it as a Tradition, that at this place the world was divided by lot, between the three Sons of Noah.

Jos 13. ant 19, 21. 14, &c. * Junius calls it Vallis Egypti, the name of the stream seems to be Sichor. See in Asser, c. 7. sect. 3. ll 8. in the margent.

Within the Land, and upon the River of Besor they place Gerar: which the Scripture placeth between Kadesh and Shur, *Gen.*20.1. That it was neer to the Wilderness of Beersheba, it appears Gen. 20.31. and therefore no marvel that as elsewhere Beer-sheba, so sometime Gerar, be made the South bound of Canaan. It was of old a distinct Kingdom from the Philistim Satrapies: the Kings by one common name were called Abimelechs; S. Hierome saith that afterwards it was called Regio salutaris, the healthy Country: so that it was no marvel that Abraham and Isaac lived much in those parts. Of King Asa's conquest of the Cities about Gerar, see 2 *Chron.*14.14.

1 *Sam.*30. More within the Land was Siceleg, or Tsiglak, which was burnt by the Amalekites, when David in his flying from Saul to the Philistims had left his carriages there, but David followed them over the River of Besor, and put them to the slaughter, and recovered the prey.

*Josep.*10, 11, 12. Next Dabir sometime Cariath-Sepher, a City of Letters, the University, as they say, or Academy of old Palæstine. In Saint Hierom's time, it seems, it had the name of Daema: *Jos.*15.49. it is called Urbs Sannæ: from the name, as it seems, of some of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Urbs Arbahi. For even hence also were these Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Othoniel, incouraged by Caleb's promise of his Daughter in marriage: but that Josua and the Hoast of Israel were at the surprise, it appears *Jos.*10. 39. This City Jos 21.15. is named among those which out of Simeon and Juda were given to the Levites. And hence it seems they attribute it to this Tribe.

Jos 11.21.

Besides these, there are many others in the Tribe of Simeon, but of less fame, as Hajin, of which *Jos.*19.7. which also *Jos.*21.16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Levites, given out of the portion of Juda and Simeon, (for which Junius thinks Hasham is named 1 *Chron.*6.59. though * in the place of Josua these two are distinguished) also Tholad, so named 1 *Chro.*4.29 for which *Jos.*19.4. we have Eltholad. Chatzar-Susa, so named, *Jos.*19.5. for which *Jos.*15. we have Chatzar-Gadda, both names agreeing in signification: for Gadda is Turma, and Susa Equitatus.

* And also 1 Chron. 4. 31.

In the same places of Josua and of the Chronicles, Chorma is named, which they think to be the same with that of which *Num.*14.45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites pursued the Israelites: But that Chorma cannot be in Simeon, nor within the Mountains of Edumæa. For Israel fled not that way: but back again to the Camp, which lay to the South of Edumæa, in the Desart. *Deut.*1.

The same places also name Beersheba in this Tribe: so called of the Oath between Abraham and Abimelec: neer unto which Hagar wandered with her son Ismael. It was also called the City of Isaac, because he dwelt long there. While the Christians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to strengthen this place, standing on the border of the Arabian Desart, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin. The other Cities of Simeon which are named in the places of Josua, and of the Chronicles above noted, because they help us nothing in story, I omit them. In the time of Ezekia King of Juda, certain of this Tribe being strengthened in his own Territories, passed to * Gedor, as it is 1 Chron. 4. 39. (the same place which *Jos.*15.36. is called Gedera and Gederothaima) which at that time was inhabited by the issue of Cham: where they seated themselves: as also five hundred others of this Tribe, destroyed the Reliques of Amalec in the Mountains of Edom, and dwelt in their places. *Gen.*21.31

* As it seems in the Land of Juda. See in the first Paragraph of this Chapter in the Cities of Dan.

The Mountains within this Tribe are few, and that of Sampson the chiefest: unto which he carried the Gate-post of Gaza. The Rivers are, Besor, and the Torrent of Egypt, called Shichar, as is noted in Asser. Jud 16.3

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF JUDA.

OF Juda, the fourth son of Jacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Egypt 74600. all which (Caleb excepted) perished in the Desarts. And of their sons there entred the Land of Canaan 76500. bearing arms. Agreeable to the greatness of this number was the greatest Territory given, called afterward Judæa: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simeon included. And many Cities named in those those Tribes, did first, as they say, belong unto the Children of Juda: who had a kind of Soveraignty over them: as Succoth, Cartathiarim, Lachis, Bethsemes, Tsiglag, Beersheba, and others. The multitude of people within this small Province (if it be meted by that ground given to this Tribe only) were incredible, if the witnesse of the Scriptures had not warranted the report. For when David numbred the people, they were found five hundred thousand fighting men.

The Cities of Juda were many. But I will remember the chiefest of them: beginning with Arad, or Horma, which standeth in the entrance of Judæa from Idumæa: whose King first surprized the Israelites as they passed by the border of Canaan towards Moab, and took from them some spoyls, and many prisoners: who being afterward overthrown by the Israelites, the sons of Keni, the Kinsmen of Moses, obtained a possession in that Territory: who before the coming of the Israelites, dwelt between Madian and Amalek.

Num 21.3. Jos. 11.14. Jud. 1.16.

Num. 34.4. Deut. 8.15.

Following this Frontier towards Idumæa and the South, Ascensus Scorpionis, or Acrabbim is placed: the next to Arad: so called because of Scorpions, which are said to be in that place: from which name of Acrabbim, Hierome thinks that the name of the Toparchie, called Acrabathena, was denominated: of which we have spoken in Manasses. On the South side also of Judæa they place the Cities of Jagur, Dimona, Adada, Cedes, Asna, Jethnam, and Assor, or Chatsor, most of them Frontier Towns.

And then Ziph: of which there are two places so called: one besides this in the body of Juda, of which the Desart and Forrest adjoyning took name: where David hid himself from Saul. After these are the Cities of Esron, Adar, Karkah, and Ascemona, or Hatsmon, of no great fame.

Turning now from Idumæa towards the North, we find the Cities of Danna, Shemah, Amam, the other Asor, or Chatsor, Behaloth, and the two Sochoes: of all which see Jos. 15. also Carioth, by Jos. 15.25. called Kerioth: whence Judas the Traitor was called Is-carioth, as it were a man of Carioth. Then Hetham, the abode of Sampson, which Rehoboam re-edified. Beyond these, towards the North border, and towards Elutheropolis, is the City of Jethar, or Jathir, belonging to the Levites. In Saint Hierom's time it was called Jethira: and inhabited altogether with Christians: neer unto this City was that remarkable battel fought between Asa King of Juda, and Zara King of the Arabians, who brought into the field a Million of fighting men: and was notwithstanding beaten and put to flight: Asa following the victory as far as Gerar, which at the same time he recovered.

Jud. 15.8. 1 Chro. 11.6 Jun. out of the 1 Chro. 4.31 notes that this Hetham, though it were within the bounds of Juda, belonged to Simeon. Jos. 15.48. Hieron. in loc. Hebr.

Not far from Jether standeth Jarmuth, whose King was slain by Josua, and the City overturned. Next unto it is Maresa the Native City of the Prophet Michæa: between it and Odolla, Judas Macchabæus overthrew Gorgias, and sent thence ten thousand Dragmas of silver to be offered for sacrifice.

2 Macc. 12. 35.

Odolla, or Hadullam it self, was an ancient and magnificent City, taken by Josua, and the King thereof slain. Jonathan Macchabæus beautified it greatly. Then Ceila, or Keila, afterward Echela, where David sometime hid himself: and which afterward he delivered from the assaults of the Philistims: neer which the Prophet Abacuc was buried: whose monument remained, and was seen by S. Hierome.

Gen 38. 1. Jos. 12. 15. 1 Sam. 23.1

Neer it is Hebron, sometime called the City of Arbah, for which the Vulgar hath Coriatharbe: the reason of this name they give, as if it signified the City of four: because the four Patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were therein buried, but of Adam it is but supposed: and it is plain by the places, Jos. 14. 14. and 15. 13. and 20. 11. that Arbah here doth not signifie four, but that it was the name of the Father of the Giants, called Anakim, whose son as it seems Anak was: and Achiman, Sheshai, and Talmai, (whom Caleb expelled, Jos. 15.) were the sons of Anak, Num. 13.23. The name of Anak signifieth Torquem, a chain worn for ornament; and it seems that this Anak, inriched by the spoils which himself and his father got, wore a chain of gold, and so got this name: and leaving the custome to his posterity, left also the name: so that in Latine the name of Anakim may not amiss be expounded by Torquati.

The City Hebron was one of the ancientest Cities of Canaan, built seven yeers before Tsoan, or Tanis, in Egypt: and it was the head and chief City of the Anakims, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part given, to wit, the Villages adjoyning, and the rest to the Levites. It had a Bishop in the Christian times, and a magnificent Temple built by Helen the mother of Constantine.

Not far hence they find Eleutheropolis, or the free City, remembred often by Saint Hierome. Then Eglon, whose King Dabir associated with the other four Kings of the Amorites, to wit, of Hierusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, and Lachis, besieging the Gibeonites, were by Josua utterly overthrown. From hence the next City of fame was Emaus, afterward Nicopolis, one of the Cities of Government or Præſidencies of Judæa. In ſight of this City, Judas Macchabæus (after he had formerly beaten both Apollonius and Seron) gave a third overthrow to Gorgias, Lievtenant to Antiochus.

Joſ 10 11. Macc. 1. 3. Euſeb. in Chron Broch. Iſtin. 6. In the yeer 1301. it was overturned by an earthquake, ſaith Euſebius. In the Chriſtian times it had a Biſhops ſeat of the Dioceſs of Cæſarea of Paleſtine.

From Emaus toward the Weſt Sea, there are the Cities of Nahama, Bethdagon, and Gader, or Gedera, or Gederothaima, of which, and of Gederoth, * Joſ. 15. 36. and 41. Then Azecha, to which Joſua followed the ſlaughter of the five Kings before named, a City of great ſtrength in the Valley of (a) Terebinth, or Turpentine, as the Vulgar readeth, 1 Sam. 17. 2. whence (as it ſeems) they ſeat it neer unto Soco, and unto Lebna of the Levites. It revolted from the ſubjection of the Jews while Joram the ſon of Joſaphat ruled in Hieruſalem: And next unto this ſtandeth Maceda, which Joſua utterly diſ-peopled.

* Alſo 1 Chro. 4. 39. as is above remembred in the Trite of Simron. (a) Junius, for in Valle Terebinthi, hath in Valle querceti. Vatablus keeps the Hebrew, reading in Valle Elah.

On the other ſide of Emaus towards the Eaſt ſtandeth Bethſur, otherwiſe Bethſora, and Bethſor: one of the ſtrongeſt and moſt ſought for places in all Juda. It is ſeated on a high Hill; and therefore called Bethſur (the houſe on the Rock, or of ſtrength.) It was fortified by Roboam, and afterward by Judas Macchabæus. Lyſias forc't it: and Antiochus Eutapor by famine, Jonathas regained it: and it was by Simon exceedingly fortified againſt the Syrian Kings.

Joſ 15. ant. 9. Macc. 1. 6.

Gen. 35 48 Bethleem is the next unto it within ſix miles of Hieruſalem, otherwiſe Lehem: ſometime Ephrata; which name, they ſay, it had of Calebs wife, when as it is ſo called by Moſes before Caleb was famous in thoſe parts, Gen. 38. 16. Of this City was Abeſſan, or Ibſan Judge of Iſrael after Jephtah, famous for the thirty ſons and thirty daughters begotten by him. Elimelec was alſo a Bethlemite, who with his wife Naomi ſojourned in Moab during the famine of Juda in the time of the Judges, with whom Ruth the daughter-in-law of Naomi returned to Bethleem: and married Booz, of whom Obed, of whom Iſſai, of whom David. It had alſo the honour to be the native City of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt; and therefore ſhall the memory thereof never end.

From Bethleem ſome four or five mile ſtandeth Thecua, the City of Amos the Prophet: and to this place adjoyning is the City of Bethzacaria, in the way between Bethſura and Hieruſalem: on whoſe Hils adjoyning, the glorious guilt ſhields of Antiochus ſhined like lamps of fire in the eyes of the Jews. The City of * Bezek was alſo neer unto Bethleem, which Adoni-Bezec commanded; who had during his reign tortur'd 70. Kings, by cutting off the joynts of their Fingers and Toes; and made them gather bread under his Table: but at length the ſame end befell himſelf by the ſons of Juda, after they had taken him priſoner.

The reſt of the Cities in this part (moſt of them of no great eſtimation) we may paſs by, until we come to the magnificent Caſtle of Herodium, which Herod erected on a Hill, mounting thereunto with 200. Marble ſteps, exceeding beautiful and ſtrong. And towards the Dead Sea, and adjoyning to the Deſart of Jeruel, between it and Tekoa, is that Clivaus floridus, where, in the time of Jehoſaphat, the Jews ſtood and lookt on the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, maſſacring one another, when they had purpoſed to joyn againſt Juda: neer which place is the Valley of bleſſing, where the Jews the fourth day after, ſolemnly came and bleſſed God for ſo ſtrange a deliverance.

Joſ. 14. ant. 22. 2 Chro 20. 16 & 26.

Now the Cities of Juda which border the Dead Sea, are theſe; Aduran beautified by Roboam: and Tſohar, which the Vulgar calleth * Segor: ſo called, becauſe Lot in his prayer for it, urged that it was but a little one: whence it was called Tſohar, which ſignifieth a little one: when as the old name was Belah, as it is Gen. 14. 2. In the Romans time it had a Garriſon, and was called (as they ſay) Pannier: in Hierom's time, Balexona. Then Engaddi, or Hen-gaddi, firſt Aſaſonthamar: neer unto which are the Gardens of Balſamum, the beſt that the world had called Opobalſamum: the moſt part of all which Trees Cleopatra Queen of Egypt ſent for out of Judæa, and Herod, who either feared or loved Anthony her Husband, cauſed them to be rooted up, and preſented unto her: which ſhe re-planted neer Heliopolis in Egypt. This City was firſt taken by Chedorlaomer, and the Amorites thence expelled. It was one of the moſt remarkable Cities of Judæa; and one of the Preſidencies thereof.

2 Chro. 11. * Some call it Baſeliſa and Vitula conſternans. See in Gad, c. 10. ſect. 5. poſt principium in Haroher, Gen. 19. 20 Hieron. in Oſe. Hebr. Chaſaſonthamar. 2 Chro. 20. 2. Gen. 14. 7.

The reſt of the Cities are many in the Inland, and among them Jeſrael: not that which was the City of Naboth, of which already; but another of the ſame name, the City of Achinoan, the wife of David, the mother of that Ammon whom Abſalom ſlew: alſo, as ſome think, the City of Amaſa, Abſaloms Lievtenant, and the Commander of his Army. But this ſeemeth to be an errour grounded upon the neerneſs of the words Iſrael and Jeſrael: and becauſe the 2 Sam. 17. 25.

25. Amasa's father is called an Israelite, who in the first of the Chron. 2. 17. is called an Ismaelite: indeed the Hebrew Orthography sheweth that Amasa's father is not said to be of the City Jesrael, but an Israelite in Religion, though otherwise an Ismaelite.

In this Tribe there were many high Hils and Mountains: as those of Engaddi upon the Dead Sea: and the Mountains of Juda, which begin to rise by Emaus, and end neer Taphna, and these part Juda from Dan and Simeon. Of others which stand single, there is that of Hebron, at the foot whereof was that Oak of Mamre, where the three Angels appeared to Abraham; which Saint Hierome calleth a Fir-tree, and saith, That it stood till the time of Constantine the younger. There is also that Mountain called Collis Achillæ, on the South of Ziph: on the top whereof the great Herod, incloſing the old Castle, erected by Jonathan Macchabæus, and called Massada, garnished it with twenty seven high and strong Towers: and therein left Armour and Furniture for an hundred thousand men; being, as it seemeth a place unaccessable, and of incomparable strength.

Hierom. in loc. Heb. & quæst Hebr. Jos. 14. Ant. c. 20.

In the Valley afterward called the Dead Sea, or the Lake Asphaltitis, this Country had four Cities, Adama, Sodom, Seboim, and Gomorra, destroyed with fire from Heaven for their unnatural sins.

§. IV.
THE TRIBE OF REUBEN, and his Borderers.

¶. I.
The seats and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites wan from Sehon King of Hesbon.

ON the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Jacobs sons inhabited: of whose children there were numbred at Mount Sinai 46000. who dying with the rest in the Desarts, there remained to possess the Land promised 43700. bearing arms. But before we speak of these, or the rest that inhabited the East side of Jordan, something of their borderers: to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose Land in our Writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first we are to remember, that out of Abraham's kindred came mighty Families: as by Isaac and Jacob the Nation called Israel, and afterward Jews: by Esau, or Edom, the Idumæans: by Ismael, the eldest Son of Abraham, the Ismaelites: and by Ketura, his last wife, the Midianites. And again, by Lot, Abraham's brothers son, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites and Ammonites: all which being but strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly possest by the Canaanites; and by the Families of them descended) these issues and alliance of Abraham, all but Jacob, whose children were bred in Egypt, inhabited the frontier places adjoyning.

Esau and his sons held Idumæa, which bounded Canaan on the South, Ismael took from the South-east part of the Dead Sea; stretching his possession over all Arabia Petræa, and a part of Arabia the Desart, as far as the River of Tygris, from Sur to Havilah.

Moab took the rest of the coast of the Dead Sea, leaving a part to Midian, and passing over Arnon, inhabited the Plains between Jordan and the Hils of Abarim, or Arnon, as far North as Essebon, or Chesbon.

Ammon sate down on the North-east side of Arnon, and possest the Tract from Rabba, afterward Philadelphia, both within the Mountains of Gilhead, and without them as far forth as Aroer, though in Moses time he had nothing left him in all that Valley: for the Amorites had thrust him over the River of Jaboc, as they had done Moab over Arnon. As these Nations compassed sundry parts of Canaan, so the border between the River of Jaboc and Damascus, was held by the Amorites themselves, with other mixt Nations: all which Territory on the East side of Jordan, and on the East side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasse; whereof that part which Moab had, was first possest by the Emims, a Nation of Giants weakned and broken by Chedorlaomer, after repulsed by the Moabites, as before remembred. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territory and ancient possession of the Zamzummims, or Zutæi, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedorlaomer, Amraphel, and the rest: and by them an easie way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Jos. 13. Num. 21. 24. Gen. 14.

Now where it is written, that Arnon was the border of Moab, the same is to be understood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sehon or his Ancestor beaten the Moabites out of the plain Countries, between Abarim and Jordan, and driven them from Hesbon over Arnon; and this hapned not long before Moses arrival upon that border, when Vaheb governed the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab when Moses past Arnon, was not the son of Vaheb, but his name was Balac, the son of Zippor. And it may may be that those Kings were elective, as the Edumæans anciently were.

Now, all that part of Moab, between Arnon and Jordan, as far North as Esebon, was inhabited by Reuben. And when Israel arrived there out of Egypt, it was in the possession of Sehon, of the race of Canaan by Amorews: and therefore did Jephtah the Judge of Israel justly defend the regaining of those Countries against the claim of the Ammonites: because (as he alledged) Moses found them in the possession of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab, or Ammon: who (saith Jephtah) had 300. years time to recover them, and did not: whence he inferreth, that they ought not to claim them now. Judg. 11.

And lest any should marvel why the Ammonites in Jephtahs time should make claim to these Countries: whereas Moses in the place Num. 21.*v.*26. rather accounts them to have been the ancient possession of the Moabites, than of the Ammonites: it is to be noted, that Deut. 3. 11. when it is said that the Iron bed of Og was to be seen at Rabbath, the chief City of the Ammonites, it is also signified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Israelites possessed, was by him or his Ancestors got from the Ammonites, as much of Sehons was from the Moabites.

Jos 13.25. Junius notes that the one half of the land of Hammon, which in this place of Josua is said to have been given to the Gadites, was taken first from the Ammonites by Sehon: but the place, Deut. 2.11. proves that as well Og, as Sehon had gotten lands out of the hands of the Ammonites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were seated so confusedly together, that it was hard to distinguish them; so also were the sons of Moab and Ammon, Madian, Amalec, and Ismael. Yet the reason seemeth plain enough why Ammon commanded in chief, in Jephtah's time; for sometime the one Nation, sometime the other of all those borderers acquired the Soveraignty: and again, that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely, within the Mountains of Galaad, or Gilehad, and as far South as Aroer, belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking advantage of the time, they then sought how to recover it again. Yet at such time as Moses overthrew Sehon at Jahaz, the Ammonites had lost to the Amorites all that part of their possession which lay about Aroer, and between it and Jaboc: Sehon and Og, two Kings of the Amorites, having displanted both Moab and Ammon of all within the Mountains. For it is written in Numb. 21.24. that Israel conquered the Land of Sehon from Arnon unto Jaboc, even unto the children of Ammon: so as at this time the River of Jaboc was the South bound of Ammon within the Mountains, when as anciently they had also possessions over Jaboc, which at length the Gadites possest, as in the thirteenth Chapter of Josua, verse twenty five, it appears.

¶. II.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

THE chief Cities belonging to Reuben were these, Kedemoth, for which the Vulgar, without any shew of warrant, readeth Jethson. The Vulgar or Hierome followed the Septuagint, those two Verses, 36. and 37. in Jos. 22. being wanting in the old Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint read Kedson for Kedmoth, which Kedson by writing slipt into Jethson. Jos 21.37.

This City which they gave to the Levites, imparts her name to the Desart adjoyning: from whence Moses sent his Embassage to Sehon. In the same place of Josua, where this Kedemoth is mentioned, the Vulgar for Betser & villa ejus, reads Bosor in solitudine Misor, without any ground from the Hebrew: whence Adrichomius makes a Town called Misor, in the border between Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemoth, near the Dead Sea (for the Country between being Mountainous, hath few Cities) they place two Towns of note, Lasa or Leshash, of which Genesis 10.*ver.*19. The Greeks call it Callirhoe: near which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and sweet water; all which soon after their rising, being joyned in one stream, do make a very wholsome Bath, especially for all contraction of sinews: to which Herod the elder, when he was desperate of all other help, repaired, but in vain. Others say, that these Springs arise out of the Hills of Machærus, in this Tribe. The like fountains are found in the Pyrenyes, and in Peru, called the Baths of the Inga's, or Kings. The other Town is Machærus, the next between Lasa and Jordan: of all that part of the world the strongest In-land City and Castle, standing upon a Mountain every way unaccessible. It was first fortified by Alexander Jannæus, who made it a frontier against the Arabians: but it was demolished by Gabinius in the war with Aristobulus, saith Josephus. It was thither (saith Josephus) that Herod sent John Baptist, and wherein he was slain: his Army soon after being utterly overthrown by Aretas King of Arabia, and himself after this murther never prospering. Not far from Machærus was Bosor, or Bozra, a town of refuge, and belonging to the Levites, and near it Livias upon Jordan, which Herod built in honour of Livia, the mother of Tiberius Cæsar.

Deut. 2.16. It was a marginal note out Deut. 3. where the Sept. kept the word Misor, signifying a plain, which after crept into the Text. Jos. 17.ant. c. 9. & *Hieron. in quæst. To the North of Livias is Setim, or Sittim: where the children of Israel imbraced the daughters of Midian, or Moab: and where Phineas Num. 25.1.

Phineas pierced the body of Zimri and Cosbi with his spear, bringing due vengeance upon them when they were in the midst of their sin; and from hence Josua sent the discoverers to view Jericho, staying here until he went over Jordan. As for the Torrent Setim, which in this place Adrichomius dreams of, reading Joel 3. 18. irrigabit torrentem Setim: The Vulgar hath torrentem spinarum: and Junius, vallem Cedrorum: expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan: but for the Church, in which the just being placed, grow as the cedars, Psal. 92. 13.

Jos. 13. 1.

The plain Country hereabout, by Moses called, The plains of Moab, where he expounded the book of Deuteronomy to the people a little before his death, is in the beginning of the same book precisely bounded by Moses. On the South it had the great Desart of Paran, where they had long wandred. On the East it had Chatseroth, and Dizahab (of which two, the former is that Gazorus, of which Ptolomy in Palestina: the later was a Tract belonging to the Nabathæi in Arabia Petræa, where was * Mezahab, of which, Gen. 36. 39.) by the Geographers called Medava, and Medaba. On the West it had Jordan, and on the North it had Laban (in Junius edition, by the fault of the Print, Lamban, Deut. 1. 1.) the same which the Geographers call Libias: and some confound it with Livias, of which even now we spake.

Deut. 34. 1.

* The same as it seems which Num. 21. 30. is called Medeba, whence we read of the plains of Medeba, Jos. 13. 9. 16. of which also we read in the wars of David against Hanun the Ammonite, 1 Chron. 19. 7. Also 1 Mac. 9. 36. Isa. 16. 2. See before ch. 5. sect. 7.

Also on the same North side towards the confines of Cœlosyria, it had Theophel: whereabout sometime Pella of Cœlosyria stood: which was in the Region of Decapolis; and, as Stephanus saith, was sometime called Butis. It is also noted in Moses to be over against or near unto Suph, for which the Vulgar hath the Red Sea, as also Num. 21. 14. it translateth the word Suphah in like manner: whereas in this place of Deuteronomy there is no addition of any word in the Hebrew to signifie the Sea: and yet the Scripture, when this word is so to be taken, useth the addition of Mara, thereby to distinguish it from the Region of Suph, or Suphah: which doubtless was about these plains of Moab towards the Dead Sea: where the Country being full of reeds, was therefore thus called: as also the Red Sea was called Mare Suph, for like reason.

The place in these large plains of Moab where Moses made those divine exhortations, some say was Bethabara, where John baptized, which in the story of Gideon is called Beth-bara. Josephus sayes it was where after the City Abila stood, near Jordan, in a place set with Palm-trees: which sure was the same as Abel-sittim in the plains of Moab, Num. 33. 49. (that some call Abel-sathaim, and Bel-sathim) which is reckoned by Moses in that place of Numbers for the 42. and last place of the Israelites incamping in the time of Moses: This place is also called Sittim: which word if we should interpret, we should rather bring it from Cedars than from Thorns, with Adrichomius and others. It was the wood of which the Ark of the Tabernacle was made.

Num. 15. 1. Exo. 25. 10

Toward the East of these plains of Moab, they place the Cities Nebo, Baal-Meon, Sibma, and Hesbon the chief City of Sehon, and Elhalel, and Kiriathaima the seat of the Giants Emim. Of the two first of these Moses seems to give a note that the names were to be changed, because they tasted of the Moabites * Idolatry. For Nebo (in stead of which, Junius, Esa. 46. 1. reads Deus vaticinus) was the name of their Idol-Oracle, and Baal-meon, is the habitation of Baal. Of the same Idol was the Hill Nebo in these parts denominated: from whose top, which the common Translators call Phasgah, Moses before his death saw all the land of Canaan beyond Jordan. In which story Junius doth not take Phasgah, or Pisgah for any proper name: but for an appellative, signifying a Hill: and so also Vatablus in some places, as Num. 21. 20. where he noteth, that some call Pisgah that top which looketh to Jericho, and Hair as it looketh to Moab, which opinion may be somewhat strengthened by the name of a City of Reuben, mentioned Jos. 13. 20. called Ashdoth-Pisga, which is as much as decursus Pisgæ: to wit, where the waters did run down from Pisga. In the same place of Josua there is also named Beth-Peor, as belonging to Reuben: so called from the Hill Peor: from whence also Baal the Idol was called Baal-Peor; which they say, was the same as Priapus: the chief place of whose worship seems to have been Bamoth-Baal, of which also Jos. 13. in the Cities of Reuben: for which, Num. 22. 41. they read, the high places of Baal (for so the word signifieth) to which place Balaak first brought Balaam to curse the Israelites.

||. III.

Of divers places bordering Reuben, belonging to Midian, Moab, or Edom.

THere were besides these, divers places of note over Arnon, which adjoyned to Reuben: amongst which they place Gallim, the City of Phalti: to whom Saul gave his daughter Michol from David: but Junius thinks this Town to be in Benjamin: gathering so much out of Esa. 10. 29. where it is named among the Cities of Benjamin. With better reason perhaps out of Num. 21. 19. we may say that Mathana and Nahaliel were in those confines of Reuben: through which places the Israelites past after they had left the Well, called Beer: Then Deblathaim, which the Prophet Hieremy threatneth with the rest of the Cities of Moab.

Hierem. 48

Madian also is found in these parts, the chief City of the Madianites in Moab: but not that Midian, or Madian by the Red Sea, wherein Jethro inhabited. For of the Madianites there were two Nations, of which these of Moab became Idolaters, and received an exceeding overthrow by a Regiment of twelve thousand Israelites, sent by Moses out of the Plains of Moab: at such time as Israel began to accompany their Daughters: their five Kings with Balaam the Soothsayer, were then slain, and their Regal City with the rest destroyed. The other Madianites, over whom Jethro was Prince or Priest, forgat not the God of Abraham their Ancestor; but relieved and assisted the Israelites in their painful travels through the Desarts: and were in all that passage their guides. In the South border of Moab adjoyning to Edom, and sometime reckoned as the chief City of Edom, there is that Petra, which in the Scriptures is called Selah, which is as much as rupes, or petra. It was also called Joctheel, as appears by the place, 2 Kings 14. It was built (saith Josephus) by Recem, one of those five Kings of the Madianites: slain as before is said: after whom it was called Recem. Now, they say, it is called Crac, and Mozera. The Soldans of Egypt, for the exceeding strength thereof, kept therein all their treasures of Egypt and Arabia: of which it is the first and strongest City: the same perhaps which Pliny and Strabo call Nabathea, whence also the Province adjoyning took name: which name seems to have been taken at first from Nabajoth, the son of Abraham by Kethura. For Nabathea is no where understood for all Arabia Petræa (at least where it is not mis-understood) but it is that Province which neighboureth Judæa. For Pharan inhabited by Ismael, whose people Ptolomy calleth Pharanites, in stead of Ismaelites, and all those Territories of the Cusites, Madianites, Amalekites, Hsmaelites, Edomites, or Idumæans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hus, Sin, and of Cg King of Basan, were parts of Arabia Petræa: though it be also true, that some part of Arabia the Desart belonged to the Amalekites, and Ismaelites: all which Nations the Scriptures in the first of Chronicles the fifth, calls Hagarens, of Hagar.

1 Chron. 5. 19 & 20.

This City Petra, Scaurus besieged with the Roman Army, and finding the place in shew impregnable, he was content, by the perswasion of Antipater, to take a composition of money, and to quit it. Yet Amasias King of Juda (after he had slaughtered ten thousand of the Arabians in the valley called Salinarum) wan also this City. S. Hierome findes Ruth the Moabite to be natural of this City. In the mean time, when the Christians held the Kingdom of Hierusalem, it had a Latine Bishop, having before been under the Greek Church. It is seated not far from Hor, where Aaron died, and on the other side towards the North is the River of Zared, or Zered, by which Moses encamped in the 38. station. Adrichomius describeth the waters of Memrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuben, not far hence, and between Zared and Arnon: and so he doth the Valley of Save: but the waters of Nimra, or Beth-Nimra (for which it seems Adrichomius writ Nemrim) refresh the plains of Moab: and the confluence of those waters of Nimra are in the Tribe of Gad. Save also cannot be found in this place, that is, to the South of Arnon, and under Midian. For after Abraham returned from the pursuit of the Assyrian and Persian Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Save, or Saveh, which is the Kings Dale, where Absolom set up his Monument, as it seems, not far from Hierusalem. And at the same time Melchisedec King of Salem also encountred him. But Abraham coming from the North, and Melchisedec inhabiting, either neer Bethsan, otherwise Scythopolis, in the half Tribe of Manasse, or in Hierusalem (both places lying to the West of Jordan) could not encounter each other in Arabia: and therefore Save, which was also called the Kings Dale, could not be in these parts.

||. IV.

Of the Dead Sea.

NOw because the Sea of Sodom, or the Dead Sea, called also the Lake of Asphaltitis, and the Salt sea (in distinction from the Sea of Tiberias, which was fresh water) also the sea of the Wilderness, or rather the sea * of the Plains, is often remembred in the Scriptures, and in this story also, therefore I think it not impertinent to speak somewhat thereof. For it is like unto the Caspian sea, which hath no out-let, or disburthening. The length of this Lake Josephus makes 180. furlongs (which make 22. miles and a half of ours) and about 150. in bredth, which make 18. of our miles, and somewhat more. Pliny makes makes it a great deal leſs: but thoſe that have of late years ſeen this ſea, did account it (ſaith a Weiſſenburg) eight Dutch miles (which is two and thirty of ours) in length: and two and a half of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lake or Sea, Tacitus maketh this report: Lacus eſt in immenſo ambitu, ſpecie maris, ſapore corruptior, gravitate odoris accolis peſtifer: neque vento impellitur, neque piſces aut ſuitas aquis volucres patitur, incertum unde ſuperjecta ut ſolido feruntur, periti, imperitique nandi perinde attolluntur, &c. That it is very great, and (as it were) a ſea of a corrupt taſte: of ſmell infectious, and peſtilent to the borderers: it is neither moved nor raiſed by the winde, nor indureth fiſh to live in it, or fowl to ſwim in it. Thoſe things that are caſt into it, and the unskilfull of ſwiming, as well as the skilfull, are born up by the water. At one time of the year caſteth it up Bitumen: the art of gathering which, Experience (the finder of other things) hath alſo taught. It is uſed in the trimming of ſhips, and the like buſineſſes.

(a) Deſcr. ter. Sanct.

And then of the Land, he ſpeaketh in this ſort: The fields not far from this Lake, which were ſometime fruitfull, and adorned with great Cities, were burnt with lightning; of which the ruines remain, the ground looking with a ſad face, as having loſt her fruitfulneſs; for whatſoever doth either grow, or is ſet thereon, be it fruits or flowers, when they come to ripeneſs, having nothing within them, but moulder into aſhes: Thus far Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that thoſe Pomegranates, and other Apples or Oranges, which do ſtill grow on the banks of this curſed Lake, do look fair, and are of good colour on the outſide, but being cut, have nothing but duſt within. Of the Bitumen which this Lake caſteth up, it was by the Greeks called Aſphaltitis. Veſpaſian deſirous to be ſatisfied of theſe reports, went of purpoſe to ſee this Lake, and cauſed certain Captives to be caſt into it, who were not onely unskilfull in ſwiming, but had their hands alſo bound behind them, yet notwithſtanding they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not ſink.

§. V.

Of the Kings of Moab, much of whoſe Countrey within Arnon Reuben poſſeſt.

OF the Kings of Moab, whoſe Countrey (within Arnon) Reuben poſſeſt (though not taken from Moab, but from Sehon the Amorite) few are known. Junius in the 21. of Num. v. 14. nameth Vaheb, which ſeems to be the Anceſtor or Predeceſſor of Balac, the ſon of Zippor: which Balac ſent for Balaam to curſe Iſrael. For fearing to contend with Moſes by arms, by the examples of Sehon, and Og, he hoped by the help of Balaams curſings or inchantments, to take from them all ſtrength and courage, and to caſt on them ſome peſtilent diſeaſes. And though Balaam at the firſt, moved by the ſpirit of God bleſt Iſrael, contrary to the hope and deſire of Moab: yet being deſirous in ſome ſort to ſatisfie him, and to do him ſervice, he adviſed Moab to ſend Madianitiſh women among the Iſraelites: hoping by them, as by fit inſtruments of miſchief, to draw them to the Idolatry of the Heathen, but in the end, he received the reward of his falling from God, and of his evil counſell, and was ſlain among the reſt of the Princes of Midian. Num 21. 21, 23, 24. Joſ 24.

After theſe times the Kings of the Moabites are not named: ſaving that we find in the firſt of Chronicles the fourth, that Jokim, and the men of Chozeba, and Joaſh, and Sareph, all being of the iſſue of Juda, ſometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the ſame Verſe, Theſe alſo are antient things: to wit, as ſome expound it, the particulars of theſe mens governments are no where extant or remaining, or as others, hæc prius fuere, theſe Families of Juda were once thus famous: but now their poſterity chooſe rather to abide in Babylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there. Ver. 22.

Then we find Eglon King of Moab, who with the help of Ammon and Amalec maſtered Iſrael, and commanded them 18 years: which Eglon, Ehud ſlew in his own houſe, and afterward 1000. of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had unto whom David fled fearing Saul, it doth not appear: or whether it were the ſame againſt whom Saul made war, it is not manifeſt, for neither are named. But in reſpect that this Moabite was an enemy to Saul, he received David, and relieved him; knowing that Saul ſought his life. Judges 3. 1 Sam 22. 1 Sam. 14.

After this, David himſelf entred the Region of Moab, but not likely in the ſame Kings time: for he ſlaughtered two parts of the people, and made the third part tributary: whereupon it was ſaid of David, Moab is my waſh-pot, over Edom will I caſt my ſhooe: meaning, that he would reduce them to ſuch an abjection, and appoint them for baſe ſervices: and that he would tread down the Idumæans. 2 Sam 8. 1 Chro. 18. Pſ 60. 10.

The next King after Davids time of the Moabites, whoſe name liveth, was Meſha, who falling from Juda, (perhaps in remembrance of the ſeverity of David) faſtened himſelf

2 Kings 3. to the Kings of Israel, and paid tribute to Ahab, 100000. Lambs, and 200000. Rams with the wooll: who revolting again from Israel after the death of Ahab, was invaded by Jehoram, with whom joyned the Kings of Juda and Idumæa: and being by these three Kings prest and broken, he fled to Kir-hareseth, as is elsewhere shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name; when that Nation, assisted by the Ammonites and Idumæans, invaded Jehoshaphat: and by reason of some private quarrels among themselves, the Moabites and Ammonites set upon the Idumæans, and slaughtered them: and then one against another, 2 Chro 20. so as Jehoshaphat had a notorious victory over them all, without either blood or wound. Also in the time of Hieremy the Prophet, there was a King of Moab which is not named, which was after Mesha of Moab many descents: for Mesha lived with Jehoram, and Hierem. 7. this Moabite in Zedekia's time, fourteen Kings of Juda coming between, who wasted three hundred and odd years.

§. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

THE Territory adjoyning to Reuben, is that of Gad: whereof all that part which joyned to the Mountains, was sometime in the possession of the Ammonites, as far to the South as Aroer. Of the children of Gen. 30. Gad, the seventh son of Jacob by Zelpha, the Num. 1. 31. hand-maid of Lea, there parted out of Egypt, Jos. 13. and died in the Desarts, 45550. and of their sons there entred the Land promised, 45000. bearng Arms: for the half Tribe of Manasse, the River of Jaboc divided them: from Reuben, the Cities of Hesbon, Elhele, and Aphec.

Esay 15. Deut. 2. The chief City of Gad was Aroer, which they make to be the same with Ar, or Rabbath Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Junius attending diligently to those words of Moses, Deut. 2.36. Ab Haroheto, quæ est in ripa fluminis Arnon, & civitate ipsa quæ est in flumine: Where the City in the River is distinguished from the City upon the bank of the River, as also in like manner, (Jos. c. 12. v. 2. and c. 13. 9.) thinketh that Haroher, which doubtless belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. 32.34. it is said that they built it) was indeed seated neer Har of the Moabites, but divers from it. For that Har was never possest by Moses, it is plain Deuteronomy 2. 9. where God forbidding Moses to touch it, saith he hath given Har for an inheritance to the sons of Lot. Now that this City, which in divers places is said to be within, and in the middle of the River of Arnon (and so distinguished from Haroher, which is said in the same places to be on the bank of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites, the same Junius proveth out of Numbers, ch. 21. v. 15. where Arnon is said to be divided into divers streams, where or among which Har is seated: And the same is confirmed by the place of Jos. 13. ver. 25. where Haroher is said to be seated before Rabbah: which Rabbah, as it seems, cannot be the Rabbah of the Ammonites (for they seat not Haroher neer it, nor in sight of it) and therefore by Rabbah here, we must understand Rabbah of Moab, which they make to be Ar, or Har: and so we must needs distinguish it from Haroher. And as for Har*, (which also gave the name to the coast adjoyning) it seems it continued in the possession of the Moabites, after they had once expelled the Giant-like people called Emims, first weakned by Chedorlaomer and his Associates: but Haroher by the enterchange of times suffered many ancient changes, as being won from the Moabites by Sehon, and from him by the Israelites, and from them, as it seems in the story of Jephta, by the Ammonites: and from the Ammonites again by the Israelites under the conduct of Jephta.

* Deut. 2. 9. Out of which place the words Num. 21. 28. are to be expounded not that the City of Hor, but the coast adjoyning was wasted by Sehon. Gen. 14. 5. Judg. 11. 35.

S. Hieroms time the greatest part of this City perished by an earth-quake, as also Zoar, in which Lot saved himself in the destruction of Sodom, seated not far hence; which, they say was therefore called Vitula consternans, because as a wanton tumbling heifer, she was thrice overthrown with earth-quakes: for which cause also Hierome seems to think that this Zoar was called Salissa, or Bal-Salissa, as if Baal had been a remainder of the old name Balah, or Belah, (of which Gen. 14. 2. and Salisha, which hath a signification of the ternary number, had alluded to the three earth-quakes.

Hier: in epitap. Paul. & in quæst. & loc. Hebr. see Junius his annotations upon 1 Sam. 9 2. where he makes Shalisha a plain countrey in Benjamin, and the same with Bal-shalisha, 2 Reg. 4. 42 where he expounds Bal, or Baal to be as much as planities.

Brochard takes Haroher to be Petra, but erroneously, as before it is noted; seeing that Petra was in the South border of Moab adjoyning to Edom, whereas Haroher is in the North-East border. Between Haroher and Jordan they seat Dibon, which is attributed to the Gadites, because they are said to have built it, Num. 32.34. though Jos. 13. v. 17. it is said that Moses gave it to the Reubenites. Of this City among the rest of Moab, both Esay and Hieremy prophesied, that it should perish, and the Lakes about it run with the blood of the Inhabitants. It was a great Village neer Arnon in S. Hierom's time.

Keeping the banks of Arnon, one of the next Cities of fame to Aroer, was Bethnimrah, of which Esay prophesied, That the wa- Esay 15.

For whereas he supposeth it to be the same with Nob, which Saul destroyed, of this we shall speak (a) in the Tribe of Benjamin. And as for that Karkor, where Zebah and Zalmunnah rested themselves in their flight from Gideon, to which place Gideon marched through this Nobach and Jogbeha, though some place it in Gad, and make it the same with Kir-chares, of which Esay 15. and 2 Reg. 3. 25. yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the same with Kir-chares, it is certain, that it was still a principal City held by the Moabites, and not in the Tribe of Gad.

Esay 15. 21 Judg 8. 11.

Num. 32. 35.

* Num. 21. 30. It is called Nophah, and placed in the border of the Kingdom of Sehon towards Basan, and therefore it is not altogether unprobable that it was in Gad.

(a) Chap. 12 sect. 1.

Judg. 8. 10 Num. 32. 34,35.

In the body of this Tribe of Gad they place Hataroth: of which name the Scripture witnesseth that two Cities were builded by the Gadites; the former simply called Hataroth, the later Hatroth-Sophan: for which later the vulgar makes two Cities, Roth and Shophan: the name Hataroth, is as much as Coronæ.

In the Valley of the Kingdom of Sehon, together with Bethnimra of which we have spoken, Jos. 13.27. nameth Beth-haram and Succoth: the former, Numb. 32.36. (where it is called Beth-haram) together with Bethnimra, is said to have been built by the Gadites, which (perhaps the rather, because in Josua it is called Beth-haram) some take to be Betaramptha, of which (b) Josephus after by Herod called Julias. But whether this Betaramptha were corrupted from Beth-haram, or from Beth-Aramatha (of which Aramatha there is mention in (c) Josephus) or from Beth-Remphan (of which Remphan, an Idol of those Countries, we read, Acts 7.43. and to which Junius refers the name of the City Rephan, 1 Mac. 37.) of this question it were hard to resolve. But touching Julias (according to Josephus, sometime Bataramptha) the same Josephus placeth in the Region of Peræa, beyond Jordan, which Regio Peræa, as the Greek word signifieth, is no more than Regio ulterior, the Country beyond the River; and therefore they which labour to set down the bounds of this Peræa, take more pains than needs. Fourteen Villages this Julias had belonging unto it, according to Josephus. He makes it to have been built by Herod Antipas, and named Julias, in honour of the adoption of Livia Augustus his wife, into the Julian Family: by which adoption she was called Julia. Another Julias, he saith was built by Philip the brother of Herod, in the lower Gaulanitis, which, he saith, is the same as Bethsaida.

Upon the Sea of Galilee, near to Julias in Peræa, (that is, in the Region over Jordan) they find Vetezobra, as it is called in Josephus, for Beth-ezob, which is as much as domus hissopi. Of a noble woman of this City, which for safeguard in the time of War with the Romans, came with many others into Hierusalem, and was there besieged. Josephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable History; how for hunger she eat her own child, with other tragicall accidents hereupon ensuing.

Joseph de Bell. Judg. l. 7. c. 8.

Of Succoth (which we said Jos. 13. is placed with Ben-haran, in the Valley of the Kingdom of Sehon) it is plain by the story of Gideon that it is near unto Jordan: where it is said, that as he was past Jordan with his three hundred, weary in the pursuit of Zebah and Zalmunnah, he requested relief of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gideons return were by him tortured, as it seems under a threshing-Car or Tribulum, between which and their flesh he put Thorns to teare their flesh as they were prest and trod under the Tribulum and after which sort also David used some of the Ammonites, though not with Thorns, but with Iron teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which signifieth such Tabernacles as were made in haste, either for Men or Cattel, Moses, Gen. 33. 17. witnesseth that the original of the name was from such harbours, which Jacob in his return from Mesopotamia built in that place: as also the place beyond the Red Sea, where the children of Israel, as they came from Rameses in Egypt, had their first Station, was upon like reason called Succoth: because there they set up their first Tabernacles or Tents: which they used after for forty years in the Wilderness. In remembrance whereof the Feast of Succoth, or Tabernacles, was instituted.

Lev. 23. 43.

Other four Cities of Gad are named, Josua 21.38. Ramoth in Gilead, Machanaiim, Chesbon, and Jahzer, all of them by the Gadites given to the Levites, of which Jahzer, as Chesbon, or Hesbon was a chief City of Sehon, whence Num. 32.1. his Country is called the Land of Jahzer. It was taken by Moses, having first sent spies to view it. In the first of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilead. In latter times (as it may be gathered by the Prophecy of Esay touching Moab) it was possessed by the Moabites: to which place of Esay, also Hieremy in a like prophecy alludes. It was at length regained (but as it seems from the Ammonites) by Judas Macchabæus: as it is 1 Mac. 5. 8. where Junius out of Josephus, reads, Jahzer, though the Greek hath Gazer. For Gazer, or Gezer (as he gathereth out of Jos. 16. 3. and 8. and Jud. 1. 29.) was far from these Countries of Sehon, seated in the West border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israelites, until Solomons time, for whom the King of Egypt wan it from the Canaanite, and gave it him as a Dowry with his Daughter.

Num. 22. 32. 1 Chron. 27. 31. Esay 6. 8. Hirem. 48. 32.

Of Chesbon it may be marvelled that in the place of Josua, and 1 Chron. 6. 81. it should be said to have been given to the Levites by the Gadites, seeing Jos. 13. 17. it is reckoned for a principal City of the Reubenites: Adrichomius, and such as little trouble themselves with such scruples, finding Casbon, 1 Mac. 5. 36. among the Cities of Gilead, taken by Judas Macchabæus, makes two Cities of one: as if this Casbon had been the Chesbon of Gad, and that of Reuben distinct from it: but the better reconciliation is, That it being a bordering City, between Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gave their part to the Levites, for so also it seems that in like reason Dibon is said in one place built by the Gadites, and in another given to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Machanaiim, which word signifieth a double Army, we read Gen. 32. 2. that it was therefore so called, because the Angels of God in that place met Jacob in manner of another Hoast or company, to joyn with his for his defence: as also Luke 2. 13. we read of a multitude of the Hoast of Heaven, which appeared to the Shepherds, at the time of our Saviours birth: and so unto the godly King Oswald of Northumberland, when he was soon after to joyn battel with the Pagan Penda of middle-England, Beda reports, that the like comfort appeared: whence the field where the Battel was fought, in the North parts of England, is called Heaven-field. In this City of Machanaiim, David abode during the rebellion of Absalom: and the same, for the strength thereof, Abner chose for the seat of Ishbosheth, during the war between David and the house of Saul.

Of the fourth Town, which was Ramoth in Gilead, we read often in the Scripture, for the recovering of which, King Achab lost his life. Junius thinks that Ramatha Mitspa, of which Jos. 13. 26. was this Ramoth in Gilead. Concerning the place where Laban and Jacob sware one to the other, as it was called Gilead, which is as much as a witnessing heap, because of the heap of stones which Laban and his sons left for a monument; so also that it was called Mitspah, which signifieth over-looking (because there they called God to over-see, and be witness to their Covenant) it is plain by the place, Gen. 31. 49. That in these parts there was not onely a Town, but likewise a Region called Mitspa, it appears Jos. 11. 3. where we read of the Chivites under Hermon, in the Country of Mitspa, *the Town of Mitspa, as it seems both by this place, and in the eighth verse following, being not in the Hill Country, but in the Valley. But seeing that Jephta the Judge of Israel, who after he came home from Tob (whither his brethren had driven him) dwelt in the Town of Mitspa, who doubtless was of the Tribe of Manasse, and thence at first expelled by his brethren, it may seem that they do not well, which place this Town of Mitspa rather in Gad than in Manasse. By Judas Macchabæus this Town of Mitspa (whether in Gad or in Manasse) was utterly spoiled and burnt, and the Males of it slain: for it was then possest of the Ammonites.

*Of other towns of this name, see in the Tribe of Benjamin.

Jud. 11. 34. 1 Mac. 5. 35.

Between Succoth (of which we have spoken) and the River Jaboc, was that Peniel, or Penuel, which name signifieth Locum faciei Dei; A place where the face of God was seen: so called for memory of the Angels appearing to Jacob, and wrestling with him there: the churlishness of which City, in refusing to relieve Gideon, was the cause that in his return he overthrew their Tower, and slew the chief Aldermen thereof. To these places of the Gadites, they add Rogelim, the City of that great and faithful subject Barzillai, as it seems, not far from Nahanaima, where he sustained King David, during Absaloms rebellion. To these they add the Town of Gaddi, Arnon, and Alimis, of vvhich Gaddi, being in Hebrew no more than Gaddita, is ignorantly made the name of a place. Arnon also no where appears to be the name of a Town, but still of a River. Alimis Adrichomius frames of ἐν Αλέμοις, 1 Mac. 5.26. so that the name should rather be Alema, but Junius out of Josephus reads Mallæ, for this in Alimis: and and understanding Mallæ to be put for Millo, and to be as much as Munitio (as we have shewed touching the Millo of the Sechemites) he takes this Mallæ to be Mitspa Moabitarum, of which 1 Sam. 22.3. As for that Mageth which Adrichomius finds in this Tribe of Gad, it is that Mahacath, which Moses notes to be as far as the furthest of Manasses, out of the bounds of this Tribe. So also Dathema, of which 1 Mac. 5. 10. (which Junius takes to be (b) Rithma, of which Num. 33. 18. a place of strength in the Territory of the Ammonites) and in like manner Minnith, and Abel vincarum, though by some they be attributed to the Gadites, or to their borders, yet they are found farther off. For of the two last we read in Jephta's pursuit of the Ammonites: seated, as it seems by that place of the Book of Judges, the former of them in the South border, and the other of them in the East border, both far removed from the Gadites. But the chief City of the Ammonites was nearer, and not far from the borders of Gad. It is called in the Scriptures sometimes Rabbath, as Deut. 3. 11. but more often Rabba. It is supposed to be that * Philadelphia which Ptolomy finds in Cœlosyria. Hierome and Calistus, in Arabia. It was conquered by Og from the Ammonites: but, as it seems, never possest by the Israelites, after the overthrow of Og, but left to the Ammonites: whereupon at length it became the Regal seat of the Ammonites, but of old it was the possession of the Zamzummims: which is as much to say, as men for all manner of craft and wickedness infamous. The same were also called Raphaim, of whom was Og, which recovered much of that which the Ammonites had got from his Ancestors: who having been first beaten by the Assyrians, and their assistants (as the Emims in Moab, and the Horims in Seir had been) were afterward the easier conquered by the Ammonites, as the Emims were by Moab, and the Horims by the Idumæans. Yet did the races of Emoreus, of whom these Giants were descended, contend with the Conquerors for their ancient inheritance: and as Sehon of Hesbon had dispossest Moab, so had Og of Basan the Ammonites, and between them recovered the best part of all the Valley, between the Mountains and Jordan. For this Og was also master of Rabba, or Philadelphia: And in the possession of the one or of the other of these two Moses and Israel, found all those Cities and Countries which were given to Reuben, Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasse. So that though it were 450. years since that these Zamzummims, or Raphaims, were expelled, yet they did not forget their ancient inheritance: but having these two Kings of one kinred, and both valiant and undertaking men, to wit, Og and Sehon, both Amorites, they recovered again much of their lost possessions, and thrust the sons of Lot over the Mountains, and into the Desarts. And as the Kings or Captains of Persia and Assyria (remembred in the 14. of Genesis) made way for Ammon, Moab, and Edom; so by that great conquest which Moses had over those two Amorites, Og and Sehon, did the Moabites and Ammonites take opportunity to look back again into those Plains; and when the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites, forsook the worship of the living God, and became loathful and licentious; they taking the advantage, invaded them, and cast them out of their possessions: and were sometime their Masters, sometime their Tributaries, as they pleased or displeased God: and according to the wisdom and vertue of their Commanders.

In this City of Rabba, was the Iron bed of Og found, nine cubits of length, and four of breadth. Deut. 3. The City was taken in Davids time, and the Inhabitants slain with great severity, and by divers torments. At the first assault thereof Urias was shot to death, having been, by direction from David, appointed to be imployed in the leading of an assault, where he could not escape: wherein also many of the best of the Army perished: and wherein David so displeased God, as his affairs had ill success afterward, even to his dying day. From hence had David the weighty and rich Crown of Gold, which the Kings of Ammon wore: or which, as some expound it, was used to be put on the head of their Idol, weighing a talent, which is 60. pound weight, after the common talent. 2 Sam. 12. In the time of Christians it had a Metropolitan Bishop, and under him twelve others. Wil. Tyr. Bel. sacr 13. c. 22. Pto.

The mountains which are described within this Tribe, and that of Manasse, with a part of Reuben, are those that Ptolomy calleth the hills of Hippus, a City of Cœlosyria: and Strabo, * Trachones: the same which continue from near Damascus, unto the Desarts of Moab: and receive divers names, as commonly Mountains do, which neighbour and bound divers Countries: for from the South part, as far Northwards as Astaroth, the chief City of Og, they are called Galaad, or Gilead; from thence Northward they are known by the name of Hermon, for so Moses calleth them: The Sidonians name them Shirion, but the Amorites, Shenir, others, Seir: of which name all those hills also were called, which part Judæa and Idumæa: and lastly, they are called Libanus, Strab. l. 6. * τραχὼν is locus asper & salebrosus: whence it appears, that Trachonites regio, in these parts was properly the hill-countrey. Deut. 3. 9.

(b) The letters D and R in the Hebrew are very like, so that one is oft mistaken for another, and sometime without mistaking one is put for another, as for Rodanim. 1 Chron. 1. we have Dodanim. Gen. 10.4

* Other names of this City, according to Stephanus were Ammana and Astarte: but in this latter perhaps he mistook, which might seem to be the same Astaroth, one of the chief Cities of Og, of which in that which remaineth to be spoken of; Manasse Adrichomius says, it was also called Urbs aquarum, because of the river Jabok's winding about it; but in the place 2 Sam. 27. whence he gathers this opinion, Junius reads in tercepi ab urbe aquam, if we must read with others, cepi ut urbem aquarum, yet it cannot be taken of Rabba it self, but of some other Fort adjoyning, Gen. 14.

Hiterem.22 Libanus, for so the Prophet Hieremy makes them all one, calling the high Mountains of Galaad, the head of Libanus.

These Mountains are very fruitful, and full of good pastures, and have many Trees which yeild Balsamum, and many other medicinable drugs. The Rivers of this Tribe are the waters of Nimrah, and Dibon, and the River Jaboc: others do also fancy another River, which rising out of the Rocks of Arnon, falleth into Jordan.

§. VI.

Of the Ammonites, part of whose Territories the Gadites wan from Og, the King of Basan.

THis Tribe of Gad possest half the Country of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia Petræa called Nabathea, as well within as without the Mountains of Gilead: though at this time when the Gadites wan it, it was in the possession of Sehon and Og, Amorites: and therefore Moses did not expel the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thrust the issues of Lot over the Mountains Trachones, or Gilead, as before. After the death of Othoniel the first Judge of Israel, the Ammonites joyned with the Moabites against the Hebrews, and so continued long. Jephta Judge of Israel had a great conquest over one of the Kings of Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Samuel they were at peace with them again.

Jud. 10.

Afterward we find that cruel King of the Ammonites, called Nahas, who besieging Jabes Gilead, gave them no other conditions but the pulling out of their right eyes. The reason why he tendred so hard a composition, was (besides this desire to bring shame upon Israel) because those Gileadites using to carry a Target on their left arms, which could not but shadow their left eyes, should by losing their right, be utterly disabled to defend themselves: but Saul came to their rescue, and delivered them from that danger. This Nahas, as it may seem, became the confederate of David, having friended him in Saul's time, though Josephus thinks that this Nahas was slain in the battel, when Saul raised the siege of Jabes, who affirmeth that there were three Kings of the Moabites of that name.

Hanun succeeded Nahas: to whom when David sent to congratulate his establishment, and to confirm the former friendship which he had with his father, he most contemptuously and proudly cut off the Ambassadours garments to the knees, and shaved the half of their beards. But afterward, notwithstanding the aids received from the Aramites, subject to Adadezer, and from the Reguli of Rehob, and Maacah, and from Istob, yet all those Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were overturned: their chief City of Rabba, after Philadelphia, was taken; the Crown which weighed a talent of gold, was set on David's head; all such as were prisoners, David executed with strange severity; for with saws and harrows he tare them in pieces, and cast the rest into lime-kills. Josaphat governing Juda, they assisted the Moabites their neighbours against him, and perished together. Ozias made them Tributaries, and they were again by Jotham inforc't to continue that tribute, and to increase it, to wit, a hundred talents of silver, ten thousand measures of wheat, and ten thousand of barley: which the Ammonites continued two years.

Istob, that is, the men of Thob: Thob is a small Territory under Amnon hills. Rehob is another between Hamor and Sidon, in the North bound of Canaan, Num. 13. 22 of which see in the tribe of Asser.

The fifth King of the Ammonites, of whose name we read, was Baalis the confederate of Zedekia: after whose taking by Nabuchodonosor, Baalis sent Ismael, of the blood of the Kings of Juda, to slay Gedaliah, who served Nabuchodonosor.

§. VII.

Of the other half of Manasse.

THe rest of the Land of Gilead, and of the Kingdom of Og in Basan, with the land of Hus and Argob, or Trachonitis (wherein also were part of the small Territories of Batania*, Gaulonitis, Gessuri, Machati, and Auranitis) was given to the half Tribe of Manasse over Jordan; of which those three later Provinces defended themselves against them for many ages. But Batania Ptolomy setteth farther off, and to the North-East, as a skirt of Arabia the Desart: and all those other Provinces before named with Petræa, and Ituræa, he nameth but as part of Cœlosyria; as far South as Rabba, or Philadelphia: likewise all the rest which belonged to Gad, and Reuben, saving the Land near the Dead Sea, he makes a part of Arabia Petræa: for many of these small Kingdoms take not much more ground than the country of Kent.

* Another territory adjoyning to Manasse, whose limits were confounded with some of these, was that Thisbitis the country of Elias, as it is 1 Kings 16. 1. and of Tobias, Tob. 1. 2. It lay on the East to the tribe of Neph. on the right hand of it, as in Tob. 1 2. and was possest by Colonies of the Israelites in the time of Saul, after his victory over the Amalekites and Ismaelites in those parts as it is gathered out b Mar. 5. 13.

The principal Cities of this half Tribe (for I will omit the rest) are these, Pella, sometimes (c) Butis, otherwise Berenice; by Seleucus King of Syria, it is said to have been called Pella, after the name of that Pella in Macedon: in which both Philip the Father, and his Son, Alexander the great, were born. It was taken, and in part demolished by Alexander Jannæus, King of the Jews, because it refused to obey the Jews laws: but it was repaired by Pompey, and annexed to the Government of Syria. It is now but a Village, saith Niger. Carnaim, by the River of Jaboc, taken by (d) Judas Macchabæus: where he set on fire the (e) Temple of their Idols: together with all those that fled thereunto for Sanctuary; and neer it they place the Castle of Carnion, of which 2 Macc. 12. 22. Then the strong City of (f) Ephron neer Jordan: which refusing to yeeld passage to (g) Judas Macchabæus, was forced by him by assault, and taken and burnt with great slaughter.

Jabes Gilead, or Jabesus, was another of the Cities of this half Tribe, which being besieged by Nahas (h) King of the Ammonites, was delivered by Saul, as is (i) elsewhere mentioned. In memory whereof these Citizens (k) recovered, embalmed and buried the bodies of Saul and his sons: which hung despightfully over the walls of Bethsan, or Scythopolis. (l) Gaddara, or Gadara, is next to be named, seated by Pliny on a Hill neer the River Hieromiace, which River Ortelius seems to think to be Jaboc. At the foot of the Hill there spring forth also hot baths, as at Machærus. Alexander Jannæus after ten moneths siege, wan it, and subverted it. Pompey restored it: and Gabinius (m) made it one of the five Courts of Justice in Palestine. Hierusalem being the first, Gadara the second, Emath, or Amathus the third, Hierico and Sephora in Galilee, the fourth and fifth. The Citizens impatiently bearing the tyranny of Herod, surnamed Ascalonita, accused him to Julius Cæsar of many crimes: but perceiving that they could not prevail, and that Herod was highly favoured of Cæsar, fearing the terrible (n) revenge of Herod, they slew themselves: some by strangling, others by leaping over high Towers, others by drowning themselves.

To the East of Gadara they place Sebei (o) in which, Jos. ant. 5. 13. saith, Jephtha was buried: whence others reading with the Vulgar, Jud. 12. 7. Sepultus est in Civitate sua Gilehad, (for in una Civitatum Gilehad) imagine Gilehad to be the name of a City, and to be the same with Sebei. In like manner following the Vulgar, 1 Macc. 5. 26. where it readeth Casphor for Chesbon; the same Adrichomius imagineth it to be ampla & firma Gilehaditarum Civitas: so of one City Heshon, or Chesbon, which they call Essebon, the chief City of Sehon, in the Tribe of Reuben, he imagineth two more: This Casphor in Manasses, and a City in Gad which he calleth Casbon, of which we have admonished the Reader heretofore. Of Gamala (so called, because the Hill on which it stood, was in fashion like the back of a Cammel) which Josephus placeth not far from Gadara, in the lower Gaulanitis over against Tarichea, which is on the West side of the Sea or Lake of Tiberias, see this Josephus in the fourth book of the Jewish war: where he describes the place by nature to be almost invincible: and in the story of the siege, shewes how Vespasian with much danger of his own person, entring it, was at first repulsed, with other very memorable accidents: and how at length, after the coming of Titus when it was taken, many leaping down the rocks with their wives and children, to the number of five thousand, thus perished: besides four thousand slain by the Romans: so that none escaped, save only two women that hid themselves.

About four miles West from Gadara, and as much East from Tiberias (which is on the other side of the Lake) Josephus placeth Hippus, or Hippene, whence Ptolomy gives the names to the Hils that compass the Plains in which it standeth: so that it may seem to have been of no small note. It is seated far from the hill Country: on the East of the Lake, as also Pliny noteth, lib. 5. cap. 15. It was restored by Pompey: after by Augustus added to Herod's Tetrarchy: it was wasted by the Jews, in the beginning of their rebellion: when by many massacres of their Nation, they were inraged against their borderers.

The next City of note, but of more ancient fame, is Edrehi, or Edrai, wherein Og King of Basan chiefly abode, when Moses and Israel invaded him: and neer unto this his Regal City, it was that he lost the battel and his life. It stood in S. Hierom's time: and had the name of Adar, or Adara. Not far from these Towns neer Jordan, in this Valley, stood Gerassa, or Gergessa, inhabited by the the Gergeſites, deſcended of the fifth ſon of Canaan. Of theſe Gergeſites we read, Mat. 8. 28. that Chriſt coming from the other ſide of the Lake of Tiberias, landed in their coaſts: where caſting the Devils out of the poſſeſſed, he permitted them to enter into the herd of Hoggs: in which ſtory, for Gergeſites, or Gergeſins, S. Luke and S. Marke have Gaderens: not as if theſe were all one (for Gergeſſa, or Geraſſa is a diſtinct Town in theſe parts from Gadara) but the bounds being confounded, and the Cities neighbours, either might well be named in this ſtory. This City received many changes and calamities: of which Joſephus hath often mention. For beſides other adventures, it was taken by L. Annius, Lievtenant to Veſpaſian: and 1000. of the ableſt young men put to the ſword, and the City burnt. In the yeer 1120. it was rebuilt by Baldwine King of Damaſcus: and in the ſame year recovered by Baldwine de Burgo King of Jeruſalem: and by him utterly razed. Neer unto Geraſa is the Village of Magedan, or, after the Syriack, Magedu, or, after the Greek, Magdala, where the Phariſees and Sadducees deſired of our Saviour a ſign from Heaven: the ſame place, or ſome adjoyning to it, which S. Mark calleth Dalmanutha. By the circumſtances of which ſtory it appears that this coaſt lay between the Lake of Tiberias and the Country of Decapolis. Brochard makes both theſe places to be one; and finds it to be Phiale, the fountain of Jordan, according to Joſephus: but this Phiale is too far from the Sea of Galilee, and from Bethſaida, to be either Magdala or Dalmanutha. For as it appears by the ſtory, not far hence, towards the North, was the Deſart of Bethſaida, where Chriſt filled 5000. people with the five barley loaves and two fiſhes.

Mat. 8 28. Mark 5. Luke 8. Mark 15. Mark 8. Broch. itin. 2. Of this Phiale ſee in Neph. c. 7. ſect. 4 ll. 3. Matt. 14. Mark 6. Luke 9. John 6.

On the North of this Bethſaida, they place Julias, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was ſometime a Village, and not long after the birth of Chriſt, it was compaſſed with a wall by Philip the Tetrach of Ituræa and Trachonitis: and after the name of Julia, the wife of Tiberias, called Julias, as hath been further ſpoken in the Tribe of Gad: where it was noted that Joſephus makes this Julias to be the ſame as Bethſaida. Upon the Eaſt ſide of the ſame Lake of Tiberias ſtands Corozaim, or Corazim, of which Chriſt in Matthew; Woe be unto thee Corazim.

Joſep. 18. ant. 3. & alibi.

But the principal City of all theſe in ancient time was Aſteroth: ſometime peopled with the Giants Raphaim: and therefore the Countrey adjoyning called the Land of Giants, of whoſe race was Og King of Baſan. In Geneſis this City is called Aſteroth of Carnaim, whence 1 Mac. 5. 26. it is called ſimply Carnaim, as Joſ. 13. 21. it is called Aſteroth, without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim ſignifieth a pair of Horns, which agree well with the name of their Idol Aſteroth, which was the image of a ſheep, as it is elſewhere noted, that Aſteroth in Deuteronomy ſignifieth ſheep. Others, from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Karnaim to have been the name of the people which inhabited this City: and expound it heroes * radiantes. For of old the Raphæi which inhabited this City (Gen. 14. 5.) were Giant-like men, as appears by comparing the words Deut. 3. 11. Og. ex reſiduo gigantum, with the words Joſ. 13. 12. Og ex reliquiis Raphæorum: but if the Karnaim (or Carnajim) were theſe Raphæi, the word would not have been in the dual number: neither would Moſes in the places of Geneſis have ſaid the Raphæi in Aſteroth of the Karnaim, but either the Raphæi in Aſteroth of the Raphæi, or ſome other way fitteſt for perſpicuity: for this naming of both thus in the ſame clauſe, diſtinguiſheth one from the other.

Gen. 14. 5. See chap 7. ſect. 3. ll. 2. * Becauſe horn when it is poliſhed, ſhineth: hence it is that the Verb of this Noun is ſometime Lucere: as it were cornutum eſſe: whereupon the Vulgar, Exo 34. 19 reading cornutum corneam, or lucidam faciem, gave occaſion to the fabulous Painters to paint Moſes with Horns. Judith. 1. 8.

Not far from Aſteroth, Adricomius out of Brochard and Breidenbachius placeth Cedar in the way out of Syria into Galilee, four miles from Corazin. This City (ſaith he) is remembred in the Canticles, and in the book of Judith, and there are that of this City underſtand David in his 120. Pſalm: and here the Sepulchre of Job is yet to be ſeen, ſaith Breidenbach.

1 Cant. 5.

Now concerning the Texts which he citeth, it is ſo that the Greek hath Galaad in ſtead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth uſe in that place of Judith, and joyneth Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles and the 120. Pſalm do rather prove that Cedar was not hereabout, than any way help Adricomius. For that they ſpeak of Scenitæ Cedareni, it is apparent, and as evident by the place in the Canticles, that they were de colores, much more than any under the Climates of the Land of Canaan: whence Junius out of Lampridius and Pliny placeth them in Arabia Petræa, far from theſe parts. Touching the Sepulchre of Job, it is certain that the Arabians and Saracens (holding thoſe places) fain many things to abuſe the Chriſtians, and to get mony. Further, it may well be affirmed, that many (if not all) the hiſtorical circumſtances of Job are ſo obſcure, that we ſhould rather by finding his Country ſeek to get ſome knowledge of him, than by any preſumptions founded upon him, infer what his Countrey was, and build unto him a City by conjecture.

Of

Of Job himself, whether he was the same Jobab remembred in the 36. of Genesis, descended from Esau King also of Idumæa, though Rupertus, Lyranus, Oleaster, and Bellarmine are of another opinion, yet Saint Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostome, and Gregorie, with Athanasius, Hippolitus, Irenæus, Eusebius Emissenus, Apollinaris, Eustachius, and other cited by S. Hierome in his 126. Epist. to Evagrius, take him for the same.

For ou and au are often changed one into the other: whence they used Austis for Oustis, &c. Hence also by Junius and others it is called Ausanitis, & so as it seems they read it in the Septuagint, Jun. in Gen. 10. 23.

The Land of Huts or Hus, wherein Job dwelt, is from the Greek Ους, which the Septuagint use for the word Huts, translated by the Vulgar sometimes Hus, as Job 1.1. sometime Austitis, as Hierem. 25.20. This Land is placed by Junius between Palæstine and Cœlosyria, besides Chamatha (or Hamatha) under Palmyrene, in the Countrey called by Ptolomy Trachonitis, or Bathanæa, the bounds of which Countries are confounded with Basan in this half Tribe of Manasses. And that this Land of Hus was thus seated, it may in part be gathered out of the place of Jer. 25.20. where he reckons the Hushites among the promiscuous borders of the Israelites, whom he therfore calleth promiscuous, or miscelaniam turbam, because their bounds were not only joyned but confounded, and their Seigniories mingled one with the other: but of this place the words of Hieremy, Lam. 4. 21. speaking of the same Prophecy, of which he speaketh in the 25. Chapter, must needs be expounded, as Junius reads them, distinguishing the Land of Hus from Edom: O filia Edomi, O quæ habitas in terra Hutzi; O daughter of Edom, O thou which dwellest in the Land of Hus. Now because the Vulgar doth not so distinguish, but readeth, Filia Edom quæ habitas in terra Hus; Daughter of Edom which dwellest in the land of Hus: Hence, as it seems, some of the learned have thought that Job was an Edomite, as we have said, and King of Edom, which if they understand by it Idumæa, or Edom, so called in Moses time, they are greatly mistaken, making this Land of Hus to be in Idumæa. For it is very probable that Esau, when he first parted from Jacob, did not seat himself in Edom, or Seir, which lieth on the South border of Judæa, but inhabited Seir far to the East of Jordan, and held part of those Mountains, otherwise called Galaad, and Hermon, which by corruption the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites, Shenir, for Seir; and from this his habitation did Esau incounter Jacob, when he returned out of Mesopotamia, who passed by the very border of Esau his abiding. It is true, that at such time as Moses wandered in the Desarts, that the posterity of Esau inhabited Seir to the South of Judæa: for it is like that the Amorites, who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did also drive the Edomites out of those parts, who thence-forward seated themselves to the South of Judæa, bordering the Desart Paran, and stretched their habitations over the Desarts as far as Hor where Aaron died.

Deut. 3. 9.

Now for this Hus, which gave the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the son of Aram, as Junius thinks in his note upon Gen. 10. 23. or rather Hus the son of Nachor, Abrahams brother, the question is doubtful. For my part I rather encline to think, that it was Hus the son of Nachor: partly because these Families of Aram seem long before to have been lost: and partly because in Job 32. 2. Elihu the fourth of Jobs friends, which seems to be of Jobs own Country, is called a Buzite, of Buz the brother of Hus, the son of Nachor: as also Jer. 25. in the same continuation (though some other Nations named between) where Hus is spoken of, there Buz is also named. Neither doth it hinder our conjecture, that in the place of Job 32. Elihu the Buzite is said to be of the Family of Ram: (which Junius expounds to be as much as of the Family of Aram) for that by his Aram we are not to understand Aram the son of Sem, Junius himself maketh it plain, both in his annotation upon the beginning of his book, where he saith, that one of Jobs friends (which must needs be this Elihu) was of the posterity of Nachor (as also in this place he confesseth so much expressly) and in as much as he readeth not è Familia Aram, or Ram, but è Fimilia Syriæ; like as elsewhere Laban, who sprung of Nachor, is called a Syrian.

Whence the Septuagint call him ex regione Austitide.

As for the other three of Jobs friends (of whom by this note of Elihu his being of the Syrian Family, or of the Family of Nachor) it is implyed that they were of other kindreds, as also by the Septuagints addition, that this Elihu was of the Land of Hus, or Austitis, it is implyed that they thought only Elihu to have been of Jobs own Country. See Sixtus Senensis.

Franciscus Brochard the Monk, in his description of the Holy Land in the journy from Acon Eastward, findeth Suetha, and Theman on the East of the Sea of Galilee: both very near to the Land of Hus: whereof the one may seem to have denominated Bildad the Shuchite; the other Eliphaz the Themanite: two of the three friends of Job, of the which Job 2. 11. But Junius thinks that the Shuchites were inhabitants of Arabia the Desart, descended of Shuach the son of Abraham and Ketura: of whom Gen. 25. 2. perhaps, saith he, the same whom Pliny calls Saccæi. So also he thinketh the Themanites, of whom Eliphaz was, to have been of Arabia the Desart: and Eliphaz himself to have been of the posterity of Theman the son of Eliphaz, which was the son of Esau. And so also Nahamah, whence Tsophar the third of Job's friends (which in this place of Job. 2. 11. are mentioned) is by the same learned Expositor, thought either to be named of Thimnah by transposition of letters (which Thimnah, Gen. 36. 40. is named among the sons of Esau, that gave denomination to the places where they were seated) or else to be the same Nahamah, which Jos. 15. 41. is reckoned for a City of Juda in the border, as he thinks, of Edom. And yet I deny not but that near the Land of Hus, in Basan, as it seems, in the Tribe of Manasses, there is a Region which (at least) in later times was called Suitis, or of some like name. For this is evident by the History of Will. Tyrius, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Suita, or Suites (as he cals it diversly) of exceeding great strength and use for the retaining of the whole Country: which, in the time of Baldwine the second King of Hierusalem, was with great digging through rocks recovered by the Christians; having not long before been lost, to the great disadvantage of the Country, while it was in the hands of the Saracens. The situation of this Fort is by Tyrius described to be sixteen miles from the City Tiberias, on the East of Jordan: by Adrichomius four miles North-ward from the place where Jordan enters the Lake Tiberias at Corazin.

De bel. sacr. lib. 22. c. 15. & 21.

Other Cities of this part of Manasses named in the Scripture, are these: Golan, Gehesthera, Mitspa of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the coming of the Israelites was called Nobach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Mitspa of Gilead, we have spoken by occasion among the Cities of Gad. The other two were given to the Levites, and Golan made one of the Cities of refuge: from which Golan we have both Gaulanitis superior and inferior, oft in Josephus. Behesthera is accounted the chief City of Basan by some, but the Writers corrupting the name into Bozra, it is confounded with Betser, or Bozra of Reuben, and with Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Hierome hath Arga, a name of a City placed by some about the waters of Merom (as they are called by Josua) which make the Lake Samachonitis, as Josephus cals it. This Lake, being as it were in the midst between Cæsarea Philippi and Tiberias, through which, as through the Lake of Tiberias, Jordan runneth, boundeth part of this half Tribe on the West. When the snow of Libanus melteth, it is very large, saith Brochard: otherwise more contract, leaving the marish ground on both sides, for Lions and other wilde beasts, which harbour in the shrubs that plentifully grow there.

Jos. 21. 27 Deut. 4 43.

Adjoyning to this Lake in this Country of Manasses, Josephus names two places of strength, fortified by himself in the beginning of the Jews rebellion: Seleucia the one, and Sogane the other. In the North side of this half Tribe of Manasse, and in the North-East, the Scripture nameth divers bordering places towards Damascus, as Tsedad, Chauram, and Chatsar-Henan, lying in a line drawn from the West; of which three Cities we read, Ezek. 47. 15. with which also agrees the place, Num. 34. 8. where for Chauram between Tsedad, and Chatsar-Henan, Ziphron is named. From this Chauram is the name of Auranitis Regio, in Josephus and Tyrius, whose bounds (as also the bounds of Gessur and Mahacath, or Macati, which were likewise borderers to Manasses towards the North-East) are unknown: only that Gessur was of might, it appears in that David married Mahaca the daughter of Thalmay King of Gessur: by whom he had the most beautiful, but wicked and unfortunate Absalom.

The History of the Syrians, the chief Borderers of the Israelites that dwelt on the East of Jordan.

§. I.

Of the City of Damascus, and the divers Fortunes thereof.

Damascus of all other in this border, and of that part of the world, was the most famous, excelling in beauty, antiquity, and riches, and was therefore called the City of joy or gladness, and the House of pleasure; and is not only remembred in many places of Scripture, but by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrews, saith Josephus, think it to have been built by Hus the son of Aram: of which opinion S. Hierome upon Esay seemeth to be: though in his Hebrew questions he affirmeth, that it was founded by Damascus the son of Joseph l. 1. c. 14.

Is Esa 17. Gen. 15.2. of Eliezer, Abraham's Steward; a thing very unlikely, seeing the City was formerly known by that name, as appears by Abraham's calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damasco. David was the first that subjected it to the Kingdom of Juda, after the overthrow of Adadezer their King; but in Solomon's time, Rezon recovered it again, though he had no title at all or right to that Principality: but David having overthrown Hadadezer King of Sophena (otherwise Syria Soba, or Zoba) Razon or Rezon, with the remainder of that broken Army, invaded Damascena, and possest Damascus it self, and became an enemy to Solomon all his life.

1 King 11 40.

The next King of Damascus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Egypt from David and Joab, when they slew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnes the King of Egypts Wives sister: of whom Taphnes in Egypt was so called. This Adad returning again, became an enemy to Solomon all his life, and (as some Writers affirm) invaded Damascus, and thrust Rezon thence-out. In the Line of Adad that Kingdom continued nine descents (as hereafter may be shewed in the Catalogue of those Kings of Syria) to whom the Assyrians, and then the Grecians succeeded. This City was exceeding strong, compassed with waters from the Rivers of Abanah, and Pharpar: whereof one of them, prophane Writers call Chrysorrhoas, the golden River. Junius takes it for Adonis. The Country adjoyning is very fruitful of excellent Wines and Wheats, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very strong Castle, built as it seems by the Florentines, after it became Christian: the Lillies being found cut in many Marbles in that Citadel. Against this City the Prophets Amos, Esay, Jeremy, and Zacharias, prophesied that it should be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heap of stones. In the time of the last Rezon, and tenth King of the Damascens, Teglatphalasser, invited by Achaz King of Juda, carried away the naturals of Damascus into the East: leaving of his own Nation to inhabit it. After that it was utterly ruined by the Babylonians, saith Hierome upon Esay: which thing was performed by Salmanasser, according to Junius in his note upon that place, five years after the Prophecy. In time it was restored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolomies; but long after, when Syria fell into the hands of the Romanes, it was taken by Metellus, and Lollius. In the time of the Christians it had an Archbishop: Saint Hierome living, as he affirmeth upon the Acts, it was the Metropolis of the Saracens: being taken by Haomer their King from the Romanes, in the year of our redemption 636. and in the year 1147. Conrad the third, Emperour of Rome, Lewis King of France, Baldwine the third King of Hierusalem, Henry Duke of Austria, brother to Conrad, Frederick Barbarossa afterward Emperour, Theoderick Earl of Flaunders, and other Princes assembled at Ptolomais Acon, on the sea-coast, determined to recover Damascus: but being betrayed by the Syrians, they failed of the enterprize.

In the year 1262. Halon the Tartar incompast it, and having formerly taken the King, brought him under the Wals, and threatned extreme torture unto him, except the Citizens rendred the place: but they refusing it, the King was torn asunder before them, and in fine the City taken, Agab the son of Halon was by his father made King thereof. Herold bel. sacr. 4. c. 14

In the year 1400. Tamberlain Emperour of the Parthians, invaded that Region, and besieged the City with an Army of 1200000. (if the number be not mistaken.) He entred it, and put all to the sword, filling the ditch with his prisoners; those that retired into the Castle, which seemed a place impregnable, he overtopped with another Castle adjoyning: he forbare the demolishing of the City, in respect of the beauty of the Church, garnished with forty Gates, or sumptuous Porches. It had within it 9000. Lanterns of Gold and Silver: but while he invaded Egypt, they again surprized Damascus. Lastly, in his return after three moneths siege, he forc't it: the Mahometans prostrating themselves with their Priests, desired mercy. But Tamberlain commanding them to enter the Church, he burnt them and it to the number of 30000. and did so demolish it, as those that came afterwards to see their houses, knew them not by the foundations. And as a Trophee of his victory, he raised three Towers with great art, builded with the heads of those whom he had slaughtered. After this, it was restored and re-possest by the Soldane of Egypt with a Garrison of Mammalukes: And in the year 1517. Selimus Emperour of the Turks wrested it out of the hands of the Egyptians: in whose possession it now remaineth inhabited with Mahometans and Christians of all neighbouring Nations. §. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing up of their power.

NOw be it that Damascus were founded by Hus the son of Aram, or by Damascus the son of Eliezer Abraham's steward, we find no relation of their Kings, or Commonwealth till Davids time. For it stood without the bounds of Canaan: and therefore neglected by Moses, Josua, and the Judges, as impertinent to that Story. But were it so that it had some Reguli, or petty Kings over it, as all the Cities of those parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as David overthrew Adadezer Prince of Sophena, or Syria Zoba: the same Nation which Pliny calleth Nubæi, inhabiting between Batania and Euphrates. Now the better to understand the story of those Syrian Princes, whom soon after the Kings of Damascus made their vassals, the Reader may inform himself, That on the North-East parts of the Holy Land, there were three chief Principallities, whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the State or Commonwealth of Israel, namely, Damascus, or Aram, Sophena, or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath Zoba; of which these were the Princes in David's and Solomon's times: Razon, or Rezon of Damascus, Adadezer of Syria, Zoba, and Tohu of Chamath. But it seemeth, that Damascus was one of the Cities subject to Adadezer when David invaded him, though when Saul made war against Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Josephus affirmeth, the leader of those succours, which were levied and sent to Hadad-Hezer from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battel slain with 22000. Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the overthrow of Adadezer, Rezon the Commander of his Army, taking advantage, made himself King of Damascus, Adadezer, and Adad of Damascus being both slain. About the same time Toku King of Chamath, or Ituræa, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Adadezer was utterly overthrown, sendeth for peace to David, and presenteth him with rich gifts: but in dolo, saith S. Hierome; it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited: but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Judæans and Israelites. But to return to the Kings of Syria, I mean of Syria as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascena, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath, or Ituræa; to which I may add Geshur, because it is so accounted in the second of Sam. 15. as joyning in the Territory to Damascus (for Syria at large is far greater, of which Palæstina it self is but a Province, as I have noted in the beginning of this Tract:) It is not a greed among the Historians of former times, nor of our later Writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus.

Some account Rezon, others Adad of Idumæa: of whom it is written in the first of Kings, that David having invaded that Region, and left Joab there to destroy all the male children thereof: Adad of the Kings seed fled into Egypt; and was there married to Taphnes the Queens sister, as before; who hearing of David's death, and of the death of his Captain Joab (whom indeed all the bordering Nations feared) he turned again: and, as Bunting thinketh, this Adad did expel Rezon out of Damascus, and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To me it seemeth otherwise. For, as I take it, Adadezer, the son of Rehob, whom Saul invaded, was the Founder of that Principallity: and the first of Adads, who forsaking his fathers name, as he grew powerful, took upon him the stile of Adad, the great god of the Assyrians, saith Macrobius, which signified Oneness of Unity. I also find a City called Adada, in the same part of Syria: of which whether these Princes took the name, or gave it, I am ignorant. For Adad-ezer, Ben-adad, El-adad were the same in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli adjoyned. And that Adadezer was of greatest power, it appeareth first, because it is against him, that David undertook the war: Secondly, because he levied 22000. Aramites out of the Territory of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damascens had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would have given us his name: Thirdly, because Syria Zoba, of the most of which Adadezer was King, was an exceeding large Territory, and contained of Arabia the Desart as far as to Euphrates, according to Pliny: and the greatest part of Arabia Petræa, according to Niger. Whosoever was the first, whether Adadezer, or Adad of Idumæa, Rezon was the second: Who was an enemy to Israel all the dayes of Solomon. Besides the evil that Adad did, the evil that Hadad did, seemeth to be referred to Hadad of Idumæa, lately returned out of Egypt: to wit, 23. years after he was carried thither.

1 King 11

The third King of Damascus, and of Zobah both, was Hezion; to Hezion succeded Tabremmum, or Tabrimmum; to him Benhadad, as is proved in the first of Kings: For Asa King of Juda the son of Abiam, the son of Roboam, the son of Solomon, being vexed and invaded by Baasha, the successour of Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, sent to Benhadab the son of Tabrimmon, the son of Hezion, King of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to invade Israel (while Baasha sought to fortifie Rama against Asa:

1 Kings 15. 18.

Asa: thereby to block him up, that he should not enter into any of the territories of Israel) who according to the desire of Asa, having received his presents, willingly invaded the Country of Nephtalim, and took divers Cities, and spoyls thence: Asa in the mean while carrying away all the Materials, which Baasha had brought to fortifie Rama withal, and converted them to his own use.

1 Kin. 15. 18. This Benhadads Father Tabremmon was in league with Asa: and so was his Father Hezion: for Asa requireth the continuance of that friendship from Benhadad, his son: though it seemeth that the gold and silver sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabremmon invaded Israel, before the enterprize of his son Benhadad, it is conjectured. For Benhadad when he was prisoner with Achab, spake as followeth: The Cities which my father took from thy father, I will restore, and thou shalt make streets or Keepers of the borders for thee in Damascus: as my Father did in Samaria. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument it self were of much importance) because Tabremmon was father indeed to Benhadad which invaded Baasha, at the request of Asa: But this Benhadad that twice entred upon Achab, and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the son of Benhadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Asa and Abiam, as before, than the son of Tabremmon. For between the invasion of Benhadad the first, in Baasha's time, and the siege of Samaria, and the overthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there past 49 years, as may be gathered out of the reigns of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30. years of age to Benhadad, when he invaded Baasha, and after that 49. years ere he was taken by Achab, which make eighty lacking one, it is unlikely that Benhadad at such an age should make war. Besides all this, the first Benhadad came with no such pomp; but the second Benhadad vaunteth, that he was followed with 32. Kings: and therefore I resolve, that Benhadad the son of Tebremmon invaded Baasha and Omri; and Benhadad the second invaded Achab, at whose hands this Benhadad received two notorious overthrows: the first

1 Kin. 20. at Samaria, by a sally of 700. Israelites: the second at Aphec, where, with the like number in effect, the Israelites slaughtered 200000. of the Aramites; besides 27000. which were crush't by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benhadad, Achab again setteth at liberty: to whom he rendreth those Towns that his father had taken from the Predecessour of Achab, but being returned, he refused to render Ramoth Gilead, a frontier Town, and of great importance. Now three years after (for so long the league lasted) Ramoth not being delivered, Achab invaded Gilead, and besieged the City, being assisted by Josaphat. The Aramites came to succour and fight: in which Achab is wounded, and dieth that night. After this, Benhadad sendeth the Commander of his forces, called Naaman, to Joram the son of Achab to be healed of the leprosie, and though Elizeus had healed him, yet he picked a quarrell against Joram: and when Joram, by Elizeus his intelligence had escaped his plot, he sent men and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is aforesaid. After Benhadad besieged Samaria again, and being terrified thence from Heaven, he departed home, and sickneth, and sendeth Azael with great gifts to Elizeus, to know his estate if he might live. Azael returning, smothereth him. Zonaras and Cedrenus call this Benhadad Adar, and the son of Adar: Amos and Hieremy mention the Towers of Benhadad. Josephus writeth that Benhadad and his successour Azael were worshipped for Gods by the Syrians to his time, for the sumptuous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquity, ignorant, saith he, that scarce yet 1100. years are compleat since their wars with the Israelites.

Hazael or Azael, the first King of the race of the Adads of Damascus, was annointed by Elisha, or Elizeus, when he was sent by Benhadad to the Prophet, to know whether Benhadad should recover his present sickness: He waged war with Joram, who received divers wounds at the encounter at Ramoth in Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Jesreel, he and the King of Juda, Ahaziah or Ochozias, are slain by Jehu, as before is said. After the death of Joram, Azael continued war against Jehu, and wasted Gilead, and all those portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse, over Jordan. He then invaded Juda, and took Gath; but by gifts from Joas he was averted from attempting Hierusalem: for he presented him all the hallowed things which Jehosaphat, Jehoram, and Ahaziah his fathers, Kings of Juda, had dedicated, and which he himself had dedicated; and all the gold which was found in the treasures of the Lord, and in the Kings house. This was the second time that the Temple was spoiled to please the Adads of Damascus. For Asa did present Benhadad with those treasures, when he invited him to war upon Baasha King of Israel. And notwithstanding this composition between Joas and Azael, yet a part of his Army spoiled the other Provinces of Judæa, and slaughtered many principal persons. Lastly,

Of the later Kings, and decay and overthrow of their power.

2 Reg. 13. Joſ. ant. c. 9. After Hazael, Benhadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the son of Hazael, reigned in Damascus: who fought against Israel with ill success: for Joas King of Israel, the son of the unhappy Joachaz, as he was foretold by Elisha the Prophet, beat Benhadad in three several battels: and he lost all those Cities to Israel, which his father Hazael had taken violently from Joachaz.

Joſ ant. l. 7. c. 6. After this Benhadad the son of Hazael, there succeeded three others by the same name, of whom the Stories are lost, onely Nicholaus Damascenus cited by Josephus, makes mention of them: and in one of these Kings times it was that Jeroboam the second, the son of Joas, recovered Damascus it self to Juda, saith the Geneva, but better in Junius, Utque recuperabat Damascum, & Chamatham Jehudæ pro Israele; that is, And how he recovered for Israel, Damascus and Chamatha of Judæa; for these Cities sometimes conquered by David, did of right belong to the Tribe of Juda. 1 Kin. 14. 28.

And it is likely, that this conquest upon the Adads was performed: the first of these three Adads then living, of whom there is no Story. For when as Jehoas the King of the ten Tribes had thrice overcome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the son of Hazael, and had recovered the Cities which Hazael had won from Israel; and so left his Kingdom to his son Joroboam the second; it seemeth that this Jeroboam without delay, and having nothing else left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his fathers good fortune, and invaded Damascus.

Razin, or Rezin, after Josephus, Rases; after Zonaras, Raason the tenth Adad, making league with Pekah, or Phacas King of Israel, against Achaz King of Juda; both carry away a great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Hierusalem: but in vain. Then Adad alone invadeth Elath, and beating out the Jews, maketh it a Colony of Syrians. Wherefore Achab brought Teglatphalassar against Razin, who took him and beheaded him, and won Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads, and the Kingdom of Damascus: the Assyrians becoming masters both of that and Israel. These 2 Kin. 16. 5. 5. Esay 7. Joſ. ant. l. 9 c. 11.

Adads, as they reigned in order are thus reckoned:

1 Adadezer the son of Rehob.
2 Rezin the son of Eliadad, or Razin.
3 Hezion.
4 Tabremmon.
5 Benhadad, who invaded Baasha.
6 Benhadad the second, taken prisoner by Achab.
7 Hazael, whom Elisha foretold with tears of his advancement; the same who overthrew Joram King of Israel at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Hazael which preceded Benhadad the third, it is not improbable, because that Hazael which took Geth, and compounded the war with Joas, made the Expedition thirty years, and perchance more, after the first Hazael which stifled his master Benhadad, and had slain Joram the son of Achab King of Israel. For Joas began to reign in the 7. year of Jehu King of Israel; and after he had reigned 23. years, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long we know not) it is said that Hazael took Geth, and turned his face towards Jerusalem. It is also some proof that Hazael that took Geth, was not the same with Hazael that murdered Benhadad, because he could not at that time be of good years, being as it seemeth, the second person in the Kingdom, and Commander of Benhadads men of war. To this Hazael (be he the first or second) succeeded.
8 Benhadad, the third, whom Joash King of Israel thrice overthrew.
9 Resin, or Rezin, the last, who joyned with Pekah King of Israel, against Juda, at which time Achaz King of Juda waged for his defence Teglatphalasser.

Now between Benhadad the third, and Rezin the last, Nicolaus Damascenus finds three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelve in all.

For the rest of the Princes of Syria, which were but Reguli, as those of Emath, and Gessur, we find that Tohu was King of Emath, or Camath, in Davids time, to whom he sent his son Joram with presents, after Davids victory against Adadezer. Also Senacherib speaketh of a King of Emath, but names him not. 2 Sam. 8. 9. Esay 37.

§. IV.

Of Other lesser Kingdoms of the Syrians, which being brought under the Assyrians, never recovered themselves again.

OF Gessur we find two Kings named; to wit, Talmai, and his Father Ammihur: to Talmai, whose Daughter David married,

it was that Absalom fled, who was his maternal Grandfather. Of the Kings of Sephena, or Syria, Soba, or Cœlosyria, there are two named, Rehob, or Rechob, the Father of Adadezer, and Adadezer himself; and it is plain that after his death the seat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damascus, a City better fitting their greatness. After Rezin became Lord of both Principalities. And the race of these Kings of Syria (which became so potent, and joyned Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the Desart of Arabia, with other Provinces into one, under Rezin the second of the Adads) as it began with David, so it ended at once with the Kingdom of Israel. For Ahaz King of Juda waged the Assyrian Teglatphalassar against Pekah King of Israel, and against Rezin the last King of Damascus: which Teglath first invaded Damascena, and the Region of Soba, and took Damascus it self, and did put to death Rezin the last, carrying the Inhabitants captive. This was the second time that the Assyrians attempted Israel. For first Phul Belochus entred the borders thereof (Menahem governing Israel) who stopt the enterprise of Phul with a thousand talents of silver: for this Phul Belochus, whose pedigree we will examine hereafter, being scarce warm, as yet, in his seat at Babylon, which he, with the help of his companion Arbaces, had wrested from Sardanapalus: having besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Israel for that present time. But his son Teglath following the purpose of his father Belochus, and finding so excellent an occasion, as the war begun between Israel and Judah, Pekah commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Rezin being also wrapt in that war, and wasted in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Juda, his impreſt and entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Israel, he carried it (as is before remembred) and then with great ease possest himself of the Cities of Nephtalim; leading with him a great part of the people captive. And his son Salmanasser, whom Ptolemy called Nabonasser, after the revolt of Hosea, forced Samaria, and rent that Kingdom asunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted, the race and Monarchy of the Syrian Adads in Rezin, whom Teglath slaughtered; the Kingdom of Israel in Hosea, whom Salmanasser overturned; happened near about a time: that of Ninus in the daies of Belochus, and the other two in the daies of Teglatphalasser, and Salmanasser his son. For Sardanapalus perished, Osia ruling Juda; and the other two Kingdoms were dissolved, Achaz yet living.

Lastly, the Kingdom of Juda it self, being attempted by Senacherib, the son of Salmanasser, in vain, and preserved for the time by God miraculously, was at length utterly overturned. Hierusalem and the Temple burnt 132. years after the captivity of Israel and Samaria: the destruction of Israel being in the ninth year of Hosea: that of Juda in the eleventh of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Assyria and Babylon held also the Kingdom of Syria, from the eighth year of Salmanasser; to the last of Baltassar, whom Herodotus calleth Labynitus: in all about 200. years. After these the Persians from Cyrus to Darius their last King, held Syria about 200. years. 3603. 3811.

Then Alexander Macedon took this among other Provinces of the Persian Empire, and his successors the Selucidæ reigned therein, till it became subject unto the power of the Romans, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in possession of the Turk, as shall be shewed in due place. Thus much of the Nations bordering upon the Israelites, with whom they had most to do, both in war and peace, being the onely people, whose History in those ancient times carried an assured face of Truth.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Tribe of Benjamin, and of Hierusalem.

§. I.

Of divers memorable places in the Tribe of Benjamin, whereof Hiericho, Gilgal, Mitspa, Bethel, Rama, Gobah, and Gibha.

OF the Tribe of Benjamin, the twelfth and youngest son of Jacob, whom he had by Rachel, there were mustered at Mount Sinia 35000. able bodies: all which perishing in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their issues 45600. fit to bear Arms: and these had their Territory on this side Jordan, between Juda and Ephraim: The Cities

1 Chron. 8. 12. Cities within this Tribe neareſt Jordan, are Lod, Hadid, and Ono: of which, Lod and Ono were built by Shemed a Benjamite: they were all three re-inhabited with Benjamites, after the return out of Captivity, as is mentioned, Nehem. 11. 35. and Eſd. 2. 35. where Adrichomius reading Lod, Hadid, Ono, makes beſides Hadid in Nehemia, a City called Lodhadid: This Hadid or Chadid was rebuilt by Simon Macchabæus. Mac. 12. 38

Samarim, or Tſemaraim, named of Tſemary one of the ſons of Canaan, was another of their Cities: and further into the Land ſtandeth Jericho, one of the Toparchies and the laſt of Juda, ſeated in a moſt fruitful Valley, adorned with many Palm-trees: and therefore elſewhere called the City of Palms. From the time of Joſua, who utterly deſtroyed it, it lay waſte untill the time of Achad: in whoſe daies Chiel of Bethel laid the new foundation of it, in the loſs of Abiram his eldeſt ſon, and built the gates of it in the loſs of his youngeſt ſon Segub: according to the curſe of Joſua: in which and other reſpects, Hoſ. 12. 14. calleth Joſua a Prophet. In after-times it was deſtroyed by Veſpaſian, and re-built by Adrian. 1 Kings 16. 34. Joſ. 6. 19.

To the South-eaſt of Jericho ſtood * Halmon of the Levites, of which Joſ. 21. 18. To the South Betharaba, of which Joſ. c. 15. and c. 18. Then that Gilgal of which there is ſo much mention in the Scripture, where Joſua firſt ate of the fruits of the land, circumciſed all thoſe born in the Deſarts, and celebrated the Paſſeover. * 1 Chro. 6. 60. This Halmon is called Halemeth, whence they make a new City Almath, as if this Tribe had given five Cities to the Levites.

The reaſon of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Etymology of this name (for it ſeems by the place, Deut. 11. 30. that the name was known before the coming of the Iſraelites into Canaan) is noted Joſ 5. 9. Ob devolutionem probri Ægyptiaci, becauſe their fore-skins (the people being there circumciſed) were tumbled down the Hill: which from thence was called Collis præputiorum. This Gilgal was alſo called Geliloth, as appears by comparing the places, Joſ. 15. 7. and 18. 17. for it was in the borders of Jordan, of which Joſ. 22. 13. and Geliloth ſignifieth borders. It ſtood (though in ſome diſtance) directly Eaſtward, over againſt the two Hills Garazim and Hebal: upon the one of which the bleſſings, and on the other the curſings were to be read to the people, both being the Mountains of Ephraim. Further, for the ſituation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it, and Mitſpa of Benjamin (of which alſo we read oft in the Scripture) were ſeated about the midſt of the length of the land of Canaan: for which reaſon (a) Samuel choſe theſe two places, to either of which he came yearly to give judgement to the Iſraelites; of which two, Gilgal (as is ſaid) was near Jordan on the Eaſt ſide of this Tribe and Mitſpa near the Weſt Sea, towards the land of the Philiſtims. Deut. 11. 30. (a) 1 Sam. 7. 15.

The third place, which is named with theſe two, whither alſo Samuel uſed yearly to come, is [b] Bethel: which alſo was ſeated in this Tribe of Benjamin. But to return to Gilgal, which was the firſt place where the Ark reſided, after they paſt over Jordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kiriath-Jeharim, and at length to Hieruſalem) here in Gilgal it was that Joſua pitched up the 12. ſtones, which were taken out of the channel of Jordan, when it was dry, that the Iſraelites might paſs over it: by which Story, as it is ſet down Joſ. 4. it appears, that the ſame day that they paſſed over Jordan, they lodged at Gilgal. At the ſame Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was that Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mitſpa, whither Samuel came yearly to give judgment, there alſo were often the greateſt meetings held: as that for the revenge of the Levites wife againſt Gibha, and the Benjamites, Joſ. 20. 1. and another againſt the Philiſtims, 1 Sam. 7. 12. Thither alſo Judas Macchabæus gathered the Jews (when Hieruſalem was poſſeſt by the Heathen) as it is 1 Mac. 3. 47. in which place this reaſon of their meeting is added; Quia locus orationi fuerat Mitſpæ anteà Iſraeli. Touching this Mitſpa, to avoid confuſion, it is to be remembred, that the Scriptures mention four places of this name: Mitſpa of Juda, of which Joſ. 15. 38. (c) Mitſpa of Gilead, of which we have ſpoken already in the Tribe of Gad. Mitſpa of the Moabites, where David for a while held himſelf, commending his Parents to the King of Moab, 1 Sam. 22. 3. and laſtly, this chief Mitſpa of the Benjamites. And as in this place the chief meetings were held both before Hieruſalem was recovered from the Jebuſites, and alſo in the time of the Macchabees (as we have ſaid) when Hieruſalem was held by the wicked under Antiochus, ſo alſo in the time of Hieremy, after the deſtruction of the Temple by the Chaldees, Gedaliah whom Nabuchodonoſor left in Jewry, as Governour over thoſe that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: until (to the great hurt of the Jews) he was ſlain by the treaſon of Iſmael, one of the royal blood of Juda, as it is Jerem. 41. b Junius in this place, for Bethel reads Domum Dei fortis, and interprets it Kireath-jearim, where the Ark abode. For (ſaith he) by the Law, Exo. 23. 17. the greateſt meetings in their annual feaſts were to be where the Ark was, but this place doth not ſpeak of feſtival, but of judicial meetings: and beſides the Prieſts did uſe to bring the Ark to their great meetings, whereſoever they were, as appears 1 Sam. 12. 11. & 14. 18. neither is it eaſie to expound Bethel otherwiſe than for the City Bethel: though Junius alſo take it for the place where the Ark was, 1 Sam. 10. 3. (c) It was no other than this Mitſpa of Gilead, of which Joſ. 11. 8. as appears by that which is added, Verſus orientem, for Joſua notes the three quarters, North, Weſt, and Eaſt, to which he followed the Canaanites, though Adrichomius and others out of this place imagine a Mitſpa or Moſpha (as they write it) in the Tribe of Aſſer.

Neer

Neer unto this Mitspa, the Scripture mentioneth Bethcar, after called Aben-Hezer, that is, the Stone of help: where Samuel pitched up the Pillar or Stone, for a Trophey against the Philistims.

Touching Bethel, which (as it seems) was the third place where Samuel held his chief meetings for the ministring of Justice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the issue of Joseph (though it belonged to the portion of Benjamin, as it is Nehem. 11. 31. and Jos. 18. 22.) and how another City called Luz (d) near adjoyning to it, was built by the man of the City which shewed the entrance to the Spies, as it is Jud. 1. and of the occasion of the name from Jacob's vision: and how Jereboam, by erecting one of his calves here, of Bethel (which signifieth the house of God) made it (e) Beth-aven, that is, the house of Vanity, Hos. 4. 15. and 10. 5. as also other memorable things of this place, they are so well known out of the Histories of the Scripture, that we may well pass them over.

(d) 1 Sam. 7. 11. Jos. 16. 1.

(e) Borrowing the name of a neighbour town in the confines of the Kingdom of Juda and Israel between Hai and Bethel, Jos 7. 2. and 18. 12.

The Territory of Bethel, which at the first belonged to the Kingdom of the ten Tribes, from the time of the great victory of Abia against Jeroboam, of which 2 Chron. 13. was taken from them, and adjoyned to the Kingdom of Juda: and so it continued, as appears by the Story of Josias: which performed the Prophecies against the altar of Bethel, 2 Reg. 23. whence those coasts 1 Macc. 11. 34. are called Apherema, which Greek word signifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the ten Tribes. It was one of the three Seigniories, or Perfectures which Demetrius in his Epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Dition of the Jews, out of the Samaritan Country. A part of it, as appears 2 Chron. 13. 19. was Hephrain, which Jos. 18. 23. is called Hophram, belonging to this Tribe of Benjamin.

Not far from this Bethel, in this Tribe, we find three other Cities, often mentioned in the Scriptures, Rama, Gidha, and Geba. Of the name Rama, (f) it is noted already, in the description of Ephraim, that there were many Towns so called, because of their high situation. But whereas they find out Rama in the Tribe of Juda (as it seems, because Matt. 2. it appears that it bordered Bethlehem) and also out of Brochard and Breidenbach make Silo to have been called Rama, and find yet another Rama in Zabulon; these three have no warrant in the Scripture. Of Rama in the Tribe of Asser, as it seems, we have testimony, Jos. 19. 29. and of another in Nephthalim, Jos. 19. 36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim, 1 Sam. 25. 1. which more often is called (g) Ramatha, and 1 Sam. 1. 1. Ramathaim Tsophim: for which the Septuagint have Aramathaim-sophim, taking the Article affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they think Joseph of Aramathæa, Matt. 27. 57. was denominated.

(f) See cap. 9. sect. 2.

(g) Of this Ramatha I understand the place 1 Macc. 11. 34. where it is named for one of the three Prafectures which Demetrius yeelds to the Jews out of the country of Samaria: this lying toward the East to Jericho, and Lydda the West, and Apherema (of which even now we speak) lying in the midst between the two other. A sixth it there was in the Tribe of Simeon toward the South, which Jos. 19. 8. is called Ramath of the South, and otherwise Baalath-beer.

Of a fourth Rama we read, 2 Reg. 8. 29. which is Ramoth in Gilead. The first, which is most often mentioned, is Rama of Benjamin, seated, as we said, near Bethel the uttermost South-border of the Kingdom of the ten Tribes: for which cause Baasha in the time of Asa King of Juda, fortified it, to hinder those that did fly from him to Asa. Of this Rama, or Ramatha, I should rather think Joseph was; that buried Christ: because it was nearer to Hierusalem, and after the Captivity belonged to Judæa, as it appears, Esd. 2. 26. wherein that it is joyned with Geba, it is plain that he speaketh of that Rama with whose stones (after Baasha had ceased to build it) Asa (as it is 1 Reg. 25. 22.) built Gebah adjoyning to it: both being in Benjamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the ten Tribes, so was Gebah the North-border of the Kingdom of Juda: whence 2 Reg. 23. 8. we reade that Josiah through all his Kingdom, even from Gebah, which was the North-border, to Beer-sheba, which was the South-border, destroyed the places of Idolatry.

(h) Gibba in construction, that is, Governing a genitive case, is Gibbath: whence the Vulgar out of the Septuagint read Jos. 24. 33. Gibbath Phinees: for which Junius hath Collis Phineas (for this word is oft-times an Appellative signifying a Hill) but Adrichomius taking notice of this, builds his City Gebaath upon this Text, and placeth it in Benjamin, when as the words adjoyned, note that this Hill was in the Mountains of Ephraim.

The third City Gibha, which was the City of Saul (the wickedness of which City in the time of the Judges had almost utterly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichomius confounds with Gebah, making one of two (as they are evidently distinguished, Esay. 10. 27.) of which word (h) Gibha, in another from Gibbath, he imagineth Gibbaath, another City in this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinity of this City also to Rama of Benjamin appears, Jud. 19. 13. where the Levite vvith his Wife, not able to reach to Rama, took up his lodging at Gibha. By that place of 1 Sam. 22. 6. it seems that there was in this Gibha some Tower or Citadel called Rama: where Junius reads in excelso, for in Rama: but it may be that the name of the Kings Palace in this City, was Rama: as it seems that in Rama of Samuel, the name of the chief place where Samuel with the Colledge of Prophets abode, was Najoth. The great City of Hai overthrown by Josua, which Jos. 7. 2. is placed neer Beth-aven, upon the East of Bethel, was in this Tribe, as is proved, Neh. 7. 10.30. though it be not named by Joſ. c. 18. for it was burned by him and laid deſolate, as it is Joſ. 8. 28. 'In ſolitudinem, in tumulum perpetuum. Another City of chief note is reckoned Joſ. 18.25. In this Tribe was Gibhon, the chief City of the Hevites: whoſe cunning to bind the Iſraelites by oath to ſave their lives, is ſet down, Joſ. 9. whence they were reckoned among the * Nethinæi, or Proſelites, and were bound to certain publick ſervices in the houſe of God: which oath of ſaving theſe Gebeonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God puniſhed by a famine, 2 Sam. 21. 1. This Gibeon, or Gibhon with Almon and Jebah (of both which we have ſpoken) and with Hanothoth the natal place of Hieremy the Prophet, were ſaid *Joſ.*21.28. to be given to the Levites by the Benjamites. Near to this Hanothoth was Nob, as appears, 1 *Reg.*2.26. where Abiathar the Prieſt, which was of Nob before it was deſtroyed by Saul, is ſent to his grounds at Hanothoth. It is reckoned in the Tribe of Benjamin, Neh. 9. 31. and though in the time of Saul the reſiding place of the Ark was at Kireath-jeharim: yet by the lamentable tragedy of bloud-ſhed, which Saul raiſed in this place (as it is ſet down 1 Sam. 21. and 22.) in the judgement of Junius, it is proved that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

* The word Nethinim, or Nethinæi, is as much as dati (as it were a Deo dati) or as Junius expounds it, deditii: it is uſed 1 Chro 9 2. and in Eſdras and Nehemias often.

Micmas alſo in this Tribe, Nehem. 9. 31. was a place of fame, of which Eſay. 10. 28. where alſo he nameth Gallim, and Migrom in this Tribe. In Micmas Saul had his Camp, 1 Sam. 13. 2. (when he left Gibha to Jonathan) and there alſo was Jonathan Maccabæus his abode, 1 Macc. 9. 73. Of Giſcala in Galilee Joſephus makes often mention, but of any here in Benjamin, which they make the natal place of Saint Paul, whence (they ſay) when it was taken by the Romans, he ſailed with his parents to Tharſis, of this I find no good warrant. Other places of leſs importance I omit, and come to the City of Hieruſalem, and the Princes and Governours of this City: A great part whereof was in the Tribe of Benjamin, whence Joſ. 18. 28. it is named among the Cities of Benjamin.

§. II.

Of divers memorable things concerning Hieruſalem.

AT what time Hieruſalem was built (which afterward became the Princeſs of all Cities) it doth not appear. Some there are who imagine that Melchiſedec was the Founder thereof in Abraham's time. But, * according to others, that City out of which Melchiſedec encountred Abraham (in his return from the overthrow of the Aſſyrian and Perſian Kings or Captains, when Lot was made priſoner) ſtandeth by the River of Jordan, in the half Tribe of Manaſſe bordering Zabulon, which was alſo called Salem, and by the Greeks Solima. * See in the hither half of Manaſſe.

Hieruſalem (whenſoever, or by whomſoever built) was a principal City in Joſua his time: yet not ſo renowned as Hazor the Metropolis (in thoſe dayes and before) of all the Canaanites. Adonizedek (whom Joſua ſlew) was then King of Hieruſalem. That it was belonging to the Jebuſites it is manifeſt: for how long ſoever they held it before Moſes time, they were Maſters and Lords thereof almoſt 400. years after him: even till David wan it: and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Jebuſæi (the children of Jebuſæus the ſon of Canaan) built; after whom it was called Jebus. And ſo much did that Nation rely on the ſtrength of the place, as when David attempted it, they bragged that their lame, and blind, and impotent people ſhould defend it. 2 Sam. 5. 6

David, after he had by Gods aſſiſtance poſſeſt it, and turned out the Jebuſites, gave it an exceeding great increaſe of circuit; ſtrengthened it with a Citadel or Caſtle: and beautified it with many Palaces, and other buildings: changing the name from Jebuſſalem, the City of the Jebuſites, to Hieruſalem, which the Greeks call Hieroſolima. After David's time Solomon amplified, beautified and ſtrengthened it exceedingly. For beſides the work of the Temple, which was no leſs admirable than renowned among all Nations, the Palaces, Gates, and Wals, could not any where in the world be exampled: and beſides, that it had 150000. Inhabitants, the women and children not accounted. The ditch had 60. foot depth, cut out of the very rock: and 250. foot of breadth: whereof the like hath ſeldome been heard of, either ſince or before. Joſ. cont. Ap. l. 1. Strab. geog. l. 16.

After the death of Solomon, and that the Kingdom of the Jews was cut aſunder, Shiſhac King of Egypt, and his Predeceſſor, having bred up for that purpoſe Adad the Idumæan, and Jeroboam Solomon's ſervant; and both married to Egyptians: the State by the one diſturbed, by the other broken: Shiſhac firſt invaded the Territory of Juda, entred Hieruſalem, and ſack't it, and became Maſter not only of the riches of Solomon, but of all thoſe ſpoyls which David had gotten from Adadezer, Tohu, the Ammonites, and other Nations. It was again ſack't, and a part of the wall thrown down by Joas King of Iſrael; 2 Chro. 12. 2 King. 14

2 King. 16 while Amasia the twelfth King thereof governed Juda.

Not long after, Achas the fifteenth King of Juda impoverished the Temple, and presented Teglatphalasser with the treasures thereof. And Manasses the son of Ezekiah, the son of Achaz, by the vaunts made by Ezekiah, to the Embassadors of Merodach, lost the remain, and the very bottom of their treasures. It was again spoyled by the Babylonians, Joakim then reigning. But this ungrateful, Idolatrous and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by these Gods gentle corrections and afflictions, but persisting in all kind of impiety, filling the City even to the mouth with innocent bloud, God raised up that great Babylonian King Nebuchodonosor, as his scourge and revenger, who making this glorious City and Temple, with all the Palaces therein, and the Wals and Towers which embraced them, even and level with the dust, carried away the spoyls with the Princes and people, and crusht them with the heavy yoak of bondage and servitude full seventy years, insomuch as Sion was not only become as a torn and plowed-up field, Hierusalem an heap of stones, and rubble, the Mountain of the Temple as a grove, or wood of thorns and briars, but (as Hierome speaketh) even the birds of the Ayre scorned to flie over it, or the beasts to tread on that defiled soil.

1 Chron. 5. 26. 2 King 25. 2 King. 19. 2 Par. 18. Mich. 3. Hier. 25. 26. 29.

Then 70. years being expired, according to the Prophecy of Daniel, and the Jews by the grace of Cyrus returned: the Temple was again built, though with interruption and difficulty enough: and the City meanly inhabited, and without Wals or other defences, for some 60. and odd years, till Nehemia by the favour of Artaxerxes re-built them. Then again was the Temple and City spoyled by Bagoses, or Vagoses, the Lievtenant of Artaxerxes: after by * Ptolomæus the first; then by Antiochus Epiphanes: and again by Apollonius his Lievtenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed, though Crassus in his Parthian expedition took as much as he could of that which Pompey spared.

Hier. tom 3 trad Heb. Neh 12. 34. &c.

* The first of the Egyptian Kings after Alexander Macedon, who dissembling his Religion, came up to Hierusalem to offer sacrifice. Jos. 12. ant. 1.

But the damages which it sustained by the violence of sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompenced by the industry or bounty of good Princes, the voluntary contribution of the people, and the liberality of strangers. Before the captivity, the people of the Land, through the exhortation of godly Kings, made many and large offerings to repair the Temple of Solomon. The wrong done by Ptolomæus Lagi to the second Temple, was requited by the bounty of his son Ptolomæus Philadelphus. The mischief wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes and his followers, was amended partly by the great offerings which were sent to Hierusalem out of other Nations. Finally, all the losses, which either the City or Temple had endured, might well seem forgotten in the reign of Herod, that usurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the City, new built the Temple, and with many sumptuous works did so adorn them, that he left them far more stately and glorious than they had been in the dayes of Solomon.

§. III.

Of the destruction of Hierusalem by the Romanes.

IN this flourishing estate it was at the coming of our Saviour Christ Jesus: and after his death and ascension, it so continued about fourty years. But then did Titus the Romane, being stirred up by God to be the revenger of Christ his death, and to punish the Jews sinful ingratitude, incompasse it with a Romane Army, and became Lord thereof. He began the siege at such time as the Jews from all parts were come up to the celebration of the Passeover: so as the City was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts: and no manner of provision or store for any such multitudes. An extreme famine, with the civil dissension, oppresst them within the Wals; a forcible enemy assailed them without. The Idumæans also, who lay in wait for the destruction of the Jews Kingdom, thrust themselves into the City, of purpose to betray it: who also burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonosor took it. And to be short, there perished of all sorts, from the first besieging, to the consummation of the victory, eleven hundred thousand souls: and the City was so beaten down and demolished, as those which came afterward to see the desolation thereof, could hardly believe that there had been any such place or habitation. Only the three Herodian Towers, (works most magnificent, and overtopping the rest) were spared, as well for lodgings for the Romane Garrisons, as that thereby their victory might be the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and state remaining, after ages might judge what the rest were; and their honour be the greater and more shining, that thereover became victorious.

1 Esd. 4. 45.

After this, such Jews as were scattered here and there in Judæa, and other Provinces, began again to inhabit some part of the City; and by degrees to re-build it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and Tributaries to the Roman State: but after 65. years, when they again offered to revolt and rebel, Ælius Adrianus the Emperour slaughtered many thousands of them, and overturned those three Herodian Towers, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himself had foretold; That there should not stand one stone upon another of that ungrateful City. Afterward, when his fury was appeased, and the prophecy accomplished, he took one part without the Wall, wherein stood Mount Calvary, and the Sepulchre of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, he again made it a City of great capacity, and called it after his own name, Ælia Capitolia. In the gate toward Bethel, he caused a Sow to be cut in Marble, and set it in the front thereof, which he did in despight of the Jews Nation: making an Edict, that they should not from thence-forth ever enter into the City, neither should they dare so much as to behold it from any other high place over-topping it.

Guil. Tyr. bell. sacr. l. 14. c. 12. But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palæstina, it was inhabited at length by all Nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued 500. years.

Onuphrius Chron. It was afterward in the 636. year after Christ, taken by the Egyptian Saracens, who held it 400. and odd years.

In the year 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Buillon, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens; which Godfrey, Guil. Tyr. l. 8. c. 5. 18. 19. &c. when he was elected King thereof, refused to be crowned with a Crown of Gold, because Christ, for whom he fought, was therein crowned with thorns. After this recovery, it remained under the Successours of Godfrey fourscore and eight years: till in the year 1197. it was regained by Saladine of Egypt: and lastly, in the year 1517. in the time of Selim, the Turks cast out the Egyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzumbarec, or the Holy City. Neither was it Jerusalem alone that had so often times been beaten down and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the World have with their Inhabitants, in several times and ages, suffered the same shipwrack. And it hath been Gods just will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not onely to punish the impiety of men, by famine, by the sword, by fire, and by slavery; but he hath revenged himself of the very places they possest; of the wals and buildings, yea, of the soil and the beasts that fed thereon.

For, even that land, sometime called holy, hath in effect lost all her fertility and fruitfulness; witness the many hundreds of thousands which it fed in the dayes of the Kings of Juda and Israel: it being at this time all over, in effect, exceeding stony and barren. It also pleased God, not onely to consume with fire from Heaven the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very soil it self hath felt, and doth feel the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beasts that belonged to Amalec, no not any small number of them to be sacrificed to himself: neither was it enough that Achan himself was stoned, but that his moveables were so consumed and brought to ashes.

§. IV.

Of the vain and malicious reports of Heathen Writers, touching the ancient Jews.

OF the original of the Jews, prophane Writers have conceived diversly and injuriously. Quintilian speaks infamously of them, and of their Leader; who (saith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Egyptians. Others affirm, that while Isis governed Egypt, the people were so increased, as Jerosolymus and Judas led thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions: which might be meant by Moses and Aaron: for the name of Moses was accidental, because he was taken up and saved out of the waters. But Justine, of all other most malicious, doth Justin. l. 36 derive the Jews from the Syrian Kings; of whom, Damascus, saith he, was the first: and to him succeeded Abraham, Moses, and Israel. He again supposeth (somewhat contrary to himself) that Israel had ten sons, among whom he divided the land of Juda; so called of Judas his eldest, who had the greatest portion. The youngest of the sons of Israel he calleth Joseph: who being brought up in Egypt, became learned in Magical Arts, and in the interpretation of Dreams, and signs prodigious; and this Joseph (saith he) was father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their foul diseases, and lest they should infect others, were banished Egypt. Further, he telleth how these men thus banished, when in the Desarts they suffered extream thirst and famine, and therein found relief the seventh day, for this cause ever after observed the seventh day, and kept it Holy; making it a law among themselves, which afterward became a branch of their Religion. He addeth also, that they might not marry marry out of their own Tribes, leſt diſcovering their uncleanneſs, they might alſo be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Egyptians. Theſe and the like fables hath Juſtine.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as groſly belie them, in affirming, that in the inmoſt Oratory of their Temple, they had the golden head of an Aſs, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himſelf, having in the fifth book of his own Hiſtory truly confeſſed of the Jews, that they worſhipped one onely God: and thought it moſt prophane to repreſent the Deity by any material figure, by the ſhape of a man, or any other creature: and they had therefore in their Temples no Image or Repreſentation, no not ſo much as in any City by them inhabited. Somewhat like this hath Alexander Polyhiſtor, in Stephanus; who alſo makes Judas with Idumæa, the firſt parents of the Jews.

Cited by Stephanus in Judæa.

Claudius Iolaus draws them from Judæus, whoſe parents were Sparton and Thebis; whence it came, that the Spartans or Lacedæmonians challenged kinred of the Hebrews: but they did it as deſcended of Abraham, ſaith Joſephus. Some of theſe reports ſeem to have been gathered out of divine letters, though wreſted and perverted, according to the cuſtom of the Heathen. For ſo have they obſcured and altered the Story of the Creation, of Paradiſe, of the Flood; and given new names to the children of Adam in the firſt age, to Noah and his ſons in the ſecond: and ſo to Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, Moſes, and the reſt of the Fathers, and Leaders of the Hebrews: all which feignings, as touching the Jews and their originals, Joſephus againſt Appion, and Tertullian have ſufficiently anſwered. For that the Hebrews were the children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: and ſo Chaldæans originally, taking name either of Heber, the ſon of Sale, or elſe (ſaith Montanus) of wandring, as is before remembred. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greek Grammarian, derive the Hebrews, or Jews, from Arabon; having miſtaken the name of Abraham, who was the ſon of Heber, in the ſixth deſcent. Their ancient names were firſt changed by the two grand-children of Abram: for after Jacob, otherwiſe Iſrael, the chief part were called Iſrael, another part after Eſau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Jacob, being moſt of the Tribe of Juda, honoured the name of Judas, the ſon of Jacob, and became Judæans, or Jews: as alſo for a time in the name of Ephraim the ſon of Joſeph, the chief of the Patriarchs of the ten Tribes, the reſt of the ten Tribes were comprehended: but were firſt rooted out when the Kingdom of Iſrael fell. The Judæans continued their names, though they ſuffered the ſame ſervitude not long after, under Nabuchodonoſor.

Ten in Apol.

Caleb. f 63.

The government which this Nation under-went, was firſt paternal: which continued till they ſerved the Egyptians. They were ſecondly ruled by their Captains and Leaders, Moſes and Joſua, by a policy Divine. Thirdly, they ſubjected themſelves to Judges. Fourthly, they deſired a King, and had Saul for the firſt: Of whom, and his Succeſſours, before we intreat, we are firſt to ſpeak of their government under Judges, after the death of Joſua: with ſomewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about theſe times.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the memorable things that happened in the World, from the death of Joſua, to the War of Troy: which was about the time of Jephtha.

§. I.

Of the Inter-regnum after Joſua's death: and of Othoniel.

WHen Joſua was now dead, who with the advice of the 70. Elders, and the high Prieſt, held authority over the people, and ordered that Common-weal: it pleaſed God to direct the Tribe of Juda (in whom the Kingdom was afterward eſtabliſhed) to undertake the War againſt the Canaanites, over whom (with Gods favour, and the aſſiſtance of Simeon) they became victorious.

In the firſt attempt which they made, they not onely ſlew ten thouſand, but made Adonibezek priſoner: the greateſt and cruelleſt Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizites. This tyrants cruelty, as elſewhere hath been ſignified, they returned in the ſame kind upon his own head: and ſo by the torments which he now felt in his own perſon (before (before no otherwise known unto him but by his malicious imagination) made him confess and acknowledge Gods judgments against himself.

The Tribes of Juda and Simeon did also master and possess during this Inter-regnum (or as some think, before the death of Josua) the Cities of Azotus, Askolon, Ekron, and Hierusalem, which they burnt, and the Jebusites after re-edified. They took also the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriathsepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it be not set down in expres words that any one person commanded in chief over the people, as Moses and Josua did: yet it seemeth that Caleb was of greatest authority among them: and that he, with the advice of Phinees, directed and ordered their wars. For if any think that they proceeded without a Chief, the good success which followed their undertakings, witnesseth the contrary. And it was Caleb, even while Josua governed, as appears, Jos. 10. 39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the rest of the Captains: for the performance of which enterprise, he promised his daughter Achsah: which he performed to Othoniel his younger brother after the conquest: whose behaviour in that service was such, as (next unto the ordinance of God) it gave him the greatest reputation among them, and may be esteemed the second cause of his preferment and election for their first Judge soon after. But while those of Juda made war with their borderers, from whom they onely recovered the mountainous Countries (for they could not drive out the Inhabitants of the Vallies, because they had Chariots of Iron.) The rest of the Tribes sought also to enlarge and establish their own Territories. In which war they laboured with variable success: for as the house of Joseph recovered Bethel, or Luz, from the Hittites, so did the Amorites recover from Dan all the plain Countries, and forc't them to save themselves in the Mountains. And now the Israelites, unmindful of Gods benefits, and how often he had miraculously a-fore-time defended them, and made them victorious over their enemies (the Elders being also consumed, who better advised them in the Inter-regnum) did not only joyn themselves in marriage with the Heathen Nations: but (that which was more detestable) they served the Idols of Baal, and Asteroth, with other the dead gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God, whom they had provoked with their Idolatry, deliver them into the hands of the Aramites of Mesopotamia, whom Chusan Rishathaim at that time commanded.

Judg. 1. 30

But after they had felt the smart of Gods displeasure against them eight years, it pleased him to have compassion on his people, and to raise up Othoniel to be their Judge and Leader: who by God assisted, delivered his brethren from oppression, and inforced the Aramites to return into their own Desarts, and into Mesopotamia adjoyning: after which the Israelites had peace fourty years, during all the time of Othoniels government. This Othoniel is thought by Tostatus, to have been the younger brother of Caleb, for as much as in the book of Judges, he is twice called Othoniel, the son of Cenaz, Calebs younger brother. Others do rather interpret those words [Calebs younger brother] as if they signified the meanest of his kinred. Indeed it is not likely that Calebs Daughter should marry with her own Uncle; yet it follows not therefore that Othoniel should have been the meanest of the kinred. Wherefore we may better think that he was the Nephew of Caleb, (as some learned men expound it) and as the very words of Scripture seem to enforce. For Caleb was the son of Jephunneth, and Othoniel the son of Cenas, Calebs younger brother; that is, he was not brother to Caleb, but his younger brothers son; to whom it was not onely lawful, but commendable to marry with his Cousin German Calebs Daughter.

Judg. 3. 10.

How long it was from the death of Josua, to the government of Othoniel, it cannot be found: but it seems to have been no short time. For many wars were made in that space against the people of the Land. Laish was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the best Writers are of opinion, that between the times of Josua and Othoniel, that civil war brake out between the Benjamites and the rest of Israel, for the forcing to death of the Levites Wife. For it is written, that in those dayes there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his own eyes. And as Juda led the people against the Canaanites, during the Inter-regnum, so was he commanded to do against Benjamin, even by the Lord God, whose direction they craved, as wanting a Judge to appoint what should be done; which sheweth it to have been when Josua was dead, and before the government of Othoniel, especially considering, that all other times wherein they wanted Governours, were spent under such oppression of strangers, as would have given them no leave to have attempted such a civil war, if their power had been as great, as it was in the managing of this action; wherein they so weakened the body of their estate, by effusion of blood, that in many ages they

Judg. 17. & 18. & 19.

they could not bring into the field ſuch numbers as formerly they had muſtered againſt their bordering enemies.

§. II.

Of the memorable things of this age in other Nations: and of the difficulty in the computation of times.

THere lived in this age of Othoniel, Pandon, or Pandareus, according to Homer, the fifth King of Athens; who began to rule in the twentieth year of Othoniel, and governed forty years. He was father to Erictheus: his daughters were Progne and Philomela, ſo greatly mentioned in fables.

Cadmus alſo about this time obtained Thebes: of whoſe daughter Semele was born Dionyſius, or Liber Pater: under whom Linus the Muſician lived. In his time alſo the Cities of Melus, Paphus, and Tharſus were built.

Ida and Dactylus flouriſhed in this age, who are ſaid to have found out the uſe of Iron: but Geneſis hath taught us the contrary, and that Tubalcain long before wrought cunningly both in Iron and Braſs. Not long after this time, Amphion and Zethus governed Thebes: whom divers Chronologers find in Ehuds time. But S. Auguſtine making a repetition of thoſe fables, which were deviſed among the Grecians and other Nations, during the government of the Judges, begins with Triptolemus, of whoſe parentage there is as little agreement. Vives upon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Auguſtine de Civit. Dei, and the eighteenth book, hath gathered all the opinions of this mans progeny, where he that deſires his pedigree may find it. Lactantius and Euſebius make him native of Attica: and the ſon of Eleuſius King of Eleuſina: which Eleuſius by careful induſtry had fed the people of that Territory in the time of a great famine. This, when upon the like occaſion Triptolemus could not perform, fearing the fury of the people, he fled thence by Sea in a kind of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prow a graven or carved Serpent; who becauſe he made exceeding great ſpeed to return and to relieve his people with Corn from ſome neighbour Nation: it was feigned by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the air.

Gen. 4. 22. Whence came the name of Vulcan by Apharesis of the two firſt letters.

Aug. de civit. Dei, l. 18. c. 13.

Whether the times of theſe Kings, which lived together with Othoniel, and after him, with the reſt of the Judges and Kings of Iſrael and Juda, be preciſely ſet down, I cannot avow; for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars; to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life: and therefore I deſire to be excuſed, if in theſe compariſons I erre with others of better judgment. For whether Euſebius and all that follow him, or his oppoſites (who make themſelves ſo converſant with theſe ancient Kings, and with the very year when they began to rule) have hit the mark of time, of all other the fartheſt off and moſt defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. Firſt, becauſe the Authors themſelves, from whom the ancienteſt Chronologers have borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their own works, but conjecture. Secondly, becauſe their own diſagreement and contention in thoſe elder dayes, with that of our own age among the labourers in times, is ſuch, as no man among them hath yet ſo edified any mans underſtanding, ſave his own; but that he is greatly diſtracted, after what pattern to erect his buildings.

This diſagreement is found not onely in the reigns of Heathen Kings and Princes; but even in the computation of thoſe times which the indiſputable authority of holy Scripture hath ſummed up, as in that of Abrahams birth; and after in the times of the Judges and the oppreſſions of Iſrael; in the times from the egreſſion to the building of Solomon's Temple, in the Perſian Empire, the ſeventy Weeks, and in what not? Whereſoever the account of times may ſuffer examination, the arguments are oppoſite, and contentions are ſuch, as for ought that I ſee, men have ſought by ſo many wayes to uncover the Sun, that the days thereby are made more dark, and the clouds more condenſed than before: I can therefore give no other warrant, than other men have done in theſe computations: and therefore that ſuch and ſuch Kings and Kingdoms took beginning in this or that year, I avow it no otherwiſe than as a borrowed knowledge, or at leaſt as a private opinion: which I ſubmit to better judgments. Nam in priſcis rebus veritas non ad unguem quærenda; In ancient things we are not to require an exact narration of the truth, ſayes Diodore.

§. III.

Of Ehuds time, and of Proſerpina, Orithya, Tereus, Tantalus, Tytius, Admetus, and others that lived about theſe times.

AFter the death of Othoniel, when Iſrael fell back to their former Idolatry, God incouraged Moab to invade and ſuppreſs them: to perform which, he joyned the forces forces of Ammon, and Amalec unto his own, and so (as all kind of misery readily findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawn his help from, thereby to make them feel the difference between his grace and his displeasure) these Heathen neighbouring Nations had an easie conquest over Israel, whom God himself exposed to those perils, within which they were so speedily folded up. In this miserable estate they continued full eighteen years under Eglon King of the Moabites and his confederates. Yet, as the mercies of God are infinite, he turned not his ears from their crying repentance: but raised up Ehud the son of Gera to deliver them: by which weak man, though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the justness of his quarrel, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of those valiant Nations, he resolved to attempt upon the person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguish, he assured himself of the following victory: especially giving his Nation no time to re-establish their government, or to choose a King to command and direct them in the Wars. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an Embassadour to Eglon, loaden with presents from the Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining private access, upon the pretence of some secret to be revealed, he pierc't his body with a Poniard, made of purpose with a double edge: and shutting the doors of his closet upon him, escaped.

It may seem, that being confident of his good success, he had prepared the strength of Israel in readiness. For suddenly after his return, he did re-pass Jordan, and invading the Territory of Moab, overthrew their Army, consisting of 10000. able and strong men: whereof not any one escaped. After which victory, and that Samgar his Successor had miraculously slain 600. Philistims with an Ox goad: the Land and People of Israel lived in peace unto the end of fourscore years from the death of Othoniel, which term expired in the Worlds year 2691.

In the dayes of Ehud, Naomi, with Elimelech her husband, and with her two sons, travelled into Moab, and so the story of Ruth is to be referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourscore years which are given to Ehud, it was that Orcus King of the Molossians, otherwise Pluto, stole Proserpina, as she walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hipponium in Sicilia: or (according to Pausanias) by the River Cephisus, which elsewhere he calleth Chemer, if he mean not two distinct Rivers. This stealth being made known to Pyrithous, with whom Hercules and Theseus joyned themselves, they agreed together to recover her: but Pluto, or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they say) a very huge Dog, which fastened on Pyrithous, and tare him in pieces, and had also worried Theseus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him, and by strength took and mastered the Dog Cerberus: whereof grew the fable of Hercules his delivering Theseus out of Hell. But Zezes, as I take it, hath written this story somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Pyrithous, saith he, attempted to steal Proserpina Daughter to Aidonius, King of the Molossians, who had Ceres to Wife, the mother of Proserpina: Proserpina being a general name also for all fair women. This purpose of theirs being known to Aidonius, Theseus and Pyrithous were both taken; and because Pyrithous was the principal in this conspiracy, and Theseus drawn on by a kind of affection or inforcement, the one was given for food to Aidonius his great Dog Cerberus, the other held prisoner, till Hercules, by the instigation of Eurisitheus, delivered him by strong hand. The Molossi, which Stephanus writes with a single (s) were a people of Epirus, inhabiting near the Mountains of Pindus: of which Mountains Oeta is one of the most famous, where Hercules burnt himself. The River of Acheron (which the Poets describe to be in Hell) riseth out of the same Hills. There is another Nation of the Molossi in Thessali: but these are neighbours to the Cassiopæi, saith Plutarch in his Greek questions.

The rape of Orithya, the daughter of Erytheus, King of Athens, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets ascribe this rape to the North-wind, because Thrace is situate North from Athens. In this time also Tereus ravished Philomela, of which the fable was devised of her conversion into a Nightingale. For Tereus having married her sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to see her sister, forced her in her passage, and withall cut out her tongue, that she might not complain; perswading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way: all which her brother-in-laws mercileſs behaviour towards her, Philomela expressed by her needle upon cloath, and sent unto Progne. In revenge whereof, Progne caused her onely son Itys to be cut in pieces, and set before Tereus her husband, so drest as it appeared to be some other ordinary food: of which when he had eaten his fill, she caused his head, hands and feet, to be presented unto him: and then fled away with such speed towards Athens, Paus. in An.

Athens, where her Father Pandion yet lived, as the Poets feigned, that ſhe was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo finds to be Daulis, in Phocis: and the Tomb of Tereus, Pauſanias hath built near the Rocks Mergi, in the Territory of Athens. By which, as alſo by the name Daulis, where theſe things are ſuppoſed to have been done (whence alſo Philomela is called Daulias ales) it appears that it is true, which Theucydides notes by way of digreſſion in his Peloponneſian War, That this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryſæ, (as the Poets call him Odryſius) but that Phocis a Country in Greece not far from Attica, a City whereof is called Daulia, was in Pandions time inhabited by Thracians, of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion, to have amity with his neighbours, made him his ſon-in-law: as it is good to believe, ſaith Thucydides, that Pandion King of Athens made that alliance with a neighbour King, from vvhom he might have ſuccour, rather than vvith any Tereus, that ſhould have held the Kingdom of Odryſæ, vvhich vvas greatly diſtant from thence. The occaſion that the Poets choſe a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may ſeem to have been, partly becauſe, as Pauſanias ſayes, Daulide nec nidificant, nec habitant in tota circum regione Hirundines; as if a Swallow, remembring the wrong that was there done to her, and her ſiſter, did for ever after hate that place.

Near this time Melampus (who is ſaid to have underſtood the voices of Birds and Beaſts) flouriſhed, being alſo eſteemed for an excellent Phyſician. He reſtored to their former health the Daughters of Prætus King of the Argives, who (as the Poets pleaſe) were made mad by Juno: and thinking themſelves to be Kine, fled into the Woods, fearing to be conſtrained to the Plough: for in thoſe Countries where the ground was light, they did uſe often to plough with Kine.

Pauſ.

In the ſeven and fortieth year of Ehud, Tros began to reign in Dardania, and gave it his own name; about which time Phemone the chief Prieſt of Apollo in Delphos, deviſed the Heroical Verſe,

Of the ſame date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Euſebius makes King of Phrygia: and alſo of that part of which the people were anciently Mæones. Of Tantalus was deviſed the fable that ſome Poets have applied to the paſſion of love: and ſome to the covetous that dare not injoy his riches. Euſebius calls this Tantalus the ſon of Jupiter, by the Nimph Pleta: Diaconus and Didymus in Zezes, give him another mother. He was ſaid to be the ſon of Jupiter, as ſome will have it; becauſe he had that Planet in his aſcendent, betokening Wiſdom and Riches. It is ſaid, that when he made a feaſt to the gods, having nothing more precious, he cauſed his own ſon to be ſlain and dreſt to the banquet: of whom Ceres ate part of one of the ſhoulders; whereby was ſignified, that thoſe men which ſeek after Divine knowledge, prefer nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their own children, of all elſe the moſt deareſt. And where it was deviſed, that he had alwayes Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet ſuffered the torment of hunger and thirſt, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reaſon of his riches) in all delicacy of the world, yet his mind being otherwiſe, and to higher deſires tranſported, he enjoyed no pleaſure at all by the reſt. Of whom Ovid:

Euſeb. præp Evan. l. 2. Zezer. hiſt. 10. chil. 5.

Quærit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacia captat.
Tantalus, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here Tantalus in water ſeeks for water, and doth miſs.
The fleeting fruit he catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This puniſhment, they ſay, was inflicted upon him, for that he diſcovered the ſecrets of the gods: that is, becauſe he taught wiſdom and vertue to mortal men: which ſtory Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly expreſt in Verſe. Others expound this fable otherwiſe, and ſay, That Tantalus, though he excelled in riches, yet being thirſty of more abundance, was never ſatisfied. Of whom Horace againſt covetouſneſs.

Tantalus à labiis ſitiens fugientia captat
Flumina; quid rides? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirſting Tantalus doth catch at ſtreams that from him flee.
Why laugheſt thou? the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceive, where it is feigned of Tantalus, that he gave the Nectar and Ambroſia of the gods, to vain and unworthy men, that he was therefore by them in that ſort puniſhed. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus:

Immortalitatem quod furatus,
Coetaneis convivis.
Nectar Ambroſiamque dedit.

Becauſe that ſtealing immortality,
He did both Nectar and Ambroſia give
To gueſts of his own age, to make them live.

Whereby it was meant, that the ſecrets of Divinity ought not to be imparted to the unpure Vulgar. For as the cleaneſt meats in a foul ſtomack, are therein corrupted, ſo the moſt high and reſerved myſteries are often perverted by an unclean and defiled mind.

Mark 4.11 To you it is given (ſaith Chriſt in Mark) to know the myſtery of the Kingdom of God, but unto them that are without, all things be done in Parables. So it is ſaid of him, that he expounded all things to his Diſciples apart. And therefore doth Gregory Nazianzene infer upon a place of S. Paul: Quod ſi Paulo licuiſſet effari ea, quorum ipſi cognitionem cœlum tertium & uſque ad illud progreſſio ſuppeditavit, fortaſſe de Deo, nobis aliquid amplius conſtaret; If Paul might have uttered the things, the knowledge whereof the third Heavens, and his going thither, did bring unto him, peradventure we might know ſomewhat more of God.

Mark 4.34 Greg in Orat. de recta ratione diſp. de Deo. 2 Cor. 12.

Pythagoras, ſaith Revelin, thought it not the part of a wiſe man, Aſino lyram exponere, aut myſteria, quæ ita reciperet, ut Sus tubam, & fidem graculus, & unguenta Scarabæus: quare ſilentium indixit diſcipulis, nè vulgo divinorum arcana patefacerent, quæ meditando facilius quàm loquendo apprehendantur; To ſet an Aſs to a Harp, or to learn myſteries: which he would handle as a Swine doth a Trumpet, or a Jay a Viol, or Scarabies, and unclean flies ſoveraign ointment. Wherefore he commanded ſilence to his Diſciples, that they ſhould not diſcloſe divine myſteries to the common ſort, which are eaſier learned by meditation than by babling. And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their myſteries among their Prieſts in certain Hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their ſecrets might be hidden from the Vulgar: and that they might beſtow the more time in the contemplation of their covered meanings.

But to proceed with the contemporaries of Aod, or Ehud, with him it is alſo ſaid, that Tytius lived, whom Apollo ſlew, becauſe he ſought to force his mother Latona: Euphorion hath it thus, that Tytius was the ſon of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloved of Jupiter, to avoid Juno's revenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where ſhe was delivered of Tytius: whoſe Mother dying, and himſelf therein nouriſhed, he was therefore called the ſon of the earth. Pauſanias ſpeaking of the grave of this Giant, affirms, that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lie of his ſtature out of Homer:

Porrectúſque novem Tytius per jugera terra.
Aſſiduas atro viſcere paſcit aves. Hom. Od. 11.

Nine furlongs ſtretcht lies Tytius, who for his wicked deeds,
The hungry Birds with his renewing liver daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; That Apollo killing this cruel and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a City in Phocis, it was feigned by the Poets, to the terrour of others, That he was ſtill eaten in Hell by birds, and yet ſtill lived, and had his fleſh renewed.

Admetus, King of Theſſaly, lived alſo in this age, whom it is ſaid that Apollo firſt ſerved as a Herd-man, and afterward, for his excellent wit, was by him advanced; but having ſlain Hyacinthus, he croſt the Helleſpont, and fled into Phrygia: where, together with Neptune, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in brick, for building of the walls of Troy, not by making the bricks leap into their places by playing on his Harp: according to him in Ovid, which ſaith:

Ilion aſpicies, firmataque turribus altis
Mœnia, Apollineæ ſtructa canore lyræ.

Strong Ilion thou ſhalt ſee with walls and towers high,
Built with the harp of wiſe Apollo's Harmony.

Thus the Poets: but others, that he laboured with his hands, as hired in this work. And that he alſo laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megariens witneſs, ſaith Pauſanias. Pauſ. in Att.

In theſe dayes alſo of Ehud, or (as ſome find it) in the dayes of Deborah, lived Perſeus, the ſon of Jupiter and Danae, by whoſe Souldiers (as they ſailed out of Peloponneſus, to ſeek their adventure on Africa ſide) Meduſa, the Daughter and Succeſſor of Phorcus, being weakly accompanied as ſhe hunted, near the Lake Tritan, was ſurpriſed and ſlain: whoſe beauty, when Perſeus beheld, he cauſed her head to be imbalmed, and carried into Greece: the beauty whereof was ſuch, and ſo much admired, and the beholders ſo aſtoniſhed which beheld it, as thereof grew the fiction, That all that looked on Meduſa's head, were turned into ſtones.

Triton a Lake of Africa, which Pliny calleth Pallantias. Didym. in pereg. Hiſt.

Cecrops, the ſecond of that name, and 7. King of Athens, and Acriſius the 13. or, after Euſebius, Euſeb. in Chron. Euſebius, the 14. King of the Argives, began alſo their reigns, as it is ſaid, in the time of this Judge: of which the firſt ruled 40. years, and the ſecond 31. years. Alſo Bellerophon lived in this age, being the ſon of Glaucus, the ſon of Siſyphus: who inticed by Antea, or Sthenobia, the wife of Prætus of the Argives, to accompany her, but refuſing it, ſhe accuſed him to her huſband, that he offered to force her: whereupon Prætus ſent Bellerophon into Lycia, about ſome affairs of weight, between him and his ſon-in-law Jobates: giving ſecret order to Jobates to diſpatch him: but Jobates thinking it diſhonourable to lay violent hands on him, imployed him againſt Chimæra, a Monſter vomiting, or breathing fire. Now the gods (as the report is) pittying his innocency, ſent him the winged Horſe, Pegaſus, ſprung up of the blood of Meduſa, formerly ſlain by the ſouldiers of Perſeus in Africa, to tranſport him; a horſe that none other could maſter or bridle but Minerva: upon which beaſt Bellerophon overcame Chimæra: and performed the other ſervices given him in charge: which done, as he returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambuſh to have ſlain him: but being victorious alſo over all thoſe, he arrived to Jobates in ſafety: whom Jobates for his eminent vertues honoured, firſt with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdom: after which he grew ſo inſolent, as he attempted to flie up to heaven upon his Pegaſus: whoſe pride Jupiter diſdaining, cauſed one of his ſtinging flies ſo to vex Pegaſus, as he caſt off Bellerophon from his back, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died blind; of which burthen Pegaſus being diſcharged (as the fable goeth) flew back to heaven: and being fed in Jupiters own ſtable, Aurora begg'd him of Jupiter to ride on before the Sun. This tale is diverſly expounded; as firſt by ſome, That it pleaſeth God to relieve men in their innocent and undeſerved adverſity, and to caſt down thoſe which are too high minded: according to that which is ſaid of Bellerophon: that when he was expoſed to extream hazard, or rather certain death, he found both deliverance and honour: but waxing overproud and preſumptuous in his glorious fortunes, he was again thrown down into the extremity of ſorrow, and ever-during miſery. Secondly by others, That under the name of Chimæra, was meant a cruel Pyrat of the Lycians, whoſe ſhip had in her prow a Lyon, a Goat in the mid-ſhip, and a Dragon in the ſtearn, of which three beaſts this Monſter Chimæra was ſaid to be compounded, whom Bellerophon purſued with a kind of Galley, of ſuch ſwiftneſs, that it was called the flying Horſe: to whom the invention of ſayls (the wings of a ſhip) are alſo attributed. Many other expoſitions are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not unlikely, that Chimæra was the name of a ſhip, for ſo Virgil calleth one of the greateſt ſhips of Æneas.

Ion alſo, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquity of their parent Javan) derive their name of Iones, is ſaid to have been about Ehuds time: Homer calls them Jaones, which hath a near reſemblance to the word Javan. Perhaps it might be ſo that Ion himſelf took name from Javan: it being a cuſtom obſervable in the Hiſtories of all times, to revive the ancient name of a fore-father, in ſome the principal of his iſſue.

The invaſion of India by Liber-Pater, is by ſome reported as done in this age: but S. Auguſtine makes him far more ancient: placing him between the coming out of Egypt, and the death of Joſua.

Lib. 18 c. 12: de ci. dei. l. 18. c. 15.

About the end of the 80. years, aſcribed to Ehud, and Samgar, Pelops flouriſhed: who gave name to Peloponneſus in Greece, now called Morea.

§. IV.

Of Deborah and her Contemporaries.

AFter Iſrael had lived in peace and plenty to the end of theſe 80. years, they again began to forget the giver of all goodneſs, and many of thoſe being worn out, which were witneſſes of the former miſery, and of Gods deliverance by Ehud; and after him by Samgar; the reſt began to return to their former neglect of Gods commandments. For as Plenty and Peace are the parents of idle ſecurity; ſo is ſecurity as fruitful in begetting and bringing forth both danger and ſubverſion: of which, all eſtates in the world have taſted by interchange of times. Therefore when their ſins were again ripe for puniſhment, Jabin King of Hazor, after the death of Ehud, invaded the territory of Iſrael; and having in his ſervice 900. iron Chariots, beſides the reſt of his forces, he held them in ſubjection twenty years, till it pleaſed God to raiſe up Deborah, the Propheteſs, who incouraged Barac to levy a force out of Nepthalim, and Zabulon, to incounter the Canaanites. That the men of Nepthalim were more forward than the reſt in this action, it may ſeem to have proceeded partly from the authority that Barac had among them, being of the same Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grievance, which in them was more sensible than in others, because Hazor and Haroseth the chief holds of Jabin, were in Nepthalim. So in the dayes of Jeptha the Gileadites took the greatest care, because the Ammonites, with whom the War was, presled most upon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ehud to deliver Israel from the Moabites: and by the counsel and courage of a woman, to free them from the yoak of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Sisera by Jael the Kenites wife: so was it his will at other times, to work the like great things by the weakest means. For the mighty Assyrian Nabuchodonosor, who was a King of Kings, and resistless, he overthrew by his own imaginations, the causers of his brutish melancholy: and changed his matchless pride into the base humility of a Beast. And to approve that he is the Lord of all power, he sometime punisheth by invisible strength, as when he slaughtered the Army of Senacherib by his Angel, or as he did the Egyptians in Moses time: sometime by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharaoh by the waves of the Sea; and the Canaanites by hail-stones in the time of Josua: sometimes by the ministery of men, as when he overthrew the four Kings of the East, Chedorlaomer, and his companions, by the household servants of Abraham. He caused the Moabites and Ammonites to set upon their own confederate the Army of the Edomites; and having slain them, to kill one another in the 2 Chro 20. sight of Jehosaphat: and of the like to these a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Propheteſs speak unto Barac in these words: But this Judg. 49. journey that thou takest, shall not be for thine honour, for the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a Woman. In which victory all the strength of the Canaanite Jabin fell to the ground, even to the last man: in the end of which War it seemeth that Jabin himself also perished, as appeareth by the last Verse of the fourth of Judges.

After all which, Deborah giveth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgement of all his powerfulness, and great mercies, she sheweth the weak estate whereinto Israel was brought for their Idolatry by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations, in these
Jud. 5. v. 18. words: Was there a shield or spear seen among forty thousand of Israel? She also sheweth how the Israelites were severed and amazed, verſ. 17. some of them confined over Jordan, and durst not joyn themselves to the rest; as those of Reuben in Gilead: that the Asherites kept the Sea-coast, and forsook their habitations towards the Land; and the children of Dan, who neighboured the Sea, crept into their ships for safety, shewing thereby that all were dispersed, and all in effect lost. She then cursed the Inhabitants of Meroz, who dwelling near the place of the battel (belike fearing the success) came not out to assist Israel, and then blesseth Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sisera in her Tent: shewing the ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Family of Heber were inforced in that miserable time of subjection, to hold correspondency with Jabin the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them means, they witnessed their love and faith to their ancient Friends. Lastly, she derideth the Mother of Sisera who promised her Son the victory in her own hopes: and fancied to her self, and described the spoils both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, she directeth her praise and thanks to God onely victorious.

From the beginning of Jabins oppression to the end of that peace, which Deborah and Barac purchased unto Israel, there passed 40. years. In which time the Kingdom of Argos, which had continued 544. years, was translated to Mycænæ: The translation of this Kingdom, Vives out of Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Danaus, Lynceus succeeded in Argos, after whom the Children of Abas the son of Lynceus divided the Kingdom: of which Acrisius being eldest, held Argos it self: Prætus his brother possest Ephyra, or Corinth, and Tirynthos, and other Cities, with all the Territory towards the Sea: there being many Monuments in Tirynthos, which witness Prætus possession, saith Pausanias. Pau. in Corinthiacis.

Now Acrisius was foretold by an Oracle, that he should be slain by the son of his Daughter Danae: whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no man might accompany her. But the Lady being exceeding fair, it is fained that Jupiter turned himself into a golden shower: which falling into her lap, begat her with child: the meaning whereof was, that some Kings son, or other worthy man, corrupted her Keepers with gold, and enjoyed her, of whom Perseus was born; who when he grew to mans estate, either by chance (saith Ctesias) or in shewing his grand-father the invention of the discus, or leaden ball, slew him unwillingly. After this, Perseus, to avoid the infamy of Patricide in Argos, changed Kingdomes with his Uncle Prætus: and built Mycænæ. This imprisonment of Danae, Sophocles reporteth otherwise: and that she was incloſed in a brazen vault under the Kings Hall with her Nurſe and Keepers. Upon this cloſe cuſtody Horace hath this witty obſervation:

Incluſam Danaen turris ahenea,
Robuſtæque fores, & vigilum canum
Triſtes excubiæ munierant ſatis
Nocturnis ab adulteris:

Si non Acriſium Virginis abditæ
Cuſtodem pavidum, Jupiter & Venus
Riſiſſent, fore enim tutum iter & patens Converſo in pretium Deo.

Aurem per medios ire ſatellites,
Et perrumpere amat ſaxa, potentius
Ictu fulmineo.

The brazen tower with doors cloſe barr'd,
And watchful bandogs frightful guard,
Kept ſafe the maidenhead
Of Danae from ſecret love:
Till ſmiling Venus, and wiſe Jove
Beguil'd her Fathers dread.
For chang'd into a golden ſhowre,
The god into her lap did poure
Himſelf, and took his pleaſure.
Through guards and ſtony vvals to break,
The thunder-bolt is far more weak,
Than is a golden treaſure.

§. V.

Of Gideon, and of Dædalus, Sphinx, Minos, and others that lived in this Age.

Debora and Barac being dead, the Midianites, aſſiſted by the Amalekites, infeſted Iſrael. For when, under a Judge, who had held them in the fear of the Lord, they had enjoyed any quiet or proſperity: The Judge was no ſooner dead, than they turned to their former impious Idolatry. Therefore now the neighbouring Nations did ſo maſter them in a ſhort time (the hand of God being withheld from their defence) as to ſave themſelves, they crept into caves of the mountains, and other the like places of hardeſt acceſs: their enemies poſſeſſing all the plains and fruitful vallies: and in harveſt time, by themſelves, and the multitude of their cattel, deſtroying all that grew up: covering the fields as thick as graſſhoppers: vvhich ſervitude laſted ſeven years. Jud. 6.

Then the Lord by his Angel ſtirred up Gideon the ſon of Joaſh, afterward called Jerubbaal: vvhoſe fear and unvvillingneſs, and how it pleaſed God to hearten him in his enterprize, it is both largely and preciſely ſet down in the holy Scriptures: as alſo how it pleaſed God by a few ſelect perſons, namely 300. out of 32000. men, to make them know that he onely vvas the Lord of Hoſts. Each of theſe 300. by Gideons appointment carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher, inſtruments of more terrour than force, vvith vvhich he gave the great Army of their enemies an alarum: vvho hearing ſo loud a noiſe, and ſeeing (at the crack of ſo many pitchers broken) ſo many lights about them, eſteeming the Army of Iſrael to be infinite, and ſtrucken vvith a ſudden fear, they all fled vvithout a ſtroke ſtricken, and vvere ſlaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made priſoners and ſlain. Jud. 6. v. 5. Jud. c. 6. & 7.

slain. In his return the Ephramites began to quarrel with Gideon, because he made war without their assistance, being then greedy of glory, the victory being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterprize) would no doubt have held themselves happy by being neglected. But Gideon appeasing them with a mild answer, followed after the enemy, in which pursuit being tyred with travel, and weary even with the slaughtering of his enemies, he desired relief from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end, that (his men being refreshed) he might over-take the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had saved themselves by flight. For they were four Princes of the Nations, which had invaded and wasted Israel: to wit, Oreb and Seeb, which were taken already, and Zebah and Zalmunna; which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, sought the like relief from the Inhabitants of Penuel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these places he threatned therefore the revenge, vvhich in his return from the prosecution of the other two Princes, he performed: to vvit, that he vvould tear the flesh of those of Succoth vvith thorns and briars, and destroy the Inhabitants and City of Penuel. Novv vvhy the people of these two Cities should refuse relief to their brethren the Israelites, especially after so great a victory: if I may presume to make conjecture, it seems likely, first, that those Cities set over Jordan, and in the vvay of all invasions, to be made by the Moabites, Ammonites and Midianites, into Israel, had either made their own peace with those Nations, and were not spoyled by them; or else they knowing that Zeba and Zalmunna were escaped with a great part of their Army, might fear their revenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these men: as it is not rare to find of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of men, especially of those which follow the war, that both envy and maligne others, if they perform any praise-worthy actions, for the honour and safety of their own Country, though themselves may be assured to bear a part of the smart of contrary success. And such malicious hearts can rather be contented that their Prince and Country should suffer hazzard and want, than that such men as they mislike, should be the authors or actors of any glory or good to either.

Now Gideon, how or whereſoever it were that he refreshed himself and his weary and hungry Souldiers, yet he followed the opportunity, and pursued his former victory to the uttermost: and finding Zebah and Zalmunna in Karkor (suspecting no further attempt upon them) he again surprized them, and slaughtered those 15000. remaining: having put to the sword in the former attempt 120000. and withall he took Zebah and Zalmunna prisoners: whom because themselves had executed Gidion's brethren before at Tabor, he caused them both to be slain: or (as it is written) at their own request slew them with his own hands, his Son whom he first commanded to do it, refusing it; and in his return from the consummation of this marvellous victory, he took revenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Penuel: forgiving no offence committed against him, either by strangers, or by his brethren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his own children found soon after his death, according to that which hath been said before. The debts of cruelty and mercy are never left unsatisfied: for as he slew the 70. Elders of Succoth, with great and unusual torments, so were his own 70. sons, all but one, murthered by his own bastard Abimelec: The like Analogy is observed by the Rabbines, in the greatest of the plagues which God brought upon the Egyptians, who having caused the male children of the Hebrews to be slain, others of them to be cast into the River and drowned: God rewarded them even with the like measure, destroying their own first-born by his Angel, and drowning Pharaoh and his Army in the Red Sea. And hereof a world of examples might be given both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

In the end so much did the people reverence Gideon in the present for his victory, and there own deliverance, as they offered him the Soveraignty over them, and to establish him in the Government; which he refused, answering; I will not reign over you, neither shall my childe reign over you, but the Lord shall, &c. Judg. 8. 13. But he desired the people that they would bestow on him the golden ear-rings which every man had gotten. For the Ismaelites, neighbours, and mixt with the Midianites, used to wear them: the weight of all which was a thousand and seven hundred shekles of gold, which makes of ours 2380. li. if we follow the account of the shekle vulgar. And because he converted that gold into an Ephod, a garment of gold, blew silk, purple, scarlet, and fine linen, belonging to the High Priest only, and set up the same in his own City of Ophra or Ephra, which drew Israel to Idolatry, the Exod. 28. Judg. 8. 28.

A place in Bethan, as it is thought Jud 8. 10.

ſame was the deſtruction of Gideon and his houſe.

There was another kind of Ephod beſides this of the High Prieſts, which the Levites uſed, and ſo did David when he danced before the Ark: and Samuel while he was yet young, which was made of linnen only.

Now if any man demand how it was poſſible for Gideon with 300. men to deſtroy 120000. of their enemies, and afterward 15000. which remained, we may remember, that although Gideon with 300. gave the firſt alarm, and put the Midianites in rout and diſorder; yet all the reſt of the Army came in to the ſlaughter, and purſuit: for it is written; That the men of Iſrael being gathered together out of Nephtaly, and out of Aſher, and out of Manaſſe, purſued after the Midianites: for this Army Gideon left in Tents behind him, when he went down to view the Army of his enemies, who with the noiſe of his 300. trumpets came after him to the execution. Judg.7.23

There lived with Gideon, Ægeus, the ſon of Pandion, who reigned in Athens: Euryſtheus King of Mycenæ: Atreus and Thyeſtes the ſons of Pelops, who bare dominion over a great part of Peloponneſus, and after the death of Euryſtheus, the Kingdom of Mycenæ fell into the hand of Atreus. This is that Atreus, who holding his brother in jealouſie, as an attempter, both of his Wife and Crown, ſlew the children of Thyeſtes, and cauſing their fleſh to be dreſt, did therewith feaſt their father. But this cruelty was not unrevenged. For both Atreus and his ſon Agamemnon was ſlain by a baſe ſon of Thyeſtes, yea the grand children, and all the linage of Atreus died by the ſame ſword.

In Gideon's time alſo thoſe things were ſuppoſed to have been done, which are written of Dædalus and Icarus. Dædalus, they ſay, having ſlain his Nephew Attalus, fled to Minos, King of Crete, for ſuccour; where for his excellent workmanſhip he was greatly eſteemed, having made for Minos a Labyrinth, like unto that of Egypt. Afterward he was ſaid to have framed an artificial Cow for Paſiphae the Queen, that ſhe, being in love with a fair Bull, might by putting her ſelf into the Cow, ſatisfie her luſt; a thing no leſs unnatural than incredible, had not that ſhameleſs Emperour Domitian exhibited the like beaſtly ſpectacle openly before the people of Rome, in his Amphitheater; of purpoſe, as may ſeem, to verifie the old Fable. For ſo it appears by thoſe Verſes of Martial, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable ſhew, as a goodly Pageant, in thoſe vicious times.

Junctam Paſiphaen Dicteo credite Tauro
Vidimus, accepit fabula priſca fidem.
Neceſe miratur Cæſar, longæva vetuſtas
Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.

But concerning that which is reported of Paſiphae, Servius makes a leſs unhoneſt conſtruction of it, thinking that Dædalus was of her counſel, and her Pandar for the enticeing of a Secretary of Minos called Taurus, which ſignifieth a Bull, who begat her with childe; and that ſhe being delivered of two ſons, the one reſembling Taurus, the other her husband Minos, it was feigned that ſhe was delivered of the Monſter Minotaur, half a Man, and half a Bull. But this practice being diſcovered, and Dædalus appointed to be ſlain, he fled out of Crete to Cocalus King of Sicil: in which paſſage he made ſuch expedition, as it was feigned that he faſhioned wings for himſelf and his ſon to tranſport them. For whereas Minos purſued him with boats which had oares only, Dædalus framed ſails both for his own boat, and for his ſons, by which he out-went thoſe that had him in chaſe. Upon which new invention, Icarus bearing himſelf over-bold, was over-born and drowned.

It is alſo written of Dædalus, that he made Images that could move themſelves, and go, becauſe he carved them with legs, arms, and hands; whereas thoſe that preceded him, could only preſent the body and head of thoſe men, whom they carried to counterfeit, and yet the workmanſhip was eſteemed very rare. But Plutarch, who had ſeen ſome of thoſe that were called the Images of Dædalus, found them exceeding rude.

With Gideon alſo flouriſhed Linus the Theban, the ſon of Apollo, and Terpſichore, who inſtructed Thamaris, Orphæus, and Hercules. He wrote of the Creation, of the Sun and Moons courſe, and of the generation of living Creatures, but in the end he was ſlain by Hercules his Scholar with his own Harp. Herind. Plut Pauſ. l. 9.

Again, in this age thoſe things ſpoken of Sphinx, and Oedipus, are thought to have been performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by ſea and land, was by the Corinthians Army, led by Oedipus, overcome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles, to thoſe whom ſhe maſtered, was meant by the rocky and unacceſſible Mountain near Thebes, which ſhe defended; and by Oedipus diſſolving her probleme, his victory over her. She was painted with wings, becauſe exceeding ſwift, and with the body of a Lion, for her cruelty. But that which Palæphatus reports of Sphinx, were more probable, Strab. l. 9.

bable, did not the time disprove it, for he calls her an Amazonite, and the wife of Cadmus: who when by her help he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the sister of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despightful part, with her own troop she held the Mountain by Thebes, from whence she continued a sharp war upon the Thebans, till by Oedipus overthrown. About this time did Minos thrust his brother out of Crete, and held sharp war with the Megarians and Athenians, because his son Androgeus was slain by them. He possest himself of Megara, by the treason of Scylla, daughter of Nisus the King. He was long Master of the Sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of delivering him every year seven of their sons: which tribute Theseus released, as shall be shewed, when I come to the time of the next Judge Thola. In the end he was slain at Camerinus or Camicus in Sicilia, by Cocalus the King, while he pursued Dædalus: and was esteemed by some to be the first Law-giver to those Islands.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Antæus the Giant, who was said to have 60. and odd cubits of length, which though Plutarch doth confirm, reporting that there was such a body found by Sertorius the Roman, in Lybia, where Hercules slew Antæus: yet for my self I think it but a loud lie. That Antæus was of great strength, and a cunning wrestler, Eusebius affirmeth: and because he cast so many men to the ground, he was feigned to be the son of the earth. Pliny saith, that he inhabited near the Gardens Hesperides in Mauritania. St. Augustine affirms, that this Hercules was not of Greece, but of Lybia: and the Hydra also which he overcame, Plato expoundeth to be a subtle Sophister.

§. VI.

Of the Expedition of the Argonauts.

ABout the eleventh year of Gideon, was the famous expedition of the Argonauts of which many fabulous discourses have been written, the sum of which is this:

Pelias the son of Neptune, brother by the mothers side to Æson, who was Jasons father, reigning in Jolcos a Town of Thessaly, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take heed of him that wore but one shoe. This Pelias afterward sacrificing to Neptune, invited Jason to him, who coming hastily, lost one shoe in passing over a brook: whereupon Pelias demanded of him what course he would take (supposing he were able) against one of whom an Oracle should advise him to take heed? to which question when Jason had briefly answered, that he would send him to Colchos to fetch the golden Fleece, Pelias immediately commanded him to undertake that service. Therefore Jason prepared for the voyage, having a ship built by Argus the son of Phryxus, by the counsel of Pallas: wherein he procured all the bravest men of Greece to sail with him: as Typhis the Master of the ship, Orpheus the famous Poet, Castor and Pollux the sons of Tyndarus, Telamon and Peleus sons of Æacus, and fathers of Ajax and Achilles, Hercules, Theseus, Zetes and Calais the two winged sons of Boreas, Amphiaraus the great Soothsayer, Meleager of Calidon, that slew the great wild Boar, Ascalaphus and Jalmenus, or Almenus, the sons of Mars, who were afterwards at the last war of Troy, Laërtes the father of Ulysses, Atalanta a warlike Virgin, Idas and Lynceus the sons of Apharеus, who afterwards in fight with Castor and Pollux, slew Castor, and wounded Pollux, but were slain themselves: Lynceus by Pollux, Idas by Jupiter with lightning.

These and many other went with Jason in the ship Argo: in whose Prow was a table of the Beech of Dodona, which could speak. They arrived first at Lemnos; the women of which Island, having slain all the males, purposing to lead an Amazonian life, were nevertheless contented to take their pleasure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the Country about Cyzicus: where dwelt a people called Doliones: over whom then reigned one Cyzicus, who entertained them friendly; but it so fell out, that loosing thence by night, they were driven by contrary winds back into his Port, neither knowing that it was the same Haven, nor being known by the Doliones to be the same men: but rather taken for some of their bordering enemies: by which means they fell to blows, insomuch that the Argonauts slew the most part of the Doliones, together with their King Cyzicus: which when by day-light they perceived, with many tears they solemnized his funeral. Then departed they again, and arrived shortly in Mysia, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the son of Elates, who went to seek Hylas the darling of Hercules, that was ravished by the Nymphs.

Polyphemus built a Town in Mysia called Cios, wherein he reigned. Hercules returned to Argos. From Mysia the Argonauts sailed into Bythinia, which then was peopled by the Bebrysses, the ancient Inhabitants of the Country, over whom Amycus the son of Neptune vvas then King. He being a ſtrong man, compelled all ſtrangers to fight vvith him at vvhorlbats, in vvhich kind of fight he had ſlain many, and vvas now himſelf ſlain by Pollux. The Bebryces in revenge of his death flew all upon Pollux, but his companions reſcued him, vvith great ſlaughter of the people. They ſailed from hence to Salmydeſus a Town in Thrace (ſomewhat out of their vvay) wherein Phineus a South-ſayer dwelt, vvho vvas blind, and vexed vvith the Harpies. The Harpies vvere ſaid to be a kind of Birds vvhich had the faces of women, and foul long claws, very filthy creatures, vvhich vvhen the table vvas furniſhed for Phineus, came flying in, and devouring or carrying away the greater part of the victuals, did ſo defile the reſt, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Argonauts craved his advice and direction for their voyage: You ſhall do vvell (quoth he) firſt of all to deliver me from the Harpies, and then afterwards to ask my counſel. Whereupon they cauſed the table to be covered, and meat ſet on; vvhich vvas no ſooner ſet down, than that preſently in came the Harpies, and played their accuſtomed pranks: vvhen Zetes and Calais the vvinged young men ſaw this, they drew their ſwords, and purſued them through the air: Some ſay, that both the Harpies and the young men died of wearineſs in the fight, and purſuit. But Apollonius ſaith, that the Harpies did covenant with the youths, to do no more harm to Phineus, and were thereupon diſmiſſed. For this good turn, Phineus gave them informations of the way, and advertiſed them withall of the dangerous Rocks, called Symplegades, which by force of windes running together, did ſhut up the paſſage; wherefore he willed them to put a Pigeon before them in the paſſage: and if that paſſed ſafe, then to adventure after her; if not, then by no means to hazzard themſelves in vain. They did ſo, and perceiving that the Pigeon had onely loſt a piece of her tayle, they obſerved the next opening of the Rocks, and then rowing with all their might, paſſed through ſafe, onely the end of their Poop was bruiſed.

From thence forward (as the tale goeth) the Symplegades have ſtood ſtill, for the gods, ſay they, had decreed that after the paſſage of a ſhip, they ſhould be fixed. Thence the Argonauts came to the Mariandyni, a people inhabited about the mouth of the river Parthenius, where Lycus the King entertained them courteouſly, Here Idmon a Southſayer of their company was ſlain by a wild Boar, alſo here Typhis dyed: and Ancæus undertook to ſteare the ſhip. So they paſſed by the River Thermodon, and Mount Caucaſus, and came to the River Phaſis, which runs through the land of Colchos. When they were entred the haven, Jaſon went to Æetes the King of Colchos, and told him the Commandment of Pelias, and cauſe of his coming, deſiring him to deliver the golden Fleece; which Æetes, as the Fable goeth, promiſed to do, if he alone would yoak together two brazen hooft Bulls, and plowing the ground with them, ſowe Dragons teeth, vvhich Minerva had given to him, being part of thoſe which Cadmus did ſowe at Thebes. Theſe Bulls were great and fierce and breathed out fire: Vulcan had given them to Æetes.

Whileſt Jaſon was in a great perplexity about this task, Medæa the daughter of Æetes fell into a moſt vehement love of him, ſo far forth, that being excellent in Magique, ſhe came privily to him, promiſing her help if he would aſſure her of his marriage. To this Jaſon agreed, and confirmed his promiſe by oath. Then gave ſhe to him a medicine wherewith ſhe bade him to anoint both his body and his armour, which would preſerve him from their violence: further ſhe told him, that armed men would riſe out of the ground, from the teeth which he ſhould ſowe, and ſet upon him. To remedy which inconvenience, ſhe bade him throw ſtones amongſt them as ſoon as they came up thick, whereupon they would fall together to blows, in ſuch wiſe that he might eaſily ſlay them. Jaſon followed her counſel; whereto when the event had anſwered, he again demanded the Fleece. But Æetes was ſo far from approving ſuch his deſire, that he deviſed how to deſtroy the Argonauts, and burn their ſhip; which Medæa perceiving, went to Jaſon, and brought him by night to the Fleece, which hung on an Oak in the Grove of Mars, where, they ſay it was kept by a Dragon that never ſlept. This Dragon was by the Magick of Medæa caſt into a ſleep: ſo taking away the Golden Fleece, ſhe went with Jaſon into the ſhip Argo; having with her, her brother Abſyrtus.

Æetes underſtanding the practices of Medæa, provided to purſue the ſhip, whom when Medæa perceived to be at hand, ſhe ſlew her brother, and cutting him in pieces, ſhe ſcattered his limbs in divers places; of which Æetes finding ſome, was fain to ſeek out the reſt, and ſuffer his daughter to paſs: the parts of his ſon he buried in a place, which thereupon he called Tomi; the Greek word ſignifieth Diviſion. Afterwards he ſent many of his ſubjects to ſeek the ſhip Argo, threatning that if they brought not back Medæa, they ſhould ſuffer in her ſtead. In the mean while the Argonauts were driven about the Seas, and were come to the River Eridanus: which is Po in Italy.

Jupiter, offended with the ſlaughter of Abſyrtus, vexed them with a great tempeſt, and carried them they knew not whether; when they came to the Iſlands Abſyrtides, there the ſhip Argo, (that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable) ſpake to them and ſaid, that the anger of Jupiter ſhould not ceaſe, till they came to Auſonia, and were cleanſed by Circe, from the murder of Abſyrtus. Now they thereupon ſailing between the coaſts of Lybia and Gallia, and paſſing through the Sea of Sardinia, and alongſt the coaſts of Hetruria, came to the Iſle of Æea, wherein Circe dwelt, who cleanſed them. Thence they ſailed by the coaſt of the Syrens, who ſang to allure them into danger: but Orpheus on the other ſide ſang ſo well, that he ſtayed them. Onely Butes ſwam out unto them, whom Venus raviſhed, and carried to Lylibæum in Sicily to dwell.

Having paſt the Syrens, they came between Scylla and Carybdis, and the ſtragling Rocks, which ſeemed to caſt out great ſtore of flames and ſmoak. But Thetis and the Nereides, conveyed them ſafe through at the appointment of Juno. So they coaſted Sicilie, where the Beeves of the Sun were, and touched at Corcyra, the Iſland of the Phæaces, where King Alcinous reigned. Mean while the men of Colchos, that had been ſent by Ætes in queſt of the ſhip Argo, hearing no news of it, and fearing his anger, if they fulfilled not his will, betook themſelves to new habitations: Some of them dwelt in the Mountains of Corcyre, others in the Iſlands of Abſyrtides, and ſome coming to the Phæaces, there found the ſhip Argo, and demanded Medæa of Alcinous: whereto Alcinous made anſwer, that if ſhe were not Jaſons wife, they ſhould have her; but if ſhe were already married, he would not take her from her husband. Arete, the wife of Alcinous, hearing this, married them: wherefore they of Colchos, not daring to return home, ſtayed with the Phæaces, ſo the Argonauts departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this Iſland Minos reigned, who had a man of braſs given to him (as ſome of the Fablers ſay) by Vulcan. This man had one vein in his body reaching from the neck to the heel, the end whereof was cloſed up with a brazen naile; his name was Talus, his cuſtome was to run thrice a day about the Iſland for the defence of it. When he ſaw the ſhip Argo paſs by, he threw ſtones at it, but Medæa with her Magick deſtroyed him. Some ſay that ſhe ſlew him by potions, which made him mad; others, that promiſing to make him immortal, ſhe drew out the naile that ſtopt his vein, by which means all his blood ran out, and he died: others there are that ſay he was ſlain by Pæan, who wounded him with an arrow in the heel. From hence the Argonauts ſailed to Ægina, where they were fain to fight for freſh water. And laſtly, from Ægina they ſailed by Eubæa and Locris, home to Jolcos, where they arrived, having ſpent four whole months in the expedition.

Some there are that by this journey of Jaſon, underſtand the miſtery of the Philoſophers ſtone, called the golden Fleece, to which alſo, other ſuper-fine Chymiſts draw the twelve labours of Hercules. Suidas thinks, that by the golden Fleece was meant a golden book of Parchment, which is of ſheep-skin, and therefore called golden, becauſe it was taught therein how other metals might be tranſmuted. Others would ſignifie by Jaſon, Wiſdom, and Moderation, which overcometh all perils: but that which is moſt probable, is the opinion of Dercilus, that the ſtory of ſuch a paſſage was true, and that Jaſon with the reſt went indeed to rob Colchos, to which they might arrive by boat. For not far from Caucaſus there are certain ſteep falling torrents which waſh down many grains of Gold, as in many other parts of the World; and the people there inhabiting uſe to ſet many fleeces of wool in thoſe deſcents of waters, in which the grains of gold remain, and the water paſſed thorow, which Strabo witneſſeth to be true. The many rocks, ſtraits, ſands, and currents, in the paſſage between Greece and the bottom of Pontus, are Poetically converted into thoſe fiery Bulls, the armed men riſing out of the ground, the Dragon caſt aſleep, and the like. The man of braſs, the Syrens, Scylla and Charibdis, were other hazzards and adventures which they fell into in the Mediteran Sea, diſguiſed, as the reſt, by Orpheus, under Poetical morals: all which Homer afterward uſed (the man of braſs excepted) in the deſcription of Ulyſſes his travels on the ſame In-land ſeas.

of Abimelech, Tholan, and Jair, and of the Lapythæ, and of Theseus, Hippolytus, &c.

AFter the death of Gideon, Abimelech his base son, begotten on a Concubine of the Sechemites, remembring what offers had been made to his father by the people, who desired to make him and his their perpetual Princes; and, as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his fathers religious modesty) that some of his brethren might take on them the Soveraignty, practised with the Inhabitants of Sechem (of which his mother was native) to make election of himself; who being easily moved with the glory, to have a King of their own, readily condescended: and the better to enable Abimelech, they borrowed seventy pieces of silver
Judg.9.41 of their Idoll Baalberith, with which treasure he hired a company of loose and desperate vagabonds, to assist his first detestable enterprise, to wit, the slaughter of his seventy brethren, the sons of Gideon, begotten on his Wives, of which he had many; of all which none escaped but Jotham
Verse 5. the youngest, who hid himself from his present fury: all which he executed on one stone; a cruelty exceeding all that hath been written of in any age. Such is humane ambition, a monster that neither feareth God (though all-powerfull, and whose revenges are without date, and for everlasting) neither hath it respect to nature, which laboureth the preservation of every being: but it rageth also against her, though garnished with beauty which never dieth, and with love that hath no end. All other passions and affections, by which the souls of men are tormented, are by their contraries often-times resisted or qualified. But ambition, which begetteth every vice, and is it self the child and darling of Satan, looketh onely towards the ends by it self set down, forgetting nothing (how fearfull and inhumane soever) which may serve it: remembring nothing, whatsoever justice, piety, right or religion can offer and alledge on the contrary. It ascribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the error or weakness of the undertakers, and rather praiseth the adventure, than feareth the like success. It was the first sin that the World had, and began in Angels: for which they were cast into Hell, without hope of redemption. It was more ancient than man, and therefore no part of his natural corruption. The punishment also preceded his creation, yet hath the Devil, which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the one as out of date, and to practise the other, as befitting every age, and mans condition.

Jotham, the youngest of Gideons sons, having escaped the present peril, sought by his best perswasions to alienate the Sechemites from the assisting of this mercilesse Tyrant, letting them know, that those which were vertuous, and whom reason and religion had taught the safe and happy estate of moderate subjection, had refused to receive as unlawful, what others had no power to give, without direction from the King of Kings: who from the beginning (as to his own peculiar people) had appointed them by whom and how to be governed. This he taught them by the Olive, which contented it self with its Fatness, the Figge-tree with its sweetness, and the Vine with the good juice it had: the Bramble onely, who was most base, cut down all the rest, and accepted the Soveraignty. He also fore-told them by a Prophetical spirit, what should befall them in the end, and how a fire should come out of the Bramble, and consume the Cedars of Libanon.

Now (as it is an easie matter to call those men back whom rage without right led on) Gaal the son of Ebed withdrew the Citizens of Sechem from the Service of Abimelech: who therefore after some assaults entred the place, and mastered it; and in conclusion fired the Town, wherein their Idoll Baalberith was worshipped, and put all the people of all sorts to the slaughter. Lastly, in the assault of the Castle or Tower of Tebet, himself was wounded in the head with a stone thrown over the wall by a woman; and finding himself mortally bruised, he commanded his own Page to pierce his body, thereby to avoid the dishonour of being slain by so feeble a hand.

While Abimelech usurped the Government the Lapithæ and Centaurs made war against the Thebans. These Nations were descended of Apollo, and were the first in those parts that devised to manage horses, to bridle and to sit them: insomuch, as when they first came down from the Mountains of Pindus, into the plains, those which had never seen horsmen before, thought them creatures compounded of men and horses; so did the Mexicans, when Ferdinando Cortes the Spaniard first invaded that Empire. Palæphatus, l. 1. de incredibil.

After the death of Abimelech, Thola of Issachar governed Israel 23. years, and after him him Jair the Gileadite 22. years, who seems to be descended of Jair the son of Manasse, who in Moses time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same after his own name, Havoth Jair. For to this Jair there remained thirty of those Cities which his Ancestor had recovered from the Amorites. Of these Judges, because there is nothing else written, it is an argument, that during all their times Israel lived without disturbance, and in peace.

Deut 3. 14. Num. 12. 41. Jud. 10.

When Jair judged Israel, Priamus began to reign in Troy, who at such time as Hercules sacked Ilium, was carried away captive with his sister Hesione into Greece, and being afterward redeemed for ransome, he re-built and greatly strengthened and adorned Troy; and so far enlarged his Dominions, as he became the supreme Lord in effect of all Asia the less. He married Hecuba the Daughter of Cisseus King of Thrace, and had in all (saith Cicero) fifty sons, whereof seventeen by Hecuba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recover his Aunt Hesione, took Helena the Wife of Menelaus, the cause of the war which followed.

Theseus the tenth King of Athens, began likewise to reign in the beginning of Jair: some Writers call him the son of Neptune and Æthra: but Plutarch in the Story of his life, finds him begotten by Ægeus, of whom the Grecian Sea between it and Asia the less took name. For when Minos had mastered the Athenians, so far as he forc'd them to pay him seven of their sons every year for tribute, whom he inclosed within a Labyrinth, to be devoured by the Monster Minotaur: because belike the sons of Taurus, which he begat on Pasiphae the Queen, had the charge of them: among these seven Theseus thrust himself, not doubting by his valour to deliver the rest, and to free the Countrey of that slavery occasioned for the death of Androgeas, Minos his son.

And having possest himself of Ariadnes affection, who was Minos daughter, he received from her a bottom of thred, by which he conducted himself through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the City of Crocodiles in Egypt; by means whereof having slain Minotaur, he found a ready way to return. But whereas his father Ægeus had given order, that if he came back with victory and in safety, he should use a white sail in sign thereof, and not that mournful black sail under which they left the port of Athens: This instruction being either forgotten or neglected, Ægeus descrying the ship of Theseus with a black sail, did cast himself over the Rocks down into the Sea, afterward called of his name Ægeum.

One of the first famous acts of Theseus, was the killing of Scyron, who kept a passage between Megara and the Peloponnesian Isthmos, and threw all whom he mastered into the Sea, from the high Rocks. Afterward he did the like to Cercyon, by wrestling, who used by that art to kill others. He also rid the Country of Procrustes, who used to bend down the strong limbs of two trees, and fastned by cords such as he took, part of them to one, and part to the other bough, and by the springing up tare them asunder. So did he root out Periphetes and other mischievous thieves and murtherers. He overthrew the Army of the Amazones, who after many victories and vastations, entred the Territory of Atheus. Theseus having taken their Queen Hippolita prisoner, begat on her Hippolitus; with whom afterward his mother-in-law Phædra, falling in love, and he refusing to abuse his fathers bed, Phædra perswaded Theseus, that his son offered to force her: after which it is feigned, that Theseus besought Neptune to revenge this wrong of his sons by some violent death. Neptune taking a time of advantage, sent out his Sea-Calves, as Hippolitus passed by the Sea-shore, and so affrighted his horses, as casting the Coach over, he was (by being intangled therein) torn in pieces. Which miserable and undeserved destiny, when Phædra had heard of, she strangled her self. After which it is feigned, that Diana intreated Æsculapius to set Hippolitus his pieces together, and to restore him to life: which done, because he was chaste, she led him with her into Italy, to accompany her in her hunting, and field sports.

It is probable that Hippolitus, when his father sought his life, thinking to escape by Sea, was affronted thereat, and did receive many wounds in forcing his passage and escape; which wounds Æsculapius, to wit, some skilful Physician, or Chirurgion, healed again: after which he passed into Italy, where he lived with Diana, that is, the life of a Hunter, in which he most delighted. But of those ancient prophane Stories Plutarch saith well, that as Cosmographers in their descriptions of the World, where they find many vast places whereof they know nothing, fill the same with strange Beasts, Birds, and Fishes, and with Mathematical lines; so do the Grecian Historians and Poets imbroder and intermixe the Tales of ancient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous discourses. True it is, that Theseus did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom he made made his pattern, and was the first that gathered the Athenians, from being dispersed in thin and ragged Villages: in recompence whereof, and for devising them Laws to live under, and in order, he was by the beggarly, mutable, and ungrateful multitude, in the end banished. Some say, per Ostraciſmum, by the Law of Lots, or names written on shels, which was a device of his own.

He stole Helen (as they say) when she was fifty years old, from Aphidna, which City Castor and Pollux overturned, when they followed after Theseus to recover their sister. Erasistratus and Pausanias write, that Theseus begot her with child at Argos, where she erected a Temple to Lucina: but her age makes that Tale unlikely to be true, and so doth Ovid, Non tamen ex facto fructum tulit ille petitum, &c. The rape Eusebius finds in the first of Jair, who governed Israel twenty two years, to whom succeeded Jephta or Jepte, six years, to whom Ibzan, who ruled seven years, and then Habdon eight years: in whose time was the fall of Troy. So, as if Theseus had a child by her in the first of Jair, (at which time we must count her no less than fifteen years old: for the women did not commonly begin so young as they do now) she was then at least two and fifty years old at the destruction of Troy: and when she was stollen by Paris, eight and thirty: but herein the Chronologers do not agree. Yet Eusebius and Bunting, with Halicarnaceſseus, do in effect consent, that the City was entred and burnt in the first year of Demophoon King of Athens, the Successour of Mneſtheus, the Successour of Theseus, seventeen daies before the Summer Tropick; and that about the eleventh of September following, the Trojans crost the Helleſpont into Thrace, and wintered there, and in the next spring that they navigated into Sicilia, where wintering the second year, the next Summer they arrived at Laurentum, and builded Lavinium. But S. Auguſtine hath otherwise, That when Polyphides governed Sicyon; Mneſtheus, Athens; Tantanes, Aſſyria; Habdon, Iſrael; then Æneas arrived in Italy, transporting with him in twenty ships the remainder of the Trojans: but the difference is not great; and hereof more at large in the story of Troy at hand.

His succeſsours, Adraſtus, who reigned four years, and Polyphides, who reigned thirteen, are accounted to the time of Jair; so is also Mneſtheus King of Athens and Atreus, who held a great part of Peloponneſus. §. VIII.

Of the war of Thebes, which was in this age.

IN this age was the War of Thebes, the most ancient that ever Greek Poet or Historian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truly against the Peripateticks) that the World had a beginning, urgeth them with this objection:

——Si nulla fuit genitalis origo
Rerumque & mundi, ſemperque æterna fuêre,
Cur ſupra bellum Thebanum, & funera Trojæ,
Non alias alii quoque res cecinere Poetæ?

If all this World had no original,
But things have ever been as now they are:
Before the siege of Thebes, or Troys last fall,
Why did no Poet sing some elder War?

It is true, that in these times Greece was very salvage, the Inhabitants being often chaced from place to place, by the Captains of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon he dwelt his own, longer than he could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercourse they used little; neither did they plant many trees, or sow more corn than was necessary for their sustenance. Money they had little or none; for it is thought that the name of money was not heard of in Greece, when Homer did write, who measures the value of Gold and Brass: by the worth in cattel: saying, that the golden Armour of Glaucus was worth an hundred Beeves; and the Copper Armour of Diomedes worth nine.

Roberries by land and sea were common and without shame, and to steal horses or kine was the usual exercise of their great men. Their Towns were not many, whereof those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Mycenæ the principal City in Peloponneſus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancy, and though in some small Towns of that half Isle of Peloponneſus, the Inhabitants might have enjoyed quietness within their their narrow bounds; as likewiſe did the Athenians, becauſe their Country was ſo barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the Land in general was very rude, it will eaſily appear to ſuch as conſider what Thucidydes the greateſt of their Hiſtorians hath written to this effect, in the Preface to his Hiſtory. Wherefore, as in theſe later times, idle Chroniclers uſe when the want good matter, to fill whole Books with reports of great Froſts, or dry Summers, and other ſuch things which no man cares to reade; ſo did they who ſpake of Greece in her beginnings, remember only the great Flouds which were in the times of Ogyges and Deucalion: or elſe rehearſe Fables of men changed into Birds, of ſtrange Monſters, of adultery committed by their gods, and the mighty men which they begat, without writing ought that ſavoured of humanity before the time of the war of Thebes: the brief whereof is this.

Oedipus the ſon of Laius King of Thebes, having been caſt forth when he was an Infant, becauſe an Oracle foretold what evil ſhould come to paſs by him, did afterwards in a narrow paſſage, contending for the way, ſlay his own Father, not knowing either then or long after, vvho he vvas. Afterward he became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queen Jocaſta, called by Homer, Epicaſte: on vvhom, not knowing her to be his mother, he begat two ſons, Eteocles and Polynices. But vvhen in proceſs of time, finding out by good circumſtances, vvho vvere his Parents, he underſtood the grievous murther and inceſt he had committed, he tore out his own eyes for grief, and left the City. His Wife (and Mother) did hang her ſelf. Some ſay, that Oedipus having his eyes pulled out, vvas expelled Thebes, bitterly curſing his ſons, becauſe they ſuffered their father to be caſt out of the Town, and aided him not. Howſoever it were, his two Sons made this agreement, that the one of them ſhould reign one year, and the other another year, and ſo by courſe rule interchangeably. But this appointment was ill obſerved. For when Polynices had after a years government reſigned the Kingdom to his brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the firſt year, he refuſed to give over the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fled unto Argos, where Adraſtus the ſon of Talaus then reigned, unto whoſe Palace coming by night, he was driven to ſeek lodging in an out-houſe, on the back-ſide.

Hom Odyſſ. 11.

There he met with Tydeus the ſon of Oeneus, who was fled from Calydon: with whom ſtriving about their lodging, he fell to blowes. Adraſtus hearing the noiſe came forth and took up the quarrel. At which time perceiving in the ſhield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices a Lion, he remembred an old Oracle by which he was adviſed to give his two Daughters in marriage to a Lion and a Bore: and accordingly he did beſtow his Daughter Argia upon Tydeus, and Deipyle upon Polynices, promiſing to reſtore them both to their Countries. To this purpoſe levying an Army, and aſſembling as many valiant Captains as he could draw to follow him, he was deſirous among others to carry Amphiaraus the ſon of Oicleus a great Soothſayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphyaraus, who is ſaid to have fore-ſeen all things, knowing well that none of the Captains ſhould eſcape, ſave only Adraſtus, did both utterly refuſe to be one in that expedition, and perſwaded others to ſtay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the Wife of Amphyaraus, offering unto her a very fair Bracelet, upon condition that ſhe ſhould cauſe her Husband to aſſiſt him. The Soothſayer knowing what ſhould work his deſtiny, forbade his Wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the Bracelet was in her eye ſo precious a Jewel, that ſhe could not refuſe it. Therefore whereas a great controverſie between Amphyaraus and Adraſtus, was by way of compromiſe put unto the deciſion of Eriphyle, either of them being bound by ſolemn oath to ſtand to her appointment: ſhe ordered the matter ſo, as a Woman ſhould that did love a Bracelet better than her Husband. He now finding that it was far more eaſie to foreſee then avoid deſtiny, ſought for ſuch comfort as revenge might afford him, giving in charge unto his ſons, that when they came to full age, they ſhould kill their Mother, and make ſtrong war upon the Thebanes.

Now had Adraſtus aſſembled all his forces, of which, the ſeven chief Leaders were himſelf, Amphiaraus, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (in ſtead of whom ſome name Meciſteus) all Argives, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Ætolian, and Parthenopeus the Arcadian, ſon of Meleager and Atalanta. When the Army came to the Nemæan Wood, they met a Woman, whom they deſired to help them to ſome Water; ſhe having a Childe in her arms, laid it down, and led the Argives to a Spring: but ere ſhe returned, a Serpent had ſlain the Childe. This Woman was Hypſipyle the Daughter of Thoas the the Lemnian, whom ſhe would have ſaved when the Woman of the Iſle ſlew all the Males by conſpiracy, intending to lead an Amazonian life. For ſuch her Piety the Lemnian Wives did ſell her to Pyrats, and the Pyrats to Lycurgus Lord of the Countrey about Nemæa, whoſe young ſon Opheltes, or Archemorus ſhe did nurſe, and loſt, as is ſhewed before. When upon the Childs death ſhe hid her ſelf for fear of her Maſter, Amphiaraus told her Sons where they ſhould find her: and the Argives did both kill the Serpent which had ſlain the Child, and in memory of the chance, did inſtitute ſolemn funeral games, called Nemæan, wherein Adraſtus wan the prize with his ſwift horſe Areon, Tydeus with the whorlbars, Amphiaraus at running and quoiting, Polynices at wreſtling, Parthenopæus at ſhooting, and one Laodocus in darting. This was the firſt inſtitution of the Nemæan games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. There are, who think that they were ordained in honour of one Opheltus a Lacedemonian. Some ſay by Hercules, when he had ſlain the Nemæan Lion: but the common opinion agrees with that which is here ſet down.

From Nemæa the Argives marched onwards, arrived at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them ſent Embaſſadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Covenants between him and Polynices. This meſſage was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was throughly reſolved to hold what he had, as long as he could: which Tydeus perceiving, and intending partly to get honour, partly to try what mettle was in the Thebanes, he made many challenges, and obtained victory in all of them, not without much envy and malice of the people, who laid fifty men in ambuſh to intercept him at his return to the army, of which fifty he ſlew all but one, whom he ſent back to the City as a Reporter and Witneſs of his Valour. When the Argives underſtood how reſolved Eteocles was, they preſented themſelves before the City, and encamped round about it. Thebes is ſaid to have had at that time ſeven gates, which belike ſtood not far aſunder, ſeeing that the Argives (who afterward when they were very far ſtronger, could ſcarce muſter up more thouſands than Thebes had gates) did compaſs the Town, Adraſtus quartered before the Gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Ogygean, Tydeus before Crenis, Amphiaraus at Proëtis, Hippomedon at Anchais, Parthenopæus at Electa, and Polynices at Hypſiſta. In the mean ſeaſon, Eteocles having armed his men, and appointed Commanders unto them, took advice of Tireſias the Soothſayer, who promiſed Victory to the Thebans, if Menæcius the ſon of Creon, a principal man of the City, would vow himſelf to be ſlain in honour of Mars the god of War. So full of malice and pride is the Devil, and ſo envious at his Creators glory, that he not only challengeth honour due to God alone, as oblations and ſacrifice withal Divine worſhip, but commandeth us to offer our ſelves and our children unto him, when he hath ſufficiently clouded mens underſtanding, and bewitched their Wils with ignorance and blind devotion. And ſuch abominable ſacrifice of men, maides, and children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Gauls, Germans, Cyprians, Egyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or fear they were moſt filled with ſuperſtition. But as they grew more wiſe, ſo did he wax leſs impudent in cunning, though not leſs malicious in deſiring the continuance of ſuch barbarous inhumanity. For King Diphilus in Cyprus without advice of any Oracle, made the Idol of that Country reſt contented with an Oxe inſtead of a man. Tiberius forbade humane ſacrifices in Africa, and crucified the Prieſts in the Groves where they had practiſed them. Hercules taught the Italians to drown men of hay in ſtead of the living: yet among the ſalvages in the Weſt Indies theſe cruel offerings have been practiſed of late Ages: which, as it is a ſufficient argument that Satan's malice is only covered and hidden by this ſubtilty among civil people: ſo it may ſerve as a probable conjecture of the barbariſmes then raigning in Greece. For Menæcius, as ſoon as he underſtood that his death might purchaſe Victory to his people, beſtowed himſelf (as he thought) upon Mars, killing himſelf before the gates of the City. Then was a battel fought, wherein the Argives prevailed ſo far at the firſt, that Capanius advancing laddars to the Wals, got up upon the Rampart: whence, when he fell, or was caſt down, or (as Writers wave it) was ſtricken down by Jupiter with a thunder bolt, the Argives fled. Many on each part were ſlain in this battel, which cauſed both ſides to deſire that Eteocles and Polynices might try out the quarrel in ſingle fight: whereto the two brethren according, ſlew each other.

Another battel was fought after their death, wherein the ſons of Aſtacus behaved themſelves very valiantly: Iſmarus one of the ſons ſlew Hippomedon, which was one of the ſeven Princes: Parthenopæus being another of the ſeven (who was ſaid to have been been ſo fair, that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was ſlain by Amphidicus, or, as ſome ſay, by Periclymenus the ſon of Neptune: and the valiant Tydeus, by Menalippus: yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Menalippus was brought unto him by Amphyaraus, which he cruelly tore open, and ſwallowed up the brains. Upon which fact, it is ſaid, that Pallas, who had brought from Jupiter ſuch remedy for his wounds, as ſhould have made him immortal, refuſed to beſtow it upon him: whereby perhaps was meant that his honour which might have continued immortal, did periſh through the beaſtly rage that he ſhewed at his death.

The hoſt of the Argives being wholly diſcomfited, Adraſtus and Amphyaraus fled: of whom Amphyaraus is ſaid to have been ſwallowed quick into the earth, near to the River Iſmenus, together with his Chariot, and ſo loſt out of mens ſight, being peradventure overwhelmed with dead carkaſſes, or drowned in the River: and his body never found, nor greatly ſought for. Adraſtus eſcaped on his good horſe Arion, and came to Athens; where ſitting at an Altar, called the Altar of Mercy, he made ſupplication for their aid to recover their bodies. For Creon having obtained the government of Thebes after the death of Eteocles, would not ſuffer the bodies of the Argives to be buried: but cauſed Antigone, the only daughter then living of Oedipus, to be buried quick, becauſe ſhe had ſought out and buried the body of her brother Polynices, contrary to Creons Edict. The Athenians condeſcending to the requeſt of Adraſtus, did ſend forth an Army under the conduct of Theſeus, which took Thebes, and reſtored the bodies of the Argives to ſepulture: at which time Evadne the Wife of Capaneus threw her ſelf into the funeral fire, and was burnt willingly with her Husband. But it little contented the ſons of thoſe Captains which were ſlain at Thebes, that any leſs revenge ſhould be taken of their Fathers death, than the ruine of the City: Wherefore ten year after, having levied Forces, Egialeus the ſon of Adraſtus, Diomedes of Tydeus, Promachus of Parthenopæus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Therſander of Polynices, and Euripylus of Meciſteus, marched thither under the conduct of Alcmæon, the ſon of Amphiaraus: with whom alſo went his brother Amphyloctus. Apollo promiſed Victory, if Alcmæon were their Captain, whom afterward by another Oracle he commanded to kill his own Mother.

When they came to the City, they were encountred by Laodamas the ſon of Eteocles then King of the Thebans (for Creon was only Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the battel, and ſlew Ægialeus, yet was he put to the worſt, and driven to fly, or (according to Apollodorus) ſlain by Alcmæon. After this diſaſter, the Citizens began to deſire compoſition; but in the mean time they conveyed themſelves with their Wives and Children away from thence by night, and ſo began to wander up and down, till at length they built the Town called Eſtiæa. The Argives, when they perceived that their enemies had quitted the Town, entring into it, ſacked it, threw down the Wals, and laid it waſte; howbeit it is reported by ſome, that the Town was ſaved by Thirſander the ſon of Polynices, who cauſing the Citizens to return, did there reign over them. That he ſaved the City from utter deſtruction, it is very likely; for he reigned there, and led the Thebans to the War of Troy, which very ſhortly after enſued.

AFter the death of Jair (near about whoſe time theſe things hapned in Greece, and during whoſe Government, and that of Thola, Iſrael lived in peace and in order) they revolted again from the Law and Service of God, and became more wicked and idolatrous than ever. For whereas in the former times they worſhipped Baal and Aſteroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen Nations adjoyning, and imbraced the Idols of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Moabites, and Ammonites: with thoſe of the Philiſtims. And as before it pleaſed God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites, and Midianites: ſo now he ſcourged them by the * Ammonites, and afterward by the Philiſtims. Judg. 10. * The perſecution of the Ammonites laſted 18 years, and ended in the year of the World 2820. in which year Jepta began, Jud. 11.

Now among the Iſraelites, thoſe of Gilead being moſt oppreſt, becauſe they bordered upon the Ammonites, they were inforc't to ſeek Jephta, whom they had formerly deſpiſed and caſt from them, becauſe he was baſe born; but he (notwithſtanding thoſe former injuries) participating more of godly compaſſion, than of deviliſh hatred and revenge, was content to lead the Gileadites to the War, upon condition that they ſhould eſtabliſh him their Governour after Victory. And when he had diſputed with Ammon for the Land, diſproved Ammon's right, and fortified

After theſe things the children of Iſrael, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either envious of Jephta's victory, or otherwiſe making way to their future calamity, and to the moſt grievous ſlavery that ever Iſrael ſuffered, quarrelled with Jephta, that they were not called to the War, as before time they had conteſted with Gideon. Jephta hereupon inforced to defend himſelf againſt their fury, in the incounter ſlew of them 42000. which ſo weakened the body of the Land,

1 Kin. 6. 1. is that of S. Paul, Acts 13. the third is that which is in the firſt of Kings. Jephta here challengeth the poſſeſſion of Gilead for 300. years: S. Paul giveth to the Judges, as it ſeems, from the end of Joſua to the laſt of Heli, 450. years. In the firſt of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Iſrael out of Egypt, to the foundation of Solomon's Temple, there were conſumed 480. years. To the firſt, Beroaldus findeth Jephta's 300. years to be but 266. years, to wit, 18. of Joſua, 40. of Othoniel, 80. of Aod and Samgar, 40. of Debora, 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Jair: But Jephta (ſaith Beroaldus) putteth or propoſeth a certain number for an uncertain: Sic ut dicat annum agi prope trecenteſimum, ex quo nullus litem ea de re moverit Iſraeli; So he ſpeaketh (ſaith he) as meaning, that then it was about, or well-nigh, the three hundred year, ſince Iſrael poſſeſſed thoſe Countries, no man making queſtion of their right. Id facit, numero certo pro incerto proposito. Codoman on the contrary finds more years than Jephta named by 65. to wit, 365. whereof 71. were ſpent in Iſraels captivity, at ſeveral times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Jephta forbare to repeat the whole ſum, or any great part, leſt the Ammonites ſhould have juſtly objected, that 71. of thoſe years the Iſraelites were in captivity, and vaſſals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name three hundred years, it was enough for preſcription, he omitted the reſt.

To juſtifie this account of 365. years, beſides the 71. years of captivity or affliction, to be added to Beroaldus his 266. he addeth alſo 28. years more, and ſo maketh up the ſum of 365. Theſe 28. years he findeth out thus: twenty years he gives to the Seniors between Joſua and Othoniel: and where Beroaldus alloweth eighteen years to Joſua his government, Codoman accounts that his rule laſted 26. according to Joſephus; whereas Saint Auguſtine and Euſebius give him 27. Melanchon 32. The truth is, that this addition of 28. years, is far more doubtful than the other of 71. But though we admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of ſome part of the years of affliction (to wit 34. years of the 71.) if we add them to the 266. years of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of theſe, we have the juſt number of 300. years. Neither is it ſtrange that Jephta ſhould leave out more than half of the years of affliction: ſeeing, as it is already ſaid, the Ammonites might except againſt the 71. years, and ſay, that during theſe years, or at leaſt a good part of them, the Iſraelites had no quiet poſſeſſion of the Countries in queſtion. Martin Luther is the author of a third opinion, making thoſe 300. years remembred by Jephta, to be 306. which odd years, ſaith he, Jephta omitteth. But becauſe the years of every Judge, as they reigned, cannot make up the number of 306. but do onely compound 266. therefore doth Luther add to this number the whole time which Moses spent in the Desarts of Arabia Petræa; which forty years of Moses added to the number which Beroaldus findeth of 266. make indeed 306.

But I see nothing in the Text to warrant Luthers judgment herein: for in the dispute between Jephta and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon, in these words: Because Israel took my Land, when they came up from Egypt, from Arnon unto Jabboc, &c. now therefore restore those Lands quietly; or in peace. So by this place it is plain, that the time is not to be accounted from Moses departure out of Egypt: but from the time that the Land was possest. For it is said, Quia cepit Israel terram meam, Behold Israel took my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Jephta's answer also confirmeth in these words: When Israel dwelt in Hesbbon, and in her Towns, and in Aroer, and in her Towns, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300. years: why did ye not then recover them in that space? so as this place speaks it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300. years: and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents that Israel had to possess it, it seemeth somewhat strained to me: for we do not use to reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possessions.
